The Prince's reply was happily phrased. He expressed the gratification he felt at making the acquaintance of so brave and generous a race as the Rajputs, and his intense appreciation of the beauty of their capital.

After the banquet the palace, with its marble terraces, its cupolas and its towers, the bridges, the islands in the lake and the distant forts were outlined in fire. And the white buildings glowed in the soft golden light of the native oil-lamps, which made the magnificent display of fireworks appear garish.

Before the guests departed the Maharana gave them "attar and pan" and decorated them with garlands of little balls of coloured silk strung on threads of gold.

The Royal party spent to-day very quietly.

Daily Telegraph.—On Saturday morning, shortly after dawn, the Prince of Wales arrived at Udaipur, to find this the most beautiful city in all India still blanketed with a faint, white, low-lying mist swathing the town and lake alike and creeping far out along the country roads towards the railway station. Up through this soft veil rose the towers and cupolas of the Maharana's palace and guarding the hills around the lake, each crowned with its own palace or fort.

It is an old story that Viceroy after Viceroy has come to Udaipur revolving in his mind schemes for bringing this lonely capital to date, and devising methods for the utilisation of Udaipur's natural advantages of wood and water. Viceroy after Viceroy has expressed a hope that those modern improvements which have been adopted to their vast material benefit by other States might find a home here also. But Viceroy after Viceroy has gone back from Udaipur well content to leave her as she is, unspoiled and unimproved, recognising that dynamo and driving band are poor substitutes for the splendid pattern of old-world chivalry and courteous tradition which this lovely lake-side palace sets, not to Rajputana only, of which the Maharana is the undisputed overlord, but to all India alike. I have elsewhere sketched lightly the impression left by this high town of fairyland, and it must be admitted that yesterday, in all her changing moods, from dawn to the tardy rising of the half-waned moon, Udaipur showed herself to perfection, as such a loyal city should. High festival was kept, and all the State of Mewar seemed to have poured itself into the narrow streets of the city. Indeed, had it not been for the unflinching good-nature and courtesy of the merry-making crowds, there were a hundred risks of serious accident every hour, as gallopers and escorts and private carriages hurried on urgent occasions through the town. But it is pleasant to think that neither by day nor, as was infinitely more likely still, during the illumination by night, was there any serious harm or damage caused by this whole-hearted welcome to the Shahzada.

Formal visits were exchanged in the morning by the Prince and the Maharana, the occasion of the former's drive through the town to the palace being made by the people of Udaipur an opportunity for an enthusiastic welcome. Looking down from the upper storey of the tower of the police-station, the scene was impressive of congested and many-hued humanity gathered in thousands along the street sides, sitting in close cordiality along the public fronts of every shop gazing from behind every window and balcony and indeed, perched upon every coign of vantage, however insecure and dangerous, which these rambling and irregularly-built houses could afford. As a general rule, which had, however, a hundred exceptions every minute, the men of Udaipur dress in white, and the women in colours, chiefly a rich blood-red maroon. But the puggarees of the men are of every colour under the sun except dark blue. Looking from a height, these innumerable dots of scarlet and myrtle green, lemon yellow, light blue, or crimson, stretched away on a general ground of white, here and there flayed by heavy stains of crimson, where groups of women gathered in hundreds. The effect was rather helped than hindered by the veil of dust which hung heavily in the air all day, and was destined at night to act as one of the most beautiful auxiliaries to illumination that could have been devised.

So the day wore on, after being occupied by the Royal party in driving to a pleasant spot outside the town for tea, and by the great mass of the people in setting the last few hundreds of thousands of lamps along the palaces and streets of Udaipur, and filling with oil the million already in position. For beautiful as Udaipur is at any hour, and in any season, there is a well-remembered tradition, that when a Viceroy or member of the Imperial house visits her the town and lake-front, forts, bridges, ghats, islands, and terraces shall all be outlined with fire.

It is easy to waste adjectives on such a sight, but, in sober truth, there cannot be, there can never have been elsewhere in the world such a spectacle as the Pachola lake presents when its quick surface reflects the quiet lights which trace points of fire, the steps and string courses, lintels, jambs, roofs, domes, cupolas, and arched cloisters of four miles of architecture. There is much, perhaps, to be said against the custom. This morning Udaipur lies out bedraggled and soiled with a million smoky patches on her snow-white walls, the waters of the lake are grey with soot and iridescent with spilled oil and the lovely island palaces are defiled. Still there must have been an ugly aftermath, even in the most splendid days of Florentine or Roman festivals, and the beauty of these quiet, persistent lines of light, daintily ruffled by the quiet night airs, is beyond words. Later on, when above them the shearing rockets curved and bore coloured fruits, and huge set-pieces, half smothered and wholly improved by bulging volumes of amber smoke, crackled out indistinguishable figures and laid coloured pathways over the rippling waters, the brilliancy and barbarism of the gorgeous sight seemed the one finale needed to close the perfection of a memorable day for Udaipur.

But though barbaric beyond doubt in Oriental splendour one touch of genius, sheer genius, saved the whole glittering scene from that colour of ostentation that might be feared. There where the mighty mass of the Maharana's palace rose sheer above the lake, there where most display was to be expected not a spark, but a single line of lights, marking the parapet of the central block, rising square 250 feet out of the water. All else was dark, and rather felt to be there than seen, though low festoons of lamps lighted red-carpeted stairs down to the water, which all day had been a solitary splash of crimson on the vast white building.

After dinner the Maharana, whom caste laws forbade to eat with Englishmen, welcomed the Prince to Udaipur in a gracefully-worded speech. He expressed his regret that the Emperor had been unable to visit Udaipur in 1875, and, short though the speech was, his words proved clearly enough how well the senior of all the Princes of Hindustan deserves the reputation for dignity, courtesy, and grace, which seems inseparable from our conception of the Lord of Udaipur.

This evening the Prince and Princess of Wales were present at a banquet given by the Maharana, who, attended by his nobles, received his guests at the door of the drawing-room, escorted the Princess to her chair, and sat for a few minutes conversing with Their Royal Highnesses before withdrawing.

After dinner Major Pinhey proposed the King's health on behalf of the Maharana, and the Maharana then entered with an address of welcome which he had prepared in his own language.

While the address was being read the Maharana took a seat at the table next the Prince. The toast was duly honoured, the band playing "God Bless the Prince of Wales."

The Prince replied as follows:

Maharana Sahib, on behalf of the Princess of Wales and ✓ myself, I thank you with all my heart for the charming manner with which you have proposed our health. We are both delighted that our first visit as guests of an Indian Prince should have been to your beautiful capital. All India is still somewhat strange to us, but in Mewar we are truly in a new world, and from the moment when we arrived in your State this morning to this hour one charming impression has been quickly followed by another. We have heard much of the Rajputs, and have had the pleasure of meeting those of other clans in England, but to realise the splendid traditions of chivalry, freedom, and courtesy which are the proud possessions of the Rajput, one must see him in his own home; and, for the Princess and myself, I say in all sincerity that all we have heard and read in praise of Rajputana is dwarfed by what we have seen in one short day. It would be almost superfluous to say to those present this evening anything about the noble reputation Your Highness has won for yourself in Rajputana and in India, for they have all enjoyed the pleasure and privilege experienced by the Princess and myself to-day in seeing and conversing with the famous chief of the Senodins. Great traditions are grandly maintained from what we see here in our host. In conclusion, I must convey to you the King Emperor's message of kindness and goodwill. He could not come to Udaipur, but the Princess and I, as Your Highness has pointed out, are more fortunate, and thanks to the railway enterprise of the Maharana, we have been able to reach this old-world city in ease and comfort. I now ask you, ladies and gentlemen, to drink to the long life and happiness of the Maharana of Udaipur.

Englishman.—From Indore the route of the Royal progress lay to Udaipur, the most romantic and the most fascinating city in India. The Maharana of Udaipur, who is now Their Royal Highnesses's host, is of the bluest blood of the East. As of the older branch of the Surya Vansa, or children of the Sun, he is regarded by the Hindus as the direct representative of Rama, from whom was descended, through Kanak Sen, the founder of the Udaipur family. In the history of chivalry there is no epic transcending the heroic struggle of the Sesodias of Mewar against the growing Mahomedan power. What parallel is there in the annals of the West for the great sacrifice which preceded the sack of the ancient capital of Chitor by the Tartars when thirteen hundred women having been immolated to preserve them from pollution or captivity, the survivors of the garrison sought death with reckless gallantry in the crowded ranks of Allah; or of the even greater Johur which accompanied the second sack of Chitor, when thirteen thousand women preferred death to dishonour and found it, before the scant remnants of the city's defenders died fighting the army of Bahadur of Gurjat? And when Chitor was finally sacked by Akhar the gallant Portab maintained the unequal struggle with straw for his pallet and pateras for his palate with a fortitude which makes his gallant deeds the common heritage of all Rajputs. The capitals of Mewar, old and new, are nurseries for an heroic race. Chitor, that fortress crowned hill, rising like a gigantic battleship from the plain, is now wholly deserted and given over to the owl, the bat and the serpent, but in Hindostan there is no more picturesque city than that which Udai Singh founded amongst the mountains. The beautiful Pachola lake by the forest covered sepia-tinted hills is an exquisite oasis in the brownness of much of Southern Rajputana. The palace stands upon the very crest of a ridge running parallel to the lake, but is considerably elevated above the margin of the lake, flanked with octagonal towers and crowned with cupolas. There is no more striking or majestic structure in the East. The city, one of those rare instances of a town rising around and dependent entirely upon the court, is stamped indelibly with the impress of a dominant Hinduism, which has not begun to disintegrate before occidentalising influences. Whilst the view from the far side of the lake with the noble proportions of the palace rising sheer from the water's edge and reflected in its bosom the slender water palaces of Jagmandir and Jagnewas, of glistering white; with the soft brown hills in the back ground is one of unforgettable beauty.

The reception Udaipur gave to Their Royal Highnesses was characteristic of a state which remains singularly true to tradition. The Maharana met the Royal visitors in the early morning and drove with the Prince of Wales and Sir Walter Lawrence to the Residency, Her Royal Highness following with Sir Arthur Bigge and the Hon. Mr. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General. The route lay amid scenes which have had no like in India, since the review of the retainers of the Chiefs at the Delhi Durbar. All the feudatories of the state were assembled to pay honour to the Royal visitors, and many came in the fashion of centuries ago. Here were tough old Jhagirdars clad in gorgeous robes, mounted on squealing stallions, whose heads were enveloped in scarlet cloths as the only means of controlling them; warriors in chain armour and huge panels of buckram protecting their horse's flanks and quarters; warriors in buff jerkins, their lances tied to the stirrup with string, and warriors in coats of quilted cotton. Here were too camelmen and elephants with painted trunks, and rustics from the countryside by the thousand, each with a weapon of only a broken fowling piece or battered tulwar. Some sort of rude order was maintained, but little, for the stallions plunged and kicked, the camels bit and the ponderous elephants plunged along regardless of everybody, whilst through this bit of mediæval India a company of the State infantry in discarded scarlet British tunics and dhooties, shouldering Enfield rifles, marched serenely along utterly unconscious of the bizarre in their appearance. It was indeed a microcosm of these fast disappearing parts of India where custom and tradition have withstood the exotic influences which are robbing us of most that is picturesque in native life and character.

The formal visits of the morning introduced yet another phase of Udaipur life. The Maharana paid a state visit to His Royal Highness at the Residency, and it was almost immediately returned by the Prince of Wales, the Princess being a most interested spectator of the ceremonies. The route lay through the Hathipol gate, past the Juggernath temple and through the most typical parts of the bazar. The native city of Udaipur, though one of mean and rude paved streets, is distinctively Hindu, and the many temples and tanks preserve it from any approach to flatness. Unfortunately the Durbar hall was in the new wing of the Palace an addition satisfying to the eye externally, but containing nothing remarkable internally, except its meretricious adornments. The sirdars, however, made a brave display in their gorgeous raiment, and the noontide sun blazing through the entrance hall up the aisle lined by the chief and the staff to where His Royal Highness in white naval uniform sat, with the Maharana on his left, made the silks and satins and jewels literally scintillate. The first to be presented was the minor Chief of Baidla, wearing the sword which was presented to his grandfather by the British Government for services rendered during the mutiny, and attar and pan were afterwards distributed. It was the same self-possessed young gentleman, still clinging to his cherished weapon, who presented these emblems of Oriental hospitality to the members of the staff. When His Royal Highness departed the Maharana distributed pan to his feudatories.

In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses in the course of a pleasant drive round the Fateh Sagar Lake saw the palace and lake bathed in the glory of the setting sun in that exquisite hour of the Indian day, which tones all harshness, softens all crudities, and even in the scorching months of May and June, compensates for the burden and heat of tropic life. But the crowning glory of a splendid day was the progress to the palace by barge for the State dinner, when the city was illuminated with a brilliancy that baffles description. The drive to the Mission Ghat from the Residency was through serried lines of twinkling lights which crowned each fortalice and twinkled bravely on the little white fort, which dominates the landscape from the summit of the highest of the hemming hills. Then as we stepped into the manned and masted barges and pushed into the unruffled blackness of the bosom of the lake, a vision from fairyland burst upon us. The castellated walls, the edge of the water, the ghats and buildings were outlined with dancing fire. The night was one of inky blackness, not the vestige of a zephyr stirred the dry, cool air and each one of the myriad little bullies shone as gallantly as if upon its efforts depended the whole decorative scheme. The barge moved on with unceasing stroke towards the great Pachola lake, whose even greater glories were dimly indicated by the glow which hung over the city. We were now traversing slowly the small lake which connects Pachola, on which the palace stands, with the Fateh Sagar on the outskirts of the city. Shooting under the Chandpol for all the world like the Rialto at Venice decked with stars, and through a deep, dark lock, we debouched on to Pachola and opened out at once on a scene of amazing beauty. The lake was dancing a sheet of molten gold into which ran streaks of living fire from ghats and steps, houses, palace and temple. The crowded ghats on the right and the approaches to the palace were sheets of flame. The vast bulk of the palace itself was illuminated with a simplicity which only heightened the general scheme. That broad face of the olden building which bluntly fronts the lake was crowned with but a single streak of light, the more effective from its contrast with the fire steamers which stretched in every other direction. Then in the very bosom of the lake, those exquisite water palaces, Jag Nवास and Jag Mandas, were stretched in fiery lines which plunged sheer into the molten gold of the lake's surface.

"Each purple peak, each flinty spire,

Was bathed in floods of living fire."

And this was not the hard cold light of electricity or gas, or any of the western illuminations. Each little flame was flickering gently in the still night air, and this with the slight smoke, lent a graceful mellowness and softness to the whole scene. Scarcely less remarkable was the roar of the crowd which overbore all other sounds. The whole population of Udaipur and half the country side were in the streets, demonstrating their joy in the splendid spectacle, with cries and exclamations, which blended into an impressive volume of sound. Nor was the natural admiration of this triumph of illumination lessened by consideration of the means whereby it was obtained. Nothing more elaborate was employed than a tiny earthen saucer, a rude cotton wire and a few drops of coconut oil. What a comment upon our mechanical development, when with this primitive means a decorative effect can be secured in a suitable environment, yielding nothing to the costly splendours of the West. In the suite room to the banqueting hall the Maharana awaited His Royal guests, and on arrival conducted them to chairs of state. After a few minutes' conversation the Prince led the way into the hall and the reception room of the morning, whose bizarre modernity jars after the beauty of the exterior of the palace building.

You cannot reconcile glass electroliers and Bombay furniture with Udaipur city of sunrise. His Royal Highness had on his right the Countess of Shaftesbury, on his left Mrs. Colvin, opposite sat Her Royal Highness with Sir Water Lawrence on her right and the Hon'ble Mr. Colvin on her left. After dinner His Highness the Maharana joined his guests and sat next to His Royal Highness. The health of His Majesty the King-Emperor having been proposed by the Maharana and loyally honoured, His Highness rose, and as he speaks no English, Major Pinhey, standing opposite him, read the following literal translation of his speech:—

I am very pleased that Their Royal Highnesses have taken so much trouble as to visit my capital. I cannot express the pleasure it has given me to meet Their Royal Highnesses. Though this is not the first occasion on which a member of the Royal family has visited the place, yet it is certainly the first time that a Prince of Wales, accompanied by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, has come here. What has afforded me greater pleasure than ever is that while on the last occasion when His Imperial Majesty, then Prince of Wales, visited India, he was unable to visit my capital, owing to there being no railway to it which was a matter of great regret. On this occasion Udaipur being connected by a railway Their Royal Highnesses have arrived here without difficulty, and removed the regret that was felt on the previous occasion. The British Government has always shown great consideration to this state and taken great interest in its well-being and prosperity. Colonel Tod's coming to Mewar in 1818 A.D., bringing peace, safety and prosperity with him and the everlasting treaty entered into with the British Government, which led to the prosperity of Mewar, will never be forgotten by me and the state. This state has always been loyal to Government and will always remain so. I assure Your Royal Highness and through Your Royal Highnesses His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor of my everlasting friendship. I now request you all to drink to the health, long life and prosperity of our Royal guests, and to pray to God that our Royal guests may return to their home safely after a pleasant tour in India.

His Royal Highness's reply was singularly graceful and felicitous. His references to the Rajput loyalty and Rajput chivalry touched a chord which will find a response in every Rajput heart.

Maharana Sahib, on behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself I thank you with all my heart for the charming manner in which you have proposed our healths. We are both delighted that our first visit as the guests of an Indian Prince should have been to your beautiful capital. All India is still somewhat strange to us, but in Meywar we are truly in a new world, and from the moment when we arrived in your State this morning to this hour one charming impression has been quickly followed by another. We have heard much of the Rajputs, and I have had the pleasure of meeting those of other clans in England, but to realise the splendid traditions of chivalry, freedom and courtesy, which are the proud possession of the Rajput, one must see him in his own home, and for the Princess and myself I say in all sincerity, that all we have heard and read in the praise of Rajputana is dwarfed by what we have seen in one short day. It would be almost superfluous to say to those present this evening about the noble reputation which Your Highness has won for yourself in Rajputana and in India, for they have all enjoyed the pleasure and the privilege experienced by the Princess and myself today of seeing and conversing with the famous Chief of the Sisodia whose great traditions are grandly maintained from what we see in our host. In conclusion I must convey to you the King-Emperor's message of kindness and goodwill. He could not come to Udaipur. The Princess and I, as Your Highness has pointed out, are more fortunate, and thanks to the railway enterprise of the Maharana we have been able to reach this old-world city in the East in comfort

I now ask you ladies and gentlemen to drink to the long-life and happiness of His Highness the Maharana of Udaipur. An adjournment was now made to the flat roof of the new wing of the palace to witness the fireworks. Although extraordinary iridescent effects were produced by the reflection of the set pieces on the lake, many would have been better content to watch the undimmed illuminations. After being garlanded by His Highness, some returned to camp by water, others by road, and not the least vivid picture of a memorable day was the sight of the illuminated streets, hazy with dust and dense packed with a chattering animated throng.

Sunday was a complete day of rest. Their Royal Highnesses attended divine service at the familiar little Mission Church in the morning. Then in the early afternoon they took boat and rowed to the island palace of Jag Mandar in the middle of the lake, dear to the memory of all Englishmen because it was here that a small band of their countrymen found refuge in the darkest days of the Mutiny. There under the grateful shade of the arcade, commanding a view of the palace, tea was served. Afterwards a very short row led to the Khas Oodi, the quaint little tower where night and morning the wild pigs are fed. The tradition of the town is that the Khas Oodi is two centuries old, and that from it the jungle swine have been fed for the whole of that period. Without subscribing to that tradition it is a fact that the practice goes back much further than the memory of any living in Udaipur and the present Maharana favours it sufficiently largely to extend the daily rations. Some hundreds of pigs were gathered on the rough ground at the foot of the tower and liberally fed with maize. A large tiger and subsequently a big captive boar were afterwards permitted to roam in the arena at the foot of the tower, but it was more interesting to turn from this tame performance to watch the never fading beauties of the palace buildings, lit by the glow of the setting sun. The Maharana who personally introduced His Royal guests to this curious place, bade them good-bye at the Khas Oodi. Their Royal Highnesses drove back and most of the guests returned by boat to dine quietly at the Residency in the evening.

Englishman.—We understand that the Prince of Wales will probably receive both the Tongsa Penlop and the Tashi-Lama at Hastings House, which will most likely take place on the afternoon of the 5th January. We have already announced that fact that His Royal Highness would return the visit of the Maharaja of the Sikkim on that day.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—There is no truth in the report which has got about to the effect that the purdah party to be given by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and Lady Fraser in connection with the Royal visit to Calcutta is to be abandoned. Invitations are now being issued and elaborate arrangements made, a separate camp being pitched for the male relations of the ladies attending.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—When in Bombay, Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales was invited to a purdah party, and the function, which was attended by a large number of Indian ladies, was a great success. It is now proposed to give a similar party at Belvedere, the Calcutta residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, but the Bengalis stand aghast at the idea, for we are told that the proposal "has been received with so much indignation by the educated classes of our fellow-countrymen that even the Brahmins, who do not observe the purdah, are as firmly opposed to it as are the Hindus and the Mahomedans." Several guardians have "refused point blank to send their wards," as "the very idea of sending their womankind to Belvedere, or Government House for the matter of that, is repugnant to their notion of the fitness of things."

Standard.—The Prince and Princess of Wales are spending the whole of this week in Rajputana, the region, to quote Sir Alfred Lyall's "Asiatic Studies," within which pure-blooded Rajput clans have maintained their independence under their own chieftains, and have, in some instances, kept together their primitive societies, ever since the dominion of the Rajputs over the great plains of north-western India was overthrown by Mahomedan invaders. Much of Rajputana is a desert, but the romantic scenery of the Aravalli Hills, the architectural elegance of many of the chief cities, the mountain forts, that often stood a siege of a year and longer till the garrison, in a last desperate sally, came out to die gloriously, and above all, the history of a gallant and noble race, which may be read in Colonel James Tod's "Annals of Rajasthan," will give this part of the Royal tour a particular interest. There is not a petty State in Rajasthan, says Tod, that has not its Thermopylae, and scarcely a city which has not produced its Leonidas.

Standard.—On their arrival here (Udaipur) yesterday, the Prince and Princess of Wales were introduced to another scene of interest, and one not easily witnessed outside Rajputana, where so much mediæval feudalism lingers, untouched by the modern spirit.

The Maharana of Udaipur, first in rank of the Chiefs of Rajputana, represents a line of Chiefs whose history is traced to mythical ages, and who, in later times, have been connected with the most romantic chapters in the annals of India. The family boasts that it never gave a daughter in marriage to any Mahomedan Emperor. It was after the third capture of their old capital, Chitor, by the armies of Moghul, that Rana Udai Singh founded the picturesque city of Udaipur, in the loveliest valley of the Aravalli Hills.

This dignified Prince, whose name is revered all over India, determined to give the Shahzada a characteristic reception, and called upon his lieges to second him. The barons and knights of the principality came down from the capital, attended and attired as befits a Rajput and a gentleman.

As the Prince and Princess emerged from the station, they might have thought that the Middle Ages lived again. Mounted on Arabs and fiery stallions of the country, Rajput chivalry lined the road. Here were figures glittering in flexible scale armour; there were Lanciers; whilst others still wore the round Moorish helmet of hammered steel, and gold-inlaid, with chain mail over their shoulders, and were armed with curved scimitars. Their retainers wore buff jerkins, and carried long matchlocks, whilst there were also a few Bhils, armed with the primitive bow and arrows. The Maharana's infantry wore red coats, and were armed with Enfield rifles. The words of command were given in English, with a native accent.

Later the Maharana received the Prince at his palace, in a long darbar room, upholstered in the Victorian style. The nobles again assembled, this time in festal dresses of gleaming silks and jewels. One boy proudly bore the sword conferred by the Indian Government on his grandfather for succouring English refugees during the Mutiny; the others were either stalwart young squires, or grizzled veterans. All offered the Prince nazar in token of fealty.

The Prince and Princess of Wales and the other guests were conveyed to the palace in boats. It was not the least exquisite episode of a delightful day, this row across the dark lakes, out of which the luminous islands rose like floating castles of flame, while the mysterious silence of the shadowy waters contrasted with the strange noises of the unseen chattering crowd lining the roads, the walls, and the bastions.

In the evening the Maharana, whose hospitality is of the genuine old-world kind, gave a grand banquet at the Palace, while the lake was illuminated, and an elaborate display of fireworks took place. The Maharana was, of course, unable to dine with his guests, but entered afterwards, and proposed the health of his Royal visitors. The Prince, in happy terms, expressed his gratification at making the acquaintance of the brave and generous Rajputs and his appreciation of the beauty of the Sesodia capital. The Maharana courteously gave his guests, including the Prince, attâr and pân, and suspended round their necks, according to ancient custom, garlands of gold thread, with little balls of coloured silk.

The sentiments felicitously expressed by the Prince as to the beauty of Udaipur are shared by all visitors to the "city of the sunrise," which may fairly claim to be the most picturesque capital in India. The summer palace, rising from an island in the beautiful lake, is a vision of fairyland. The great temple of Jagarnath, the houses of Rajput nobles, the battlemented walls, the imposing palace—built of granite and marble—in which the Maharana usually resides, the castellated heights commanding the roads to the city, the cenotaphs of bygone Ranas, the fortified hill of Eklingarh, the quaint bazaars, the mountains in the near distance—the view on every side is enchanting.

If it was lovely in the daylight, it was still more fascinating at night in its garb of illuminations, in which the palace, the bridges, the distant forts, the cupolas, minarets, marble terraces, and islands were outlined with fire. This effect was not produced by electricity, with its hard, cold, steely brightness, but myriads of the common native buti, the true light of Asia, just cotton wick in a saucer of oil. The effect is a soft golden glow, a throbbing, lambent light pouring along the edges of the buildings in thin cascades, a liquid radiance of fire, making the fireworks, rockets, and coloured fires almost garish in comparison. The scene possessed a beauty not seen anywhere on earth except at Udaipur, and not often there.

Times.—Nowhere else in India can Their Royal Highnesses witness a more striking spectacle than at Udaipur. I need not dwell upon the reception yesterday at the station, where the Maharana, a conspicuously simple figure in white with a few jewels, received Their Royal Highnesses at the head of a gorgeous group of high officials and Sardars in state with a guard-of-honour clad in medieval coat-of-mail. The real sight was the crowded streets, roofs, windows, temples, steps, and cornices alive with the kaleidoscopic dresses of men, women, and children, the dark red tone of the women's dresses setting off the yellows, greens, and pinks of the male attire, while the gleaming white walls formed a radiant background to this orgy of colour.

The Maharana's reception and entertainment of Their Royal Highnesses were marked by the graceful, dignified courtesy for which the Solar House has long been famed. As the Prince happily put it in replying to the toast at the banquet, the Royal party are in a new world. Not only was the panorama of the island-studded lake, battlements, palaces, and temples rising up from the water's edge supremely beautiful in the glowing sunlight; not only at night did the massive pile of the Shimbu Niwa's palace, here towering sheer, there rising in colonnaded terraces above the lake, present a truly fairy-like scene, when every detail of the city walls, bathing ghats, domed temples, etc., was reflected across the waters, whilst responsive bonfires gleamed on the surrounding hilltops, but the whole atmosphere of the place was steeped in romance. The King was unable to visit Udaipur, as there was no railway 30 years ago, and every Rajput is now bent upon giving the Heir-Apparent on his first visit to the premier Rajput State a welcome worthy of Rajputana's inherited traditions of loyalty and chivalry.

For an ancient historic interest, as well as in its later association with the growth of British power in India, Rajputana stands pre-eminent in the golden book of our Indian Empire.

By no mere flight of rhetoric has Rajputana been invested with its classic title of Rajasthana—"the abode of Princes." For it has been throughout the ages essentially the Royal home of Indian chivalry, and, amongst all the Rajput States, this small State of Udaipur—or, more correctly, Mewar—with an area of little more than 12,000 square miles and less than one and a half million inhabitants, has stood foremost for all that is noblest and most picturesque in the national traditions of Hindustan. The great Dravidian temples of Southern India alone recall the existence of non-Aryan kingdoms which once flourished south of the Kistna. Imperial Delhi may yet disclose some relics of the Mahabharata under the ruins of Indrapat, but its name will always remain chiefly associated with the successive triumphs of Central Asian invaders, alien alike in blood and in creed to the people of India. Haidarabad, politically the premier State amongst the feudatories of the British raj, is itself but a legacy of Mahomedan ascendancy. The Mahrattas are, it is true, Hindus both in race and in religion, but, like the Sikhs, who, moreover, broke away from Hinduism before they threw off the yoke of Delhi, they sprang to power only on the ruins of the Moghul Empire. The Rajputs alone to-day possess an unbroken record of political and racial pre-eminence which stretches back to the legendary era of Indian history. They are, in fact, more than a race. They are a caste—the premier military caste of Hindustan—heaven-born—claiming descent, some from the sun, and others from the moon, or others, again, sprung from the Sacred Fire, in response to the prayers of the Brahmins, to repel the assault of demon hosts on the hallowed groves of Mount Abu, the Holy Mountain of Rajputana.

As a caste, the Rajputs are by no means confined to the great plateaus of Western Central India, where, astride of the Aravalli Mountains, they have from time immemorial held sway over desert and highland from the middle reaches of the Indus down almost to the Nerbudda. The last census shows them to be spread in considerable numbers, over the greater part of India, whilst most of the chief ruling families, even in distant regions as far removed from Rajputana as Nepal and Mysore, pride themselves on their descent from one or other of the heaven-born Rajput lines.

Amongst this great Hindu aristocracy—an aristocracy of deeds as well as of birth—none holds so high a place as the present ruler of Mewar—His Highness the Maharana of Udaipur, the "Sun of the Hindus" and Chief of the Sesodia clan of the Solar Rajputs. No family in India, and few in the whole world, can show a history so full of noble romance and splendid vicissitudes. One need not altogether follow Colonel Tod, who in his invaluable "Annals of Rajasthan" traced back the Sesodia pedigree even beyond Rama, the hero of the Ramayana, though in the legends he collected concerning some of the early heroes of the Solar house, miraculously brought up in mountain caves and primeval forests for the salvation of their race, it might be interesting to note a few features curiously reminiscent of the Nibelungen hero in the first and second acts of Siegfried. Like Siegfried, Goha was born in a cave and reared under the protection of the "children of the forest," who taught him to rule over woods and mountains, whilst a few generations later Bappa, again like Siegfried, received from the hands of a protecting deity in the secluded valleys of Nagindra a panoply of celestial workmanship and a double-edged sword as potent as Nothung, with which he won his way to the throne of Chitor.

It is with Bappa, whose long reign covered the period of our earliest Saxon Kings down to and including Alfred, that the chronicles of Mewar emerge from the domain of legend into that of history. Whilst its opening years coincide with the crushing defeat inflicted by Charles Martel at Tours on the Mahomedan Crescent in Southern Europe, they coincide also with the first appearance of that same emblem of Islamic conquest in India. Whilst the Western Caliphate was being hurled back across the Pyrenees, the Eastern Caliphate was making good its foothold in Sind. Henceforth for eight whole centuries it fell to the lot of Mewar to be the standard-bearer of Hinduism in its repeated struggles against the Mussulman invader—Arab and Turk, Pathan and Mogul, in succession. Primus inter pares, the ruler of Mewar time after time rallied Princes of Rajputana to the flag which bears as its emblem "the Sun in its splendour"—a splendour undimmed even in defeat.

Memories of those Titanic struggles must not, however, be sought amidst the marble halls and floating palaces of Udaipur, but in the stately ruins of the ancient capital, some 40 miles away, which still crown the scarp of Chitor. From the cumbrous pages of Tod, Kipling has transferred the essence of the story into his "Letters of Marque"—a story of which, in the annals of Asia, the like might perhaps be found in the heroic period of Japanese feudalism, but certainly nowhere else, and in Japan it was never, as in Rajputana, the clash of contending races and creeds, but only of great rival clans fighting for supremacy. By the sin of the sack of Chitor is still one of the most solemn of Rajput oaths. The first of the three famous "sacks" of Chitor goes back to 1303, when the far-famed beauty of the fair Pudmini, the Rajput Princess of Ceylon, whom the ruler of Mewar had wedded, fire the desired of the Pathan Emperor Ala-ud-din. In vain were 11 of the 12 sons of the Solar house sacrificed to Kali, the awful goddess to whom Chitor was sacred, in vain did the flower of Rajput chivalry, clad in the saffron-coloured robes which meant death or victory hurl themselves on the besiegers. Chitor fell but the conquerors were balked of the most coveted part of their prey. All who were young or fair amongst the women of Chitor, to the number, according to Tod, of several thousands, retired to a great subterranean chamber, the beautiful Pudmini herself closing the procession. There the funeral pyres were kindled, and, when all hope was lost, the heroic daughters of Rajputana consigned themselves to the flames. Again two centuries later Chitor witnessed another such tragedy on an ever greater scale. It was Bohadur Shah, a King of Gujarat, who in his time headed the Moslem invaders. The Rana's mother herself headed a forlorn hope and was slain, and while the men of Mewar, arrayed in the fatal saffron, sought death sword in hand among the serried ranks of the assailants, their wives and daughters, thirteen thousand in number, followed them, according to the consecrated phrase, "through the flames." Once more Chitor rose from the ashes, but only to fall once more in 1568 before the mighty Akbar in a last terrific rush of saffron-coloured hosts, in a last wholesale johur of female self-immolation.

Another fifty years of relentless warfare followed before the house of Sesodia, exhausted by centuries of indomitable conflict, was compelled—the last amongst the great houses of Rajputana—to bend the knee before the conquering Mogul. Jehanghir, who himself the son of a Rajput mother had already taken a Rajput Princess to wife, then sat on the Throne of Delhi, and a British envoy, Sir Thomas Roe, witnessed the extraordinary honours paid to the young Rajput Prince whom the ill-fated Umra Sing had deputed to pay homage on his behalf to the conqueror. But even when the Mewar had come to yield loyal allegiance to the rulers of Delhi, its Princes stubbornly refused to follow the example of other Rajput houses which had given their daughters in wedlock to Mogul Emperors, and the blood of that Solar race was never defiled by marriage with the hated infidel, or even, until they were "purified," with those of a kindred stock that had submitted to such defilement. Nevertheless, had Aurangzeb pursued the wise and liberal policy of his fathers, Mewar would have doubtless continued to deserve the title awarded to the Rajput Princes of "pillar and prop of the Empire."

It was mainly during the period of relative peace which prevailed under Jehanghir and Shah Jehan that the present capital of Mewar arose in its unrivalled beauty on the shores of a lovely hillgirt lake, facing the rugged heights of Eklinggurh, where is enshrined the family deity of the house of Sesodia. Palaces of white marble and pillared terraces of white marble, on which the daintiest of hanging gardens are suspended, reared their lofty walls above the lake, and in the middle of the lake itself islands of white marble with fretted arcades and summerhouses of white marble floated up out of its blue waters—a vision to-day still of almost sensuous loveliness when seen in the pink flush of sun rise or in the golden glory of an Indian sunset. There might even seem to be in the luxurious, albeit refined, magnificence of Udaipur something almost incongruous with the stern spirit of an essentially martial race. But Udaipur too can boast memories not unworthy of the more heroic ages of Mewar. It was in the Gul Mahar, on one of those enchanted islands, that Prince Khurum was allowed to take sanctuary after he had risen in revolt against his father, the Emperor Jehanghir. It was there that in 1857 the present Maharana's father gave shelter to the refugee ladies from Neemuch during the Mutiny. It is from the inner Tripalia of the Palace through the great gate containing the Royal drums that Rana Sangram, the Lion of Battle, issued forth to regain the independence of Mewar at the sword's point from the degenerate descendants of Jehanghir. It is behind the windowless walls of the Palace zenana that just a century ago the unfortunate Princess Kistna drained off the poisoned cup in order to end the dispute between her rival suitors which threatened to plunge Mewar once more into disastrous warfare with the Mahrattas. Her sacrifice, however, was of little avail. Rajputana had been bleeding well-nigh to death in its long struggle against Delhi, and, rent by internal feuds, it was no longer fit to cope with the new Mahratta power which had arisen in the south during the disruption of the Mogul Empire.

It seemed as if Mewar had, in fact, only thrown off the Mogul yoke to fall under the still more galling yoke of the Mahrattas, when a yet greater power sprang to its rescue. The British raj stepped in to save Rajputana from dismemberment. On January 16th, 1818, a treaty was signed by which the house of Sesodia recognized British supremacy, and under the protection of the British raj maintained the foremost rank which it still occupies amongst the Rajput feudatories of the British Empire. Tod relates at full length the entry of the first British mission, a few days later, into the capital of Mewar amidst Rajput shouts of Jy! jy Frenggyka Raj, "Victory, victory to the English government." For nearly a century, in peace and in war, the States of Rajputana have given loyal service to their British protectors in return for the paz Britannica secured to them by the Paramount Power, and the Royal kettle-drums have rolled out since then to no such stirring scene in the romantic history of Mewar. But the enthusiastic reception which Udaipur has given to the Heir-Apparent of the Indian Empire shows that a century of British overlordship has not weakened the confidence with which the forebears of the present Maharana welcomed in the establishment of British paramountcy the assurance of a sachha Raj—an "upright rule"—the proud epithet applied by them from the beginning to the British Government in the East.

Times of India.—Preparations for the Royal visit continue, and it is already rumoured that a large garden party will be held. The weather, at present, is the chief cause of anxiety; rain is badly wanted to lay the dust and refresh the newly planted trees and grass both in Cantonments and at the Khanna Camp. The scarcity of water has, says the Civil and Military Gazette, long been a grievance in Rawalpindi, and to this unhappy cause is attributed the worn-out condition of the polo grounds, and possibly the failure of the Gymkhana which was arranged for the 11th instant. Men like good and soft ground for good and expensive ponies. Pressure of work may also have something to do with the insufficient number of entries at the Gymkhana, for our pretty, well kept Mall is crowded with staff and other officers galloping to and fro, superintending and arranging for the incoming troops.

It is rumoured that Their Royal Highnesses will be invited to witness a night attack and a torchlight tattoo, both of which will be charming and effective spectacles, at least from an onlooker's point of view.

One of the most effective spectacular arrangements in connection with the Royal visit to Madras, provided it is approved by Their Royal Highnesses, will be, says the Madras Mail, the illumination of the surf near the Marina. A similar display took place on the occasion of the Royal visit in 1875, but then the side chosen was just south of the Harbour, which is now a wide sand accretion. The Reception Committee has proposed that this should take place on the night of Saturday, the 27th January, but nothing has been definitely arranged yet. The central point of vantage for viewing this spectacle will be the P. W. D. Secretariat at Chepauk, and it will be there probably, in the verandahs or on the roof of the building, that the Royal visitors will be accommodated.

21ST NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—We have already published an official communiqué giving a general outline of the arrangements made for the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Lahore, which will extend from the afternoon of Tuesday, the 28th November, until the night of Friday, 1st December. It is here proposed to give a general idea of the scheme of the decorations and illuminations along the routes to be followed by Their Royal Highnesses in fulfilling their various engagements during the four days' visit.

On the occasion of the visit of His Royal Highness the late Duke of Clarence in 1889 the Provincial Government undertook to defray a portion of the expense connected with the decoration of the capital, but it has been felt that the visit of the Heir to the Throne offers a unique opportunity for a display of loyalty by the general public, and beyond the adornment by Government of public offices and buildings in accordance with the general scheme, the decoration of streets and private buildings has been left to private enterprise and loyalty assisted by a grant from the Municipality.

It will be remembered that in the hot weather a committee was appointed to prepare a scheme of decorations and illuminations, and to prepare estimates of the cost, and at a public meeting held at the Lawrence Hall, on the 14th October, a large and representative General Committee was appointed to confer with, and to sanction the work of, the Executive Committee. These Committees have done a large amount of work, and the execution of the schemes is now well in hand. It must be understood, however, that the information now given is liable to alteration in detail, and any changes that will be made will be duly notified from time to time. It has been calculated that the cost of the decorations and illuminations, apart from those on Government buildings, private houses, business premises, etc., will be about Rs. 35,000, and to this sum the Municipality contribute Rs. 10,000, leaving rather more than Rs. 25,000 to be raised by subscription.

All roads traversed by Their Royal Highnesses during their stay will be decorated, and the roads along which they pass for evening entertainments will be profusely illuminated. The general scheme of road decoration may be judged from that of the route taken by Their Royal Highnesses on the day of their arrival. This involves a drive over $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, via Landa Bazaar, and the Circular Road to the Fort Parade ground, thence past the Government College, through the Anarkali Gardens, and up the Mall, to Government House. Along either side of the whole route Venetian masts, 25 feet high, will be erected at distances of 50 feet apart, four poles, 12 ft. high, being erected between each pair of Venetian masts. These poles will be covered with bunting and greenery, and will be connected with each other and with the Venetian masts by strings of small flags and banners. The Venetian mast will be ornamented with shields in various devices and with suitable inscriptions. A large number of Japanese lanterns and paper chains of native design will add to the decorative effect. It is intended also to hang among the trees en route a number of large flags, and to erect triumphal arches at various points.

This scheme of decorations will also be carried out on the other day-light routes to be followed by the Prince and Princess of Wales during their visit. The visit to the Lady Aitchison Hospital will be via Abbot, Nisbet, and Hospital Roads, a distance of about 2 miles, and that to the Aitchison College will of course be along the Mall, and the only other route to be traversed by Their Royal Highnesses during the day-time will be that via Race Course Road and Jail Road to the Ichra plain, on the occasion of the parade of the Imperial Service Troops on Friday, 1st December.

There will be in all eight triumphal arches along the route between the Railway Station and the Mall. One will be erected outside the Delhi Gate, at the end of the Landa Bazaar, a second near the Yakki Gate, and a third on the Circular Road, near the Cotton Factory. A fourth will be at the entrance to the Chiefs' camp and a fifth at the exit. There will be one near Mela Ram's Factory, another near the Anarkali Gardens by the entrance to Government College, while the last will be at the beginning of the Mall opposite Commercial Buildings. The arches will be of three kinds. Those at the beginning of the Mall and at the entrance to the Chiefs' camp will be architectural in design, substantially built of wood, and will probably be coloured in imitation of stone, or marble. Those on the Landa Bazaar, near the Cotton Factory and at Mela Ram's, will also be somewhat architectural in design, but built up of bamboos and covered with foliage. The other three will be decorative designs composed of coats of arms, mottoes, etc. The whole of the arches will, of course, be ornamented with bunting, Prince of Wales' Feathers, etc.

As already announced a limited amount of accommodation will be reserved at the railway station to enable ladies to witness the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses. The Royal procession will leave at once for the Chiefs' camp where a stand will be prepared for the accommodation of about 300 ladies opposite the Raja of Kapurthala's camp. The Chiefs of the following States will be in camp, commencing from the point at which Their Royal Highnesses will approach:—Suket, Chamba, Faridkot, Maler Kotla, Mandi, Kapurthala, Nabha, Jhind, Bhawalpur, and Patiala. Darbaris to the number of 130 will be drawn up on the part of the Fort Parade Ground between the Patiala and Kapurthala camps, and Their Royal Highnesses' cortege will proceed at a walking pace between the Chiefs on one side and the Darbaris on the other. It will not be possible for those who have been at the station to reach the camp before the arrival of the Royal procession, and those who wish to see anything more of the proceedings are advised to drive direct from the station to the Anarkali Gardens, where the Police Band will play a selection of music prior to the arrival of the Royal party. Those who go to the stand at the Chiefs' camp will be able to leave before the Royal party, and by driving through the City via the Roshmia and Bhati Gates, will be in time to witness the presentation of the Municipal address at the Anarkali Gardens, where reserved accommodation for about 300 ladies will be provided by the flower stand, immediately in front of which the address will be presented. Applications for tickets for both these stands should be made to Mr. Darling, Assistant Commissioner.

There are over 9,000 school-children in Lahore to whom the visit of Their Royal Highnesses will be a red-letter day for the rest of their lives, and it was at first proposed to erect stands for them along the route to be taken by the Royal procession on November 28th. It was, however, found impossible to do this, but locations will be reserved for their accommodation along the route, and the Committee has made a liberal provision for the supply of sweetmeats as a treat to the children.

Though it may be anticipated that many private residents and commercial houses will display their loyalty by illuminating their premises during the Royal visit, the Committee and the public are mainly concerned with the illumination of the route from Government House to Shalimar Gardens via Empress Road, the railway level crossing in Victoria Road and the Shalimar Road, and that of the gardens themselves, this forming one of the chief features of the entertainment to be offered to Their Royal Highnesses. The general scheme of the road illuminations is as follows: It is intended to erect bullas 16 to 18 feet high. These bullas will be put at the rate of 40 to the mile on either side of the road, making 320 in all. From the top of each bulla will be suspended a self-contained acetylene lamp, cross-pieces will be nailed at right angles to the bullas, and on these Vauxhall lamps of various colours will be suspended. There will be 3,000 of these lamps, and some 4,000 Handy-Andy lanterns of varying colours will be suspended from trees and from some 400 smaller bullas to be erected at intervals along the road. It is hoped that all owners and occupiers of private buildings along the route will arrange for their illumination, and the Railway Company will undertake the illumination of the railway offices, railway theatre and railway buildings generally. The Committee, while unable to share in the decorating or illuminating private buildings, are willing to lend chirags for the latter purpose.

The general arrangements for the illumination of the famous Shalimar Gardens have been committed to the care and oversight of M. Amin-ud-din of Baghbanpura, who undertook a similar task when Lord Elgin visited the gardens eleven years ago. The scheme of illumination will very properly be Oriental in character, and some 50,000 chirags and 500 Padella lights will be employed in lighting up the gardens. These will be employed on the front and side wall ramparts. The banks of the canal and its two branches running through the centre of the gardens will be picked out in patterns through the entire length, as well as the sides of the large tank. In the building at the far end of the canal it is proposed to exhibit a transparency of the Union Jack and the Prince of Wales' Feathers. The entrance porch will be a blaze of light alike on both sides and in the interior. There are, as is well-known, five baradaris on the four sides of the large tank. Naturally the Royal party will occupy the principal building, and the exterior of this will be illuminated with coloured lights and will bear a design "Welcome." The two baradaris in front and those on either side will be picked out in coloured lights—two in green and two in red. Floating on the tank will be the crest and motto of His Royal Highness—the Prince of Wales' plumes and the motto "Ich Dien"—carried out in a decorative scheme of coloured lights. There will be a small display of selected native fireworks, including a figure resembling the Ravens which usually are let off at the Dasehra. The trees in the garden and skirting the canal will be lit with Chinese lanterns. The Committee have undoubtedly done right in deciding that a characteristically Eastern scene shall be treated in Oriental style, and the scene at Shalimar should be beautiful and picturesque in the extreme.

The band of the 12th Royal Lancers will play at Shalimar, but the entertainment will be a brief one, and it is not proposed to provide refreshments for the public. Only 1,000 persons will be admitted to the gardens, and it has been decided that tickets shall be issued to 600 Indians and 400 Europeans, preference being given in the case of Indian residents of Lahore to the largest subscribers. As already announced tickets will be issued only to subscribers who have paid up their subscriptions by the 24th November. Subscribers will be allowed to introduce a reasonable number of relatives and friends, but will need to state the number in applying for tickets.

It was originally proposed to have a firework display at Shalimar, but on mature consideration it was decided that the occasion was scarcely suitable for such a large display as was at first contemplated. Arrangements have now been made for the fireworks to be let off by the Volunteer Parade ground at dusk on December 1st, i.e., after the garden party at Government House. A small enclosure to witness the display will be specially reserved for ticket-holders, who as in other cases will be subscribers only, and as in the case of Shalimar application for these tickets should be made to Mr. Darling, Assistant Commissioner.

The road from Government House to the station will be illuminated a second time on the occasion of Their Royal Highnesses' departure on the night of Friday, 1st December, and of course the Lawrence and Montgomery Halls will be illuminated on both the occasions when visits are paid in the evening by the Royal party—the reception of native gentlemen on the 28th November, and the ball given in honour of the Royal visitors by the British residents of the Province on the 30th November. As all residents of Lahore are aware the halls have been more or less in the hands of the builders and decorators ever since the earthquake in April last, and the work is now practically completed. The re-decoration of the Montgomery Hall has been carried out under the direction of Mr. Percy Brown, Principal of the Mayo School of Art, and it is extremely successful, giving the hall a much brighter and more handsome appearance than it had before. The decoration has been executed in oil-paint, in blue, white, and buff. The design is in keeping with the style of the building, which is mainly classic, the Greek honeysuckle, festoons, etc., being the chief elements. The arched ceiling, which is panelled, has been covered with a symmetrical pattern of scrolls, rosettes and Greek honeysuckle in blue and buff. The spandrels of the arches have been decorated with a floral wreath and ribbons in the same colours, and the windows and doors picked out and outlined in a delicate blue. The staircase has been treated in the same way: parts of it having been boxed in wood to cover up the ugly iron construction, and stencilled with foliated festoons in blue on a buff ground. The large pilasters have also been picked out in blue. A new dancing floor has been laid in the Lawrence Hall, and on the occasion of the ball both halls will be used for dancing, separate string bands providing the music.

Daily Express.—Among the interesting personages whom the Prince and Princess of Wales will meet in the course of their tour through India none presents a more engrossing study than the woman ruler of the State of Bhopal, Nawab Sultan Jehan Begum. The Begum is a daughter and a granddaughter of a Begum, and between them these three women have ruled party. Those who go to the stand at the Chiefs' camp will be able to leave before the Royal party, and by driving through the City via the Roshnia and Bhati Gates, will be in time to witness the presentation of the Municipal address at the Anarkali Gardens, where reserved accommodation for about 300 ladies will be provided by the flower stand, immediately in front of which the address will be presented. Daily Express.—Among the interesting personages with the Prince and Princess of Wales will meet in the course of their tour through India none presents a more engrossing study than the woman ruler of the State of Bhopal, Nawab Sultan Jehan Begum. The Begum is a daughter and a granddaughter of a Begum, and between them these three women have ruled the destinies of a State comprising nearly seven thousand square miles of territory and a population of a million people for the past sixty years.

The mother of the present ruler descended from the famous Dost Muhammad Khan, the founder of the Bhopal Dynasty. She succeeded in 1868, in which year she sent to Queen Victoria a quaint letter acknowledging Her Majesty's kindness in accepting the dedication of a book written by the Begum's mother, the enlightened Sikandar, describing her pilgrimage to Mecca.

The letter was as follows :—

"My dear friend,—I have indeed occasion to express my gratitude on learning that Her Gracious Majesty has been pleased to accept the dedication to herself of the book of travels in Arabia written by the Nawab Sikandar Begum, who is now in Paradise. The intelligence has given me, your friend, infinite pleasure, and had the late Nawab Begum in her lifetime heard the good news, she would assuredly have testified her extreme gratification by declaring that she considered this honour one of the highest she ever received. The great Creator of heaven and earth has called Her Majesty to the Empire of Hindustan, and for this act of His good providence I render Him my heartfelt thanks. Under Her Majesty's equitable rule crime has been repressed, more especially that of infanticide: the ruler, in common with her subjects, enjoys peace and comfort and the Empire at large flourishes in undisturbed tranquillity. My earnest prayer to Almighty God is that I may be enabled to show my unswerving allegiance to Her Majesty, who is a great appreciator of men and the Fountain of Honour; and that my descendants may merit, as their ancestors did, the favour of the British Government and be considered the most faithful servants of the Crown.—Your sincere friend, Shah Jehan Begum."

The book in question is a most quaint record of a journey to Mecca, containing an appreciation of the characteristics of that place as seen and understood by an Indian lady. The Begum seems to have been particularly struck by the enormous quantities of food which the inhabitants of Mecca were able to consume. She records that they were in the habit of disposing of five or six pounds weight per head per day.

They appeared to thrive on it, however, for the Begum vouches for the fact that the average man was so abnormally strong that he thought nothing of carrying a weight of 960 pounds from the street to the top of a house. The Begum apparently took a great interest in building operations in Mecca, for she includes in her book a list of building materials, with their cost.

The loyalty to the British Government, which the present Begum's mother referred to in her letter to Queen Victoria, was strikingly exhibited by the famous Sikandar who ruled during the Mutiny.

At the height of the insurrection a deputation from her army gathered outside the palace and expressed a wish that the Begum would put herself at the head of her men and lead them on to Delhi to exterminate the infidel British. The Begum promised to do so, but during the night she, with a few faithful adherents, caused the whole army, consisting of about three thousand men all told, to be disarmed and all their weapons hidden. The following day she offered to lead them unarmed to Delhi, but the army thought better of it. This plucky act probably had a great influence on the trend of events and it undoubtedly saved the British residents at a neighbouring town from massacre.

Bhopal has always been one of the most friendly of the Indian States. So far back as 1778, when General Goddard marched across India, Bhopal was the only Indian power which showed itself friendly. In 1818 the British Government formed an alliance with Bhopal, guaranteeing to the Nawab the possession of the State.

The Shah Jehan Begum, the daughter of Sikandar, succeeded in 1868, and proved a most worthy follower of her mother. She threw aside the restrictions of the "purdah," which imposed the strictest seclusion upon Indian women, and was always accessible conducting business on her own initiative with the greatest vigour. M. Louis Rousselet, a French explorer, thus describes a meeting he had with her many years ago :—

"I had an appointment with Her Highness," he wrote, "and so I called at the palace, which is full of European treasures and luxuries. In the room into which I was ushered sat a little girl whom I took to be the daughter of one of the Court nobles, and was on the point of addressing her when she rose, and with a very stately inclination of her head said, "I am Shah Jehan," at the same time extending a tiny hand covered with jewels. When I had somewhat recovered from my confusion I noticed that, although of diminutive stature, she had a handsome intellectual face. She wore close-fitting pantaloons of gold brocade, embroidered jacket, and a muslin toque."

The present Begum still keeps up the restriction of the "purdah." When she was presented to the Prince of Wales at Indore she was crowned with gold, her face veiled behind a burqa of light blue, and her figure draped in blue of a deeper shade.

The reign of women in Bhopal is likely to cease with the death of the present Begum, for she has two sons and a daughter and the heir-apparent is the eldest son.

Daily Express.—If the Prince and Princess of Wales are as pleased with their visit to India as the teeming millions of that great dependency are to receive them, that visit has already been crowned with ample success. No one who has read the Prince's speeches can fail to note in them the true ring of genuine gratification at the splendour and the warmth of the reception that has been accorded to the Royal travellers. "Here we are truly in a new land," His Royal Highness said in the speech at the banquet at Udaipur; and paradoxical as the remark may appear, in view of the historic antiquity of the place where the durbur was held, it is not the less true. India is a strange land to most of us, prince or peasant; and their Royal Highnesses may well be lost in wonderment at the opulent glory of the scenes which are being, and which will be enacted all along the route which they are to travel. The gorgeous East is the home of rich colouring, of varied magnificence, of splendid ceremony; and the receptions which crowd the hours of the visitors are a revelation after the somewhat monotonous routine of Royal pageants at home. But what must be most striking in these stirring events is not so much the glittering pomp of the Orient; the Rajput chivalry, with their gold inlaid helmets and jewel-decked scimitars, worth a king's ransom; the long rows of caparisoned elephants, and the gleaming summer palaces, shining as in a fairy-land in these 'cities of sunrise.' The Rajput courtesy was to have been expected. Great traditions, grandly maintained, are, as the Prince gracefully said, the proud possession of Rajputana. The overwhelming element in the Royal progress is the intense and widespread enthusiasm of the people, the polyglot, caste-ridden, sub-divided races, who throng to every coign of vantage, coming in all kinds of gaily-coloured processions, in bullock wagons and afoot, from near and far, to pay a respectful tribute of homage to the representatives of the Emperor of all the Indies. Everywhere the Prince and Princess are greeted by vast concourses; everywhere their attention is engaged by a sea of upturned faces.

The Prince has made it an especial duty, wherever possible, to receive in personal audience the Ruling Chiefs of the districts through which he has passed, and in his efforts to introduce an element of personal relationship with the great houses of India he has been ably and gracefully seconded by the Princess.

The purdah, or reception by Her Royal Highness of native ladies, and the Princess's delicate allusion to the sisterhood of East and West, touched a chord that will vibrate in many an Indian home. Here is, perhaps, the greatest benefit which is to be expected from the Royal visit. It will bring home to the native mind in India, as perhaps nothing else could, the strength of the bond that unites the dominions of the King-Emperor. The people of India are accustomed to changes amongst the British rajahs, to the coming and going of the great Captains, the Commanders-in-Chief, and the Governors-General. But here they are reminded of something essentially permanent, a force that is behind all other changes of personal, a form that gives continuity for generation after generation to the task of administration. The spirit of the East, hearing the shorn priest drone, watches these things in dreamy apathy; the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales introduces a dramatic stir into the drowsy atmosphere, and brings home to the native mind a sudden perception of the great, growing, and progressive nation into which India is surely developing.

From another aspect the Royal visit cannot fail to be fraught with good. It will not only accustom the native mind to the idea that a permanent and a continuous effort is being made to place India on a footing that will enable it to develop safely along lines most appropriate to its circumstances; it will encourage also the men whom England has sent out to foster and to guide this movement. The men who rule India, from the Viceroy to the collectors and assistant collectors, scattered in far-off districts, remote from friends and from the amenities of civilised life, have tasks of great difficulty to perform. They perform them, often under every circumstance of discouragement, in a manner that is the pride of the whole race. To them the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is a reminder that their great work, often little understood or appreciated at the time, is now gratefully acknowledged by their fellow-countrymen at home. The Prince and Princess of Wales are visiting a great Dependency whose comparatively flourishing condition is largely the work of the patient and obscure civilians who have given the best of their lives to this great task. They have built the ford, and bridged the road, and established peace amongst the peoples of India. The Royal visit will inspire these men to go on with renewed vigour and inspiration in their life labour, in their endeavour to realise the great ideal set before them by Lord Curzon when he appealed to them "never to let their enthusiasm be soured, or their courage grow dim," as they keep their hand to the plough "in whose furrow the nations of the future are germinating and taking shape."

Englishman.—Their Royal Highnesses' last day in Udaipur was free from ceremony and official functions. In the morning, which was delightfully cool and fresh, His Royal Highness made his first acquaintance with the Indian jungle. It was originally proposed to arrange a shoot for duck and snipe on the Pichola Lake, but birds were so scarce that this had to be abandoned for a beat for larger game. This was not unproductive, and one chinkara, three hyenas, and four boar fell before His Royal Highness's rifle. The bag, however, was the least important part of the expedition. It served to introduce the Prince of Wales to Indian shooting conditions, more especially in the matter of light, which will stand him in good stead when he comes to tackle his first tiger at Jaipur. Nor must these shooting expeditions be measured in the light of mere hunting excursions. In the frank comradeship of the field and the unceremonious intercourse of the camp His Royal Highness will come to know more of the Indian Chiefs than in formal visits and public receptions, and as one of the main purposes of the Royal progress is to strengthen the personal link between the great feudatories and the Throne, these shooting parties constitute no mean factor in the programme which has been so cleverly drawn up. Whilst the Prince of Wales was in the jungle Her Royal Highness the Princess drove through Udaipur to visit some of the chief lions of the town. These included the palace, the beautiful palace gardens with their interesting zoological collection and the Jagdish temple. The day was one to crown the pleasant memories of Udaipur, for it was cooler than any since Their Royal Highnesses landed in India. In the late afternoon the Maharana called at the Residency to bid farewell to His Royal guests, who leave none but the happiest impressions behind them. Then quite quietly, to a salute from the guns of Eklingarh Fort, Their Royal Highnesses departed for Jaipur at half-past six o'clock.

The Maharana is the Chief of his State in deed as well as in name, and is virtually his own Dewan. His ways are not our ways. His ideas are not our ideas. Consequently, it is the fashion to call Udaipur backward and unprogressive, to sigh for the days when more modernised views will prevail. Well if Mewar is backward, its people look happy. They are not unprosperous. Such difficulties as the Maharana may have with his feudatories and his Bhils are arranged without scandal and without offence. Is not this enough? Is no part of India to be safe from the Moloch which we call progress? Unhappy the day if Mewar ever becomes the victim of the destroying influence of half-digested Western practice. The heir-apparent is more liberal-minded than his father. The best fate that can befall him is to find some sage counsellor to show him that progress is not necessarily associated with horse-racing and polo ponies, nor is enlightenment best revealed in motor boats and motor cars, in visits to Europe and Western notions; that touring amongst his own people, and leading them gently forward without destroying their racial habits and customs, manners and traditions, improving their material condition without disintegrating the basis of their social life, are the directions in which the enlightenment of an Indian Prince can best find scope.

And now let me pour out a modest libation to those who have dispensed the Maharana's hospitality with such rare skill and charm. Udaipur offers no facilities for the entertainment of such a large body of visitors, yet Their Royal Highnesses, and their suite, and all who accompanied them have been provided for with a completeness that left nothing lacking. For this our thanks are due to the Resident, Major Pinhey, to his colleague Mr. Horne and to Mr. Wakefield, whose consideration and courtesy knew no limits.

It was with a feeling of the keenest regret that every one bade farewell to Udaipur. For here we not only saw a beautiful city under idyllic conditions, but were vouchsafed a glimpse of the India that is fast passing away, the India of those dreams that vanished at the touch of the Occidentalised centres where the Anglo-Indian does most of his Eastern work. Here we met the virile survivals of the feudalism which knit the gallant Rajputs into a great fighting nation, and on the Royal progress from the station saw something of the manner and garb of the men who made the annals of Mewar the most heroic empire in the history of Hindustan. Nor has it lessened the pleasures of the visit to be the guests of a Prince, who corresponds so far as is possible in these placid days to our ideals of Rajput chivalry. So high in the social scale as to be above the social laws that bind lesser men, the Maharana of Udaipur yet chooses to lead a life of rare austerity. He is and always has been strictly monogamous, temperate almost to the point of asceticism and, while despising the meretricious sportsman's life, which has been the ruin of other Rajput States, he keeps in hard physical condition and is a splendid rifle shot. Scorning delights and living laborious days, he finds his work in the government of his State, his simple pleasures amongst his own people. At every State ceremony the spare dignified figure of the Maharana, his erect bearing, his refined features, have commanded unqualified respect, nor can any one doubt that if the times demanded it he would be all that is desired. The most pleasant episode of the visit was the evidence afforded that His Highness has not been without his rewards. At tea in the Jag Mandar Palace on Sunday afternoon the heir to the gadi was the object of the kindly interest of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Maharana's only son, a few years ago, was so weak that his strength, even his life, were despaired of. Now there is no reason why he should not have many happy years before him and he has been passed as fit for rule. In this blessing the Maharana must find compensation for the rubs of fortune none in high places are exempt from.

Indian Daily News.—This morning His Royal Highness, accompanied by His Highness the Maharana and a small party, made a shooting expedition in the jungle along the Pichola lake after wild pig and in the hope of securing a panther. During the forenoon the Princess of Wales visited a number of places of interest including the palace, the Jagdish temple and the hospital. The Royal party leave Udaipur this evening for Jaipur.

The first shoot of the Prince of Wales in India has been very successful. The party did not leave the Residency until after breakfast and returned in time for lunch, and in the interval His Royal Highness had made a bag of one chinkara, three hyenas, and four wild boars.

22ND NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Mess Dress will be worn at the Ball which will commence at 9-30 p.m.

Cards of admission must be shown at the door.

Their Royal Highnesses will arrive at 10 p.m. at the entrance at the far end of the Montgomery Hall exactly facing the dais. A procession will be formed by the suite, and ladies and gentlemen are requested to form two lines up the length of the Ball Room between which Their Royal Highnesses may pass to the dais, where they will be met by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Rivaz, Lieutenant-General Sir Bindon and Lady Blood, Sir William and Lady Clark, Major-General Kitchener, and other Members of the Ball Committee. The Band will play the National Anthem and the Trumpeters of the 12th Royal Lancers will sound a fanfare.

As soon as possible after Their Royal Highnesses have reached the dais the State Lancers will be formed; and ladies and gentlemen are requested to leave the space in front of the dais clear for this purpose.

When Their Royal Highnesses intimate their wish to have supper, a procession will be formed and will pass from the dais through the Reading Room to Their Royal Highnesses' private Supper Room entrance, which will be on the right half-way up the Reading Room. The entrance to the General Supper Tent will be on the left half-way up the Reading Room exactly opposite to the entrance to Their Royal Highnesses' Supper Room.

The Ladies' Bridge Room will be the usual room in the Montgomery Hall Building.

The large Supper Tent, the Refreshment Tent, and the Gentlemen's Smoking and Card Tent will all be close together outside the Reading Room and opposite to the entrance to His Royal Highness's Supper-Room. There will also be Refreshment Rooms at the end of each gallery.

The pillars in the Montgomery Hall will be lettered—A, B, C, etc. It will probably be most convenient if those who wish to dance will arrange to meet their partners in the Montgomery Hall, and then dance either in that Hall, or the Lawrence Hall, according to their fancy.

Programmes will be found on the far side of the Ball Room opposite the main entrance to the Montgomery Hall.

The Ladies' and Gentlemen's Cloak Rooms will be in their usual positions; and it is requested that ladies and gentlemen will proceed into the Ball Room as quickly as possible, leaving the main entrance free.

As there will be a very great number of persons attending the Ball the Committee earnestly hope that ladies and gentlemen will kindly comply with these suggestions to avoid crowding; and will also make use of the two galleries for the purpose of seeing the processions and the State Lancers.—A. A. IRVINE, Hon. Secy., "Punjab Ball," Lahore.

Return first class tickets at single fares may be issued to Ladies and Gentlemen attending the Punjab Ball given to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at Lahore, on the 30th November 1905, on production of cards of admission to the Ball. These tickets will be issued on the 28th, 29th and 30th November 1905, and will be available for return journey up to and including the 5th December 1905.

Emergent indents for tickets should be sent to the Examiner of Accounts, if necessary.

The only entrance to the Gardens on the night of the Ball will be:—

(a) By the Main Entrance Gate on the Mall nearly opposite the East Entrance to Government House.

(b) By the Broad Avenue entering from Lawrence Road opposite 'The Park' (the house occupied by the Commissioner of Lahore). All other entrances will be closed to carriages going to the Ball, but will be open after 10-30 p.m. for departures.

That portion of the Lahore-Mian Mir Road, which passes in front of Government House Grounds, between Race Course Road and the Main Entrance to the Gardens, will be closed from 8-30 to 10 p.m.

Each coachman or syce should be provided with a card giving the name of the owner or hirer of the conveyance to be produced when asked for by the Police.

Parking tickets will issue, one to owner and one to coachman or syce, and only those carriages will be parked for which tickets have issued.

The Police will not be responsible for bringing up any conveyance unless a parking ticket is produced.

Ladies and Gentlemen attending the Ball will greatly assist the Police if they will kindly be ready to alight as their carriages draw up at the entrance to the Ball Room. Delay in alighting causes a block in the traffic and disorganises the setting down arrangements.

The Punjab Ball Committee earnestly request subscribers to kindly comply with these arrangements.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The following is an extract from the proceedings of the Executive Committee of the Lahore Reception Fund at a meeting held on the 16th instant.

The progress of the collection of subscription was reported. It was decided that messengers be sent round to collect from persons who had promised subscriptions but had not yet paid and that a list should be published early showing what sums have been paid and by whom.

The Committee will invite Rajas with their suites and Viceregal Darbaris.

It was decided that invitations be not issued free to the followers of Darbaris. If they wish to come they should be invited by subscribers or subscribe themselves. The Committee does not invite subscriptions from persons who are not resident in Lahore but it will be pleased to accept subscriptions if offered by such persons.

The number of admissions to Shalimar on the night of the illuminations will be 1,000, exclusive of the gentlemen invited in accordance with the preceding resolution. Of the 1,000 tickets 400 will be reserved for Europeans and 600 for Indians. It has been already decided that tickets shall be issued only to subscribers and it was now decided that only those subscribers shall be eligible as have actually paid up their subscriptions by the 24th of this month.

Each subscriber will be allowed to introduce a reasonable number of relatives and friends and the number of admission tickets to be given to each subscriber will be settled by Mr. Darling in consultation with Captain Frizelle in the case of Europeans or with Rai Sahib Mohan Lal and Khann Bahadur Allah Bakhsh Khan in the case of Indians. A separate ticket will issue for each individual to be admitted to the gardens, each ticket bearing the name of the subscriber in whose behalf it is issued.

It was decided to have two enclosures in the Shalimar Gardens, one on each side of the Baradari in which the Royal party and His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor will be accommodated. Each enclosure is to have accommodation for 200 persons and tickets for the enclosure will be issued to Rajas and their suites, Darbaris (for themselves but not for their followers), high officials of Government, subscribers of large sums and Europeans. Separate enclosure tickets of different colours will be issued and holders must produce them as well as their tickets of admission to the gardens. Persons who have only tickets of admission to the gardens will be left to find accommodation for themselves in the unreserved parts of the gardens.

Arrangements proposed for the provision of accommodation to view the Royal procession, on the 28th in the Chiefs' Camp and in the Gol Bagh, chiefly for ladies, were approved. The tickets for these stands will be issued only to subscribers to the Reception Fund, and they will be distributed by Mr. Darling and Captain Frizelle; applications should be made to the first-named gentleman.

It was resolved that accommodation to view the Royal procession of the 28th be provided for Indians under arrangements to be made by Rai Sahib Milkhi Ram in consultation with Captain Frizelle. Tickets to subscribers only will be issued by Mr. Darling, to whom applications should be made.

It was decided that Lala Ram Saran Das and Mian Shamas-ud-din should arrange for a simple enclosure without seats to which tickets would be issued by Mr. Darling on application to him for the convenience of subscribers to the Reception Fund who wish to see the Firework Display on the 1st December.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Mrs. Umar Hayat, one of the invited guests at the parda party given by Lady Rivaz in honour of the Princess of Wales, contributes an interesting account of the function to the Tahzib-i-Niswan, an Urdu weekly for Muhammadan girls, published at Lahore. She says:—The ladies invited were about fifty in number and all occupied a high position in society. At the outer entrance the guests were received by Mrs. Parker, while at the inner stood Lady Rivaz herself. They were seated by Miss Bose in chairs arranged in rows, the gilded chair for the Princess being in the centre of the room. Lady Rivaz occupied a seat close to Her Royal Highness, and to her left were the Rani of Kapurthala and the Begums of the Regent of Maler Kotla. After all the guests had sat down the Princess came in attended by two ladies. As she stepped in all the ladies present rose and made their obeisance to her. Her Royal Highness then took her stand by her chair and shook hands with the guests as they were presented to her in order of precedence. After this the Princess and others all sat down, and Lady Harnam Singh read the address from the women of the Punjab to their future Queen, a printed copy of the Urdu translation of the address having been supplied to each guest beforehand. In reply the Princess returned thanks for the honour done to her, and said that it had given her great pleasure to meet the Indian ladies assembled. Her Royal Highness was also pleased to call a few of the guests to her one by one, and hold brief conversations with them. The lady called sat in the chair specially reserved for the purpose near the Princess, and in case of her being ignorant of English, Mrs. Parker acted as interpreter. The ladies so honoured were the Rani of Kapurthala, the Begums of the Regent of Maler Kotla, Lady Harnam Singh, and the correspondent of the Tahzib-i-Niswan (Mrs. Umar Hayat). The Princess had a rather long talk with Miss Bose, while Mrs. Parker was honoured with the gift of a photograph of Her Royal Highness.

Daily Chronicle.—Though Jaipur lies but a short night's journey from Udaipur, the contrast both between the two cities and their surroundings is great. Udaipur is situated amid beautiful and fertile mountain scenery, Jaipur is a sandy, barren plain, bordered by hills which are covered with scrub jungle of no value except for fuel. Udaipur is an ancient Hindu city, with narrow and crooked streets; Jaipur is the most modern in construction and local management of all the native cities of India.

The city of Jaipur derives its name from the famous Maharaja Jai Sing II, a mathematician and astronomer, who founded it in 1728. It is built of pink stone in imitation of sandstone, and is remarkable for the width, regularity, and cleanliness of its streets, while it is lighted throughout with gas, an almost unknown luxury in India. It is laid out in rectangular blocks and divided by cross-streets into six equal portions. The regularity of its pattern and the straightness of its streets built after the American fashion, deprive Jaipur of the mystic charm of the East, while the painted mud walls give it the meretricious air of stage scenery. It has been called by Lord Curzon 'a pretentious plaster fraud.' Nevertheless, as the capital of one of the two chief States of Rajputana, and as the commercial centre of the trade between Delhi, Agra, and Rajputana, it is a city of great interest and importance.

The Maharaja Madho Singh, who received the Prince at the station, was already known to him, having visited England for the King's coronation. It was he that started the 'Indian People's Famine Fund,' and endowed it with a donation of £140,000. In honour of the Prince's visit he has now added £13,000 to that amount.

From the station, where they arrived at half-past eight this morning, the Royal party drove through a scene rivalling Udaipur in point of picturesqueness, though a century later in development. There were Nagas or half-naked outrunners, dancing uncouth dances, footmen in orange robes, and match-locks in green; elephants with painted foreheads and trunks, camels with swivel guns, bullock batteries, bullock palkis, and, indeed, a complete replica of Jaipur a century ago. When the crowd broke up after the Prince had passed the scene was extraordinarily picturesque, owing to the variegated turbans and brilliant robes of the natives. The Prince and the Maharaja drove in a gold-canopied carriage.

After the Prince had paid his return visit to the Maharaja another picturesque scene took place in the darbar hall of the palace. The hall was hung with massive gold embroideries. Here the Maharaja, surrounded by his feudatories, whose number was limited owing to the famine, received the Prince in State, laying his sword at the Prince's feet when he alighted. The conversation during the visit was unusually animated, owing to the previous acquaintance which existed, but every action of the Maharaja was tinged with the deepest loyalty. The Princess watched the ceremony from a fretted alcove.

Later the Prince inspected the Transport Corps, which did such good service in the Tirah campaign and in China, and showed great interest in its high state of efficiency, heartily complimenting Danpat Rao, the Commandant. He then went blackbuck shooting in the Maharaja's preserves. Tomorrow he goes after his first tiger. It was at Jaipur that King Edward killed his first tiger, thirty years ago.

Daily Mail.—The Maharaja of Jaipur, one of the most enlightened native rulers, whose capital is one of the most picturesque, received the Prince with great state on his arrival here.

The broad streets were lined with elephants, camels, and horses, gorgeously caparisoned, with men-at-arms in amber, crimson, olive, and green. Half-naked warriors, armed with spear and shield, danced before the Royal coach. The Prince sat beneath a golden canopy. Great crowds, appalled like the rainbow, filled the fine streets of pink houses, for the city is like a pink pearl.

The reception at the palace showed that the Prince has not exhausted the splendours of the East. By a series of courts his Royal Highness reached the hall of audience, behind the pillars of which he sat enthroned among firdars radiant with jewels. The courtyard was thronged with many-hued magnificence.

The centre of the glowing spectacle, the Prince and the Maharaja held animated conversation for some minutes. The Princess watched the ceremony from a balcony. Afterwards Their Royal Highnesses visited the Albert Hall Museum, which is the South Kensington of this part of India for Jaipur is a famous centre of learning, noted for its colleges and observatory. The welcome was shorn of some of its magnificence owing to the absence of the sons of the sirdars. Yet the official reception was the finest the Prince has witnessed.

Daily Telegraph.—Jaipur is holding high festival. From the doors of the railway station to the gates of the Residency, 2 miles away, the entire route travelled by the Prince and Princess of Wales on their arrival this morning was lined with such a retinue as no other place in India could gather together. Within the limits of a telegram it is difficult to give any adequate idea of the variety of races and costumes, arms, animals, and equipages displayed under the alternate sunshine and shadow of the tree-bordered roadway. The Maharaja of Jaipur himself was the most striking and dignified figure among all who were collected at his command to welcome the Shahzada. Those who remember his tall and commanding figure in London during the summer of 1902, and the scrupulous care with which he provided for himself water of the sacred Ganges, and all other necessities of his caste and station, can well imagine with what perfection of ceremonial the reception of the Prince was carried out to-day.

Outside the station a double line of the famous Nagas awaited him. This fanatical soldiery was more splendidly, and, to tell the truth, far more completely attired than is usual. Instead of bare limbs and trunk heavily ringed and splashed with yellow, the Nagas to-day wore a garment like a close-fitting university bathing dress of scarlet, orange, or rose satin, over which was loosely tied the orange 'dhoti,' or loin strip, which is their only wear on ordinary occasions. Instead of matted hair, worked in to a horse-hair tuft, from which chains of sequins depend, they wore white turbans, crested with peacock plumes. Picturesqueness was sacrificed to gaiety, and only the long, thin, gauntlet-handled swords reminded one still of the strange celibate and ascetic rules of this caste, who, on great occasions, are bound by grand serjeanty to appear before the Maharaja of Jaipur. The Nagas, after the first salute, joined the cavalcade, and danced before the Prince's carriage to the gates of the Residency.

Conspicuous all along the line of route, not only fluttering from Venetian masts, but held aloft by standard-bearers, mounted and on foot, was the 'panchranga,' or five-coloured flag of Jaipur. This is the best-known emblem of Rajputana. Here the stripes are in the following order: blue, yellow, green, red, and white. But in some arrangement, differing in each State, the panchranga—five tints—identifies Rajputs all over the world. Beyond the elephants and horses came a double row of antique guns, each drawn by a pair of green-clothed oxen, each with his horns dyed bravely of the same strong myrtle tint. Beyond that again a long row of bullock raths, or zenana carts, with domed hoods of green velvet. Opposite was an array of state palkis, or sedan-chairs, each borne on a silver pole, with a fanciful beast's head projecting a yard in front of the bearers. Then one passed between a furlong of camels, bearing ancient camel guns upon the saddlebow, a kind of mediæval punt-gun working upon a swivel, and only too likely to blow its own camel's head off at the first shot. Then many other camels followed, some bearing huge kettledrums draped to the ground with panchranga colours, some equipped for pack purposes, some bearing the usual three passengers astride in full concertina skirts of scarlet silk. Men in chain-mail, with tufted helmets, men bearing silver tridents, men supporting the 'Muratibi,' or golden standard and insignia of Mahi, followed by efficient khaki-clad cavalry, and at the last, the Maharaja's Imperial Service Troops, near the Residency gate.

Through this avenue of mediæval display the Prince and Princess drove in the Maharaja's State coach, and the former subsequently drove into the Palace to return the visit of the Maharaja at a full darbar in the gaily-painted audience chamber.

Englishman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales's reception at Jaipur on 21st November was truly picturesque. The Maharaja had assembled all his retainers in their old-world costume and the scene from the station to the Residency was truly bizarre. Half-naked runners, camelmen, elephants and bullock batteries lined the road. From these the Prince and Princess had reverential salutations as they drove from the station to the Residency. To-day is to be quietly spent, the only event of importance being the reception of an address from the Municipality this afternoon.

The scene which met Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, when they drove away from Jaipur station this morning, was brimful of Oriental life and colour. From the station a broad straight road stretches for two or three furlongs before it turns sharply to the right towards the Residency, and this was lined with the retainers of the Maharaja and his feudatories in their most picturesque and characteristic garb. One thought that at Udaipur was presented a unique reproduction of mediæval India, yet the scene here this morning fully equalled it, though it dealt with an India of a century later. For here were the Maharaja's runners, lithe, active, bare-legged rascals in green jerkins eased with gold and white turbans, with feather kullas and striped, as to the lower extremities, like a Mohurum tiger. Brandishing their gauntlet swords they pranced around with the uncouth antics we associate with Africa rather than with India. Their music bore a noble warhym on which he blew a weird conch-like blast. There were Chobdars by the score gorgeously robed in scarlet and bearing silver staves, orange robed messengers, spearmen by the hundred, and matchlock men in olive green, the guardians of the Maharaja's sleep. Now came camels with huge kettle drums, horses with kettle drums, and dancing horses gaily caparisoned in tinsel and green. A score of elephants themselves made a brave sight with their gilded howdahs, trailing cloths of green and red and gold and painted foreheads. And these served but as a further introduction to palanquins manned by red coated bearers, bullock palkis in red, bullock palkis in green with the horns of the splendid Gujarati oxen brightly enamelled. Then came a bullock battery with the tiniest of guns and camelmen with great swivel blunderbusses mounted on the fronts of their saddles, and sirdars on boisterous stallions. All this motley throng was arranged with an excellent eye to effect and it formed a perfect picture of the Rajputana of the day when the gallant horsemen had come to realise that they could not prevail against the Moslem unless they descended to the use of villainous saltpetre.

Through this fascinating throng drove His Highness the Maharaja in a carriage and four covered with a golden canopy to receive his royal guests, and he alighted at the station to the braying of war horns and the strains of a most original anthem. When the train steamed into the station His Royal Highness, wearing his naval uniform, and the Princess of Wales were received by the Honourable Mr. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General in Rajputana, Sir Swinton Jacob, Mr. Stothert, State Engineer, Colonel Pank, I.M.S., Residency Surgeon, and Colonel Herbert, Resident at Jaipur, who presented the Maharaja. Stepping forward this handsome prince, in the simplest costume of black with a little gold embroidery, gracefully laid his sword at the feet of His Royal Highness as a token of fealty, and then performed the same ceremony to Her Royal Highness. The usual presentations followed, the leading sirdars of Jaipur, who were in attendance upon their feudal chief, being brought in turn before the heir of their overlord. The Prince and the Maharaja, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, now entered the golden canopied carriage and drove off to the Residency, followed by Her Royal Highness the Princess. If the assemblage was picturesque in the early morning it was infinitely more so now, when on the ugly houses behind the State retainers was gathered a densely packed crowd of the people of the city greeting Their Royal Highnesses with solemnity, but with every sign of oriental respect. It was even more picturesque when the cortege having passed those serried lines of elephants, of camels, of horses and of those on foot, melted into an animated blaze of vivid colour, as each unit found its way to its accustomed station.

The remainder of the morning was given up to State visits. The first four Sardars attended for the Mizaj Puri and then His Highness the Maharaja paid his formal visit. The Residency at Jaipur is one of the most handsome in Rajputana, and the charming grounds beautifully kept are a joy to anyone who has an eye for flowers and trees, but the British surroundings do not lend themselves gracefully to oriental ceremonies, and the Prince's reception of his host could not vie in picturesqueness with the return visit. This was paid in the Durbar Hall of the palace, in the centre of the city. The drive thither was through the principal of the famous pink streets of Jaipur lined with an expectant crowd and looking even cleaner and better kept than their wont. Many parts too were brightly decorated with flags and bunting, loyal mottoes and triumphal arches. It is ungracious to wish this undone, but the marked individuality of Jaipur has nothing in common with our western notions of street adornment, and though the intention was excellent the effect was banal to a degree.

The scene within the palace was perhaps the most gorgeous that has yet met the eyes of Their Royal Highnesses. The Durbar Hall stands on one side of a paved courtyard whose walls are of the true Jaipur pink and white. The pillars upholding the roof are of marble, the arcades and the roof being fire-cool in crude colours. Over the gold and crimson State chairs was raised a canopy of the richest oriental fashion, massively embroidered. The carpets were of the handsomest and the hangings of the brightest. Yet even in Jaipur where in many respects such an excellent standard of oriental taste prevails we could not escape that touch of the bizarre which seems inseparable from every organised Indian display. The Durbar Hall was hung with glass chandeliers of the most incongruous pattern, and in one angle of the courtyard was a shed of corrugated iron with equally ugly pillars, which was literally an outrage. Seated in his chair of State the Maharaja awaited his Royal visitor, a fine dignified figure, still clad in simple black, lightly brodered in golden and crossed with the Star of India Ribbon, a turban of golden cloth, ringed with pearls, in front of which scintillated a superb diamond pendant. On his left were gathered his principal feudatories to the number of thirty-seven, the assemblage being restricted owing to the scarcity which prevails in the State and makes it impossible to find the fodder required for a large assemblage. In the fretted gallery behind the chairs of State sat Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales gownned in graceful muslin and wearing some lovely diamonds, surrounded by the ladies of her suite. Despite the slight incongruities noted it was a singularly attractive scene and one clothed in native dignity.

To the rumbling of guns, the wailing of war horns and the strains of music, His Royal Highness's carriage clattered into the courtyard and drew up at the foot of the scarlet steps, the approach to which was guarded by matchlock men in green and choldars in red, the Prince being in his white Naval uniform and the staff who followed the carriage on foot also in white. Meeting His Royal Highness at the carriage steps the Maharaja again laid his sword at his feet and rising the Prince and feudatory slowly advanced to the chairs of State and seated themselves. A long and animated conversation followed, Colonel Herbert interpreting, in which both His Royal Highness and the Maharaja were evidently keenly interested. This was interrupted while the leading Sardars were presented and offered their nazar, and the Maharaja gave attar and pan to the Prince and garlanded him, similarly honouring Sir Walter Lawrence, Mr. Colvin and Colonel Herbert, while one of the chiefs presented this tribute of oriental respect to the staff. Her Royal Highness was also wreathed with a handsome garland of gold thread and the ladies in attendance. After further intimate conversation with his host the Prince departed, the band playing, the war horns wailing and His Highness standing on the steps till the Royal carriage disappeared through the portals of the courtyard. This was at once one of the most brilliant and dignified ceremonies in which His Royal Highness has participated.

Continuing a very busy day His Royal Highness received, after lunch, a deputation from the Municipality of Ajmere, an island of British territory in the sea of Rajputana States. Ajmere-Merwara is at once an emblem of British authority and an example of British administrative methods, and for these reasons, as well as for its great historic interest, Ajmere would have been included in Their Royal Highness's itinerary had it not been for the great scarcity which unfortunately prevails in the district. The address which was read by Munshi Bishamber recognised that 1818, the year of the British occupation, inaugurated an era of peaceful progress, chequered only by famine, and what thoughtful citizen could look back on a century of British rule without thankfulness, or forward to the future without hope? The casket enclosing the address supported a model of one of the Royal pavilions, built by the Emperor Shah Jehan, which has recently been restored by the Government of India.

His Royal Highness made the following reply:—

"Gentlemen,—In the name of the Princess of Wales and on my own behalf I thank you for the expressions of hearty greeting and good will which are contained in your address. You have already received from me the message of sympathy which I sent to you from England, and if anything could add to our sincere regrets that we should be receiving you here in Jaipur and not in your own city, it is the very description which you have given of Ajmere's history and attractions. We both feel strongly for you in your troubles, and after the long series of your misfortunes we hope that a happy period of prosperity is in-store for Ajmere and Rajputana. The designs on the casket will serve as an imperishable record of the beautiful architecture of Ajmere, and I am glad to read of the restoration of Shah Jehan's pavilion. I am equally interested to hear of the Mayo College; you may well be proud to have such an institution in your midst. Both of these will be for all time associated with the name and the energies of your late Viceroy, Lord Curzon. Your historical sketch is one from which both you and I may draw satisfaction, and I shall be very glad to acquaint the King-Emperor with your loyal expressions. It will be a pleasure to him, as it is to us, to know that you regard his house as the symbol of peace, justice and prosperity."

Afterwards His Royal Highness inspected, in the Residency grounds, the smart Imperial Service Transport Corps, which the Maharaja holds at the disposal of the Imperial Government, which proved its worth in the frontier war of 1897, and which comprises 1,200 ponies and 600 carts. For half-an-hour the Commandant, Rai Bhadur Dampat Rai, C.I.E., stood by the Prince, explaining his patent folding carts and new pattern carts with boiler and cooking stove. Dampat Rai has shown he is an inventor of genius by building in the Jaipur workshops a carriage carrying a camp stove, where water can be boiled and tea made on the march. He has designed an ambulance cart for the field, which can be taken over the roughest country.

In this conveyance are two beds for serious cases and a number of boxes for medical stores. A similar cart was inspected by the Prince for four men not seriously wounded. One of the folding carts was dismantled and one remanted, the whole proceeding taking less than five minutes. Several officers with campaigning experience were with the Prince, and all expressed the same favourable opinion of the carts and the turnout. The ponies were in capital condition and the men, most of them wearing the frontier medal with several clasps, fit and well. Danpat Rai is ready to entrain with his corps for any part of the world at 24 hours' notice, fully equipped and horsed to take the field. No less interesting than the carts were the pack ponies loaded with field trunks for use when the roads are too bad for wheeled transport. The Princess of Wales was present and the scene much interested Her Royal Highness and Danpat Rai was complimented on the parade. In the afternoon His Royal Highness accompanied by the Maharaja and Sir Walter Lawrence had half-an-hour's shooting, finding splendid sport, the bag comprising four buck and forty duck.

In commemoration of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Maharaja has intimated his intention of adding two lakhs of rupees to his munificent donations to the Indore Famine Fund. Everyone was glad to see Sir Pertab Singh on the platform today quite recovered from the indisposition which overtook him in Bombay.

The Prince of Wales, who is the President of the St. John's Ambulance Association, has consented to sign the certificate of successful candidates in first aid to the wounded, held by the Burma centre of the Association.

Indian Daily News.—On the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at Jaipur, they were received at the station by His Highness the Maharaja, the Agent to the Governor-General in Rajputana, the Resident at Jaipur, twelve Sardars of the State and a number of other officials. His Highness was an imposing figure in a dark robe richly embroidered with gold, wearing a turban of golden material with a peacock plume. The Sardars were resplendent figures ablaze with gold embroideries and wearing head-dresses or caps of gold stuff with nigrettes of gold. The station was lavishly decorated, and outside there was a scene of unique interest and brilliance. A troop of the Cadet Corps of the Mayo College in white uniform with rainbow hued turbans and mounted on superb chargers were backed by lines of swordsmen. The most picturesque sight was these swordsmen. The Nagas were dressed in tight sleeveless silk vests with shot breeches, the first line in vivid green and the second in bright red. They carried small circular shields and straight swords and wore peacock plumes in their white turbans. Their brows and limbs were smeared with ochre, and they were striking menacing attitudes, with swords quivering, which gave a wild effect to the scene. On either side of the road, the men of the 42nd Deoli Regiment were drawn, and lines of State troops stretched away in a brilliant perspective, beyond a triumphal arch, for a distance of about two miles to the Residency. The arrival of the Royal train was signalled by a Royal salute fired by the State artillery, and after the formal presentations on the platform, Their Royal Highnesses drove off along the gorgeously lined route. The Prince of Wales, who wore his Vice-Admiral's uniform, was accompanied by the Maharaja in his State carriage, an imposing silver-mounted equipage covered with a golden canopy, and fitted with curtains in green and silver. The Princess was accompanied in the next carriage by the Agent to the Governor-General. The Royal escort was formed of the Mayo College Cadets, a squadron of Artillery and the 42nd Deoli Regiment. As the procession moved off, the Nagas, whose function is that of protectors of the State, poised their swords as for combat, weird notes were sounded on an antique horn, and the swordsmen indulged in a war dance. Beyond the triumphal arch, a score of State elephants equipped with rich jhools and State howdahs lined one side of the road, and on the other side were State camels. Thence to the Residency were lines of men-at-arms in saffron, sage green, and blue attire, men mounted on richly caparisoned horses, State bullock carts covered in green velvet, with the horns of the cattle painted green, State palanquins, and men in chain armour. A camel corps, with antique weapons of State Artillery, drawn by bullocks picturesquely armed shikaris and spearmen, and men armed with lathies, made up a combination remarkable for its interest and its superb colour effects. Companies of the barbaric swordsmen seen at the station were also placed at intervals along the route. Standards, State emblems, and drums appeared at various points in the town. Approaching the Residency, the road was lined by less picturesque troops clothed in uniforms of a modern, but now disused, British pattern. Behind the lines of State retainers were massed crowds of people completing a picture so far unrivalled for beauty of colouring and impressiveness of a character entirely historic.

Shortly after the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses, a visit of ceremony was paid by four of the State officers to enquire after the health of the Prince and Princess. At half past eleven His Highness the Maharaja paid a visit to His Royal Highness, the usual ceremonies being observed. His Highness was conducted to the Residency by an officer of the Prince's staff, an Assistant to the Agent to the Governor-General, and an Aide-de-Camp and escorted by sowars. After His Highness had been received, his attendants were introduced to the Prince, and each presented nazars of one gold mohar, which were touched and remitted, altar and pan being afterwards distributed. His Royal Highness returned the Maharaja's visit, being escorted to the Palace by a deputation of four State officers.

The scenes which marked the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at Jaipur were succeeded by a ceremonial more gorgeous than anything yet witnessed during the tour. When the Prince of Wales proceeded to return the visit of His Highness at the palace he drove through a city of wide thoroughfares laid out on modern lines with buildings of rose pink ornamented with designs in white. Windows and doorways were outlined in chalk and floral and other designs filled up the available spaces of the walls. A number of triumphal arches crossed the broad roads, which were lined with masts and banners, and mottoes of welcome abounded. "Hail to the Noble Prince," "Joy Joy, Joy," "Happy be Thy Stay," "Britain's Power is the Joy of India." These were some of the devices that flamed into view, and the streets were lined by masses of brightly dressed folk. Reaching the palace the Royal cortege proceeded through handsome gateways and noble courtyards to a series of inner courts leading to the hall of audience. At the first of these all but the Prince and those with him in the Royal carriage alighted escorting the Royal equipage on foot through winding ways and lines of retainers in saffron raiment to the inner court, reached through a gateway of shining brass. Lines of scarlet-clothed men backed by others in vivid green flanked the path through the broad court to the steps of the hall of audience at the opposite end. The pillared hall lavishly decorated was open to the quadrangle, and in its centre stood a wonderful canopy of gold and silver metal work supported by pillars and enclosed at the base by railings and gates of gold giving access to the two thrones placed beneath the canopy. A great crystal chandelier hung in front of the thrones; the hall was thronged by Durbaris in the richest raiment, the Tazmi Sardars and nobles who the Maharaja always receives standing being conspicuous for the brilliance and picturesqueness of their vestments. They wore coats profusely embroidered with gold and white muslin kilted skirts and tight trousers of gold and iridescent stuffs. The splendour of the scene was completed by the lines of scarlet robed men extending from the steps of the audience hall to the gateway of the Court. Recalling typical pictures of Indian Courts, the Durbar impressed itself upon the minds of the Royal party as the finest and most brilliant scene yet presented to them. The ceremonials incidental to the exchange visit did not occupy much time. The Prince and the entourage were garlanded and His Royal Highness took his seat beside the Maharaja beneath the Royal canopy, and they conversed together for a few minutes. Thereafter His Royal Highness departed under a Royal salute, and when the sound of the guns had died away the Maharaja left his throne to the strains of a native air played by the band. Reaching the palace the Prince of Wales drove through the city by another route to the Albert Hall, where he joined the Princess, who had been paying visits to the Museum and other institutions. Their Royal Highnesses returned together to the Residency.

After luncheon they received a deputation from the Ajmere Municipality, who presented an address of welcome. The deputation was headed by Mr. C. W. Waddington, Chairman of the Municipality, and Munshi Bishambharnath, who read the address. It was richly illuminated and was enclosed in a silver casket which supported a model of one of the lately restored marble pavilions built by Shah Jehan. The casket is ornamented by designs showing views of the most interesting sights in Ajmere, such as the Anna Sagar Lake, the Shrine of the Durgah Khwaja Sahib, and the Mayo College. The address stated that while the citizens of Ajmere could but regret the visitation of famine which had precluded Their Royal Highnesses visiting the city, they most heartily appreciate the ready sympathy with the distressed population of the district which prompted Their Royal Highnesses on hearing of the impending famine to unhesitatingly forego their stay in Ajmere, and they were most truly grateful for the gracious expression of that sympathy which Their Royal Highnesses hastened to make known to the people. After referring to the historical interest of Ajmere, the Municipality trusted that the address and casket might be a symbol to Their Royal Highnesses of the universal love and loyalty with which the people of Ajmere, in common with the whole of India, regarded the members of their Royal house, which is to them, as to all India, the symbol of peace, justice, and prosperity.

The Prince of Wales replied to the address.

At the conclusion of the Prince's speech the Hon'ble Mr. Colvin presented Mr. Waddington, who in turn presented the other members of the deputation.

Subsequently the Prince inspected the Imperial Service Transport Corps, afterwards driving out accompanied by the Princess. Their Royal Highnesses dined quietly at the Residency.

To-morrow's programme includes a shoot, in which it is hoped His Royal Highness may secure his first tiger.

It was at Jaipur that the King-Emperor, thirty years ago, shot his first tiger in India. There will be a banquet to-morrow night at the palace, and Thursday will be spent in sight-seeing, the Royal party leaving Jaipur the same evening.

This evening the Prince had a successful shoot, bagging as the result of half an hour's sport forty duck and four black-buck.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—It will be remembered on the 10th instant whilst Their Royal Highnesses were driving through the City at Bombay their carriage was approached by a Bhishti named Taba Fatta of the 113th Regiment who attempted to present a petition to His Royal Highness. By his action the man caused a certain amount of obstruction, and he was consequently arrested, but in deference to the express wishes of His Royal Highness he was released and allowed to go free.

"GOD BLESS THE PRINCE OF WALES."
(Air: "God Bless The Prince of Wales.")
By the Rev. W. J. RICHARDS, D.D., Travancore.

Hark! Britain's Prince, the greeting
Which sounds from shore to shore
Of Britain's Eastern glory,
And sister evermore.

All hail thy peaceful progress
Triumphant through the land,
We pray Heaven guide and bless thee,
And guard with mighty hand.

The while the prayer ascending
From English hills and dales
Re-echoes loud from India!

God bless the Prince of Wales!
United is the greeting!—

With loyal love profound
Of every race the peoples
Prolong the joyful sound.

We greet thy Royal Princess,
Our Empress-Queen to be.

We raise thy Royal Standard,
The banner of the free!

And to the one great Father

Our prayer nor halts nor fails.
But swelling soareth Heavenward

God bless the Prince of Wales!
Our Emperor's Heir, rejoice thou,

In God's salvation strong!
Thy years be crowned with greatness!

Thy prayed-for life be long!
From West to East thou marchest,

To South, to Himalay,
And hope springs up before thee,

And blessings strew thy way.
And so the prayer of millions

Goes up from hills and dales,
Through ancient glorious India!

God bless the Prince of Wales!

We find that among the names of the Native Chiefs in Southern India invited for the Royal Visit we omitted the name of the Zemindar of Kurupam, Vizagapatam. He is an "Ancient Zemindar" like the Maharajas of Bobbili and Jeypore and the Rajas of Venkatagiri and Vizianagram. His name has also been recently added to the list of persons entitled to the Private Entrée published in the last Gazette.

Madras Mail.—Udaipur, 20th November. It was with a feeling of the keenest regret that everyone bade farewell to Udaipur. For here, we not only saw a beautiful city under idyllic conditions but were vouchsafed a glimpse of the India that is fast passing away, the India of those dreams that vanished at the touch of the occidentalised centres, where the Anglo-Indian does most of his Eastern work. Here we met the virile survivals of the feudalism which knit the gallant Rajputs into a great fighting nation; and on the Royal progress from the station we saw something of the manner and garb of the men who made the annals of Mewar the most heroic in the history of Hindustan.

Nor has it lessened the pleasures of the visit to be the guests of a Prince who corresponds, so far as is possible in these placid days, to our ideals of Rajput chivalry so high in the social scale as to be above the social laws that bind lesser men. The Maharana of Udaipur yet chooses to lead a life of rare austerity. He is, and always has been, strictly monogamous, temperate almost to the point of asceticism, and whilst despising the meretricious sportsman's life which has been the ruin of other Rajput States, he keeps in hard physical condition and is a splendid rifle shot. Scorning delights and living laborious days, he finds his work in the government of his State, and in simple pleasures amongst his own people. At every State ceremony the spare, dignified figure of the Maharana, his erect bearing, his refined features have commanded unqualified respect. The most pleasant episode of the visit was the evidence afforded that His Highness has not been without his reward. At tea in the Jag Mandar Palace on Sunday afternoon, the heir to the gadi was the object of the kindly interest of the Prince and Princess of Wales. He is the Maharana's only son and a few years ago his strength, even his life, were despaired of. Now there is no reason why he should not have many happy years before him, and he has been passed as fit for rule. In this blessing the Maharana must find compensation for the rubs of fortune which none in high places are exempt from.

The Maharana is the Chief of his State, in deed as well as in name, and is virtually his own Dewan. His ways are not our ways, his ideas are not our ideas. Consequently, it is the fashion to call Udaipur backward and unprogressive, to sigh for the days when more modernised views will prevail. Well, if Mewar is backward its people look happy, and they are not unprosperous. Such difficulties as the Maharana may have with his Feudatories and his bills are arranged without scandal and without offence. Is not this enough? Is no part of India to be safe from Moloch which we call Progress? Unhappy the day if Mewar ever becomes the victim of the destroying influence of half-digested Western practice. The heir-apparent is spoken of as kindly and intelligent and more liberal-minded than his father. The best fate that can befall him is to find some sage counsellor to show him that progress is not necessarily associated with horse racing and polo ponies, nor enlightenment best revealed in motor boats and motor cars, in visits to Europe and in Western notions; that living amongst his own people, leading them gently forward without destroying their racial habits and customs, manners and traditions, improving their material condition without disintegrating the basis of their social life are the directions in which the enlightenment of an Indian Prince can best find scope.

And now let me pour out a modest libation to those who have dispensed the Maharana's hospitality with such rare skill and charm. Udaipur offers no facilities for the entertainment of such a large body of visitors, yet Their Royal Highnesses and their suite and all who accompany them have been provided for with a completeness that left nothing lacking. For this our thanks are due to the Resident. Major Pinhey, to his colleague, Mr. Horne, and to Mr. Wakefield, whose consideration and courtesy know no limits.

Their Royal Highnesses' last day in Udaipur was free from ceremony and official functions. In the morning, which was delightfully cool and fresh, His Royal Highness made his first acquaintance with the Indian jungle. It was originally proposed to arrange a little shoot for duck and snipe on the Pichola Lake; but the birds were so scarce that this had to be abandoned for a beat for larger game. This was not unproductive. One chinkara, three hyenas and four boar fell to His Royal Highness's rifle. The bag, however, was the least important part of the expedition. It served to introduce the Prince of Wales to Indian shooting conditions more especially in the matter of light, which will stand him in good stead when he comes to tackle his first tiger at Jaipur.

Nor must these shooting expeditions be measured in the light of mere hunting excursions. In the frank comradeship of the field and the unceremonious intercourse of the camp His Royal Highness will come to know more of the Indian Chiefs than in formal visits and public receptions; and as one of the main purposes of the Royal progress is to strengthen the personal link between the great feudatories and the throne, these shooting parties constitute no mean factor in the programme which has been so cleverly drawn up.

Whilst the Prince of Wales was in the jungle, Her Royal Highness the Princess drove through Udaipur to visit some of the chief lions of the town. These included the Palace, the beautiful Palace gardens with their interesting zoological collection, and the Jagdesh Temple.

The day was one to crown the pleasant memories of Udaipur, for it was cooler than any since Their Royal Highnesses landed in India. In the late afternoon, the Maharana called at the Residency to bid farewell to the Royal guests, who leave none but the happiest impressions behind them. Then quite quietly, to a salute from the guns of Eklingarh Fort, Their Royal Highnesses left for Jaipur at 6-30 p.m.

Madras Mail.—At an "At Home" held by Lady Krishna Murthi at the Government Girls' School in the City on Saturday, the Mysore Industrial and Agricultural Exhibition of 1906 was discussed at length, the following Resolutions were come to, and the ladies mentioned promised to be responsible for the various Sections:—

It was unanimously resolved that the ladies of Bangalore should send in exhibits of their work to the Ladies' Section of the Industrial Exhibition in Mysore which is to be opened by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in January next.

That not only exhibits of the work and those enumerated in the notices be submitted by ladies and their friends, but the work of the labouring classes may also be included.

That the wives of the Deputy Commissioners of the Districts excepting those of Mysore and Bangalore be asked to form Committees in their places, of which the Lady Doctors should be the Secretaries, since Lady Krishna Murthi will be the President for the Ladies' Section of the Exhibition, and to submit all exhibits to the President at Purnaprasad, Bangalore, by the end of December.

That in order to have exhibits from all classes and communities a lady of each community be appointed a member of the Committee to arrange all details and to expedite matters they will meet frequently. The following ladies be proposed to form the Committee:—Miss A. M. Smith, Miss Muller, Mrs. H. J. Bhabha, Mrs. Aga Abdulla, Mrs. Ahmed Sait, Mrs. Abdul Kareem, Mrs. T. Ananda Rao, Mrs. Arcot Narainasawmy Moodelliar, and Miss Dr. Govind Rajulu.

Secretaries:—Miss Dr. Ayechemall and Miss Rajagopaul. The proceedings of the meeting to be communicated to the Secretary of the Mysore Industrial Exhibition for information.

Pioneer.—This morning (19th November) the Prince and Princess of Wales attended Divine Service at the Mission Church with which Dr. Sheppard's name has been so closely associated for many years. The service was a simple one and was followed by a short sermon. The Rev. Mr. Price, Chaplain of Mhow, was the clergyman officiating. In the afternoon an opportunity was taken by the members of the suite and others to proceed up the Lako to the Khas Udi, where the wild pigs come down in hundreds to be fed. This is one of the sights usually shown to visitors here, as pigs abound and can only be kept down by shooting, it being impossible to ride them. Tea was served on Jagmandir Island which, with Jagawas, is among the many delightful features of scenery at Udaipur, each island having its water palace and beautiful gardens, fountains and groves.

A quiet dinner was served at the Residency in the evening. Their Royal Highnesses welcoming the rest which came after all the functions and journeys of the past week. The Residency is picturesquely placed in a garden and well-wooded grounds, and in there a camp has been pitched for the suite and staff. Mr. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General, and Major Pinhey, Resident Magistrate, with Mrs. Colvin, Miss Pinhey, and the Political staffs and visitors, are also in camp, the Residency being given up for the accommodation of the Prince and Princess. A luxurious shamiana serves as out-of-door drawing room, Mrs. Pinhey having shown great artistic taste in its adornment. Two more shamianas are used as dining and reception tents. All these are shaded in red, white and blue on the exterior, with soft yellow interiors. The effect of these colours among the dark green foliage of the trees and streets is extremely pretty. Masses of bougainvillea in full bloom cover part of the verandahs of the house. The Udaipur State Troops and police furnish the outer guards to the grounds, while some 230 of the Mewar Bhil Corps, under the command of Major Goodenough, are present. These provided guards of honour yesterday, and are on duty about the Residency. They look smart and soldierly in their green uniforms with red facings.

The arrangements made by the Darbar for carriages, boats, etc., are excellent, and full measure of comfort in other ways is secured by the catering of Mr. Wutzler, who is also responsible in this matter for all the journeys by train. Udaipur is fully maintaining its reputation for splendid hospitality and kindly welcome.

Yesterday afternoon the Maharana played the part of host in person at the Khas Udi, when the wild pigs came down to be fed. This sight of hundreds of boars, who appear each evening to receive their food, is a novel one to all visitors here for the first time, and the Royal party could not fail to be interested in the strange scene. In olden days fights between boar and tiger in a sunken arena were common enough, and now such exhibitions still take place on festival occasions. An idea was given of the real thing by letting down a dummy figure of a man, but the tiger showed no concern, although afterwards when he had been taken to his cage and a boar was released the latter charged viciously at the figure.

At the Jagmandir Palace the Maharana's son (heir to the gadi) was waiting with a number of attendants in their bright Rajput dresses, and here the Princess had tea amidst the most beautiful surroundings. Evening was then closing in and their Royal Highnesses watched the sunset, which is the daily glory of this wondrous city of palaces and lakes, lying like jewels amid the hills. The scene was indeed one of surpassing loveliness, the sky flecked with light clouds which caught the orange and purple and pink glow that spread over the land. The surface of the waters, stirred by a light breeze, took on these rainbow hues, the towers, turrets and cupolas of the palace, the gleaming white domes and temple walls softened in the fading sunlight, and one seemed to be translated into fairyland. The western hills were sharply defined with their crowning forts or isolated fanes, and as the sun sank slowly into the desert far beyond, the softly tinted twilight bathed mountain and valley, lake and island in one mellow glow of colour.

It is the sunset here which gives the full charm to all the beautiful features of the landscape, but one must not forget that Udaipur literally means "the City of Sunset" and as the day breaks over the valley with its circle of protecting hills, its wooded open spaces with low rugged ranges shattering the even colours, the significance of the title is disclosed. When Akbar sacked Chitor, the Maharana Udai Singh betook himself to this huge natural fortress, and there sprang up on the shores of the lake which he created the walled city that bears his name, and at the same time perpetuates the proud claim that the Udaipur Chiefs are direct descendants of Rama, King of Ajodhya, and are "children of the sun." The sun of Mewar set in bloody splendour at Chitor only to rise again over the Debari Gates that barred access to the Valley wherein Udai Singh clothed himself in strength once more. He built a walled city, he guarded its approaches with forts and towers, and there rose eventually a palace on the shore of the Pachola Lake that bears witness now to the past glories of Mewar. Moslem and Maharatta, Pathan and Pindari harried the Rajput clans; the storm and stress of war surged again and again about Udaipur. Lands were lost and won, fierce internal quarrels laid all Rajasthan open to its enemies, but the "City of Sunset" remained, and once gave shelter to a Moghul Prince whom the world knew later on as the Emperor Shah Jahan. The great temple of Jagannath rose to draw devotees from far and near. The nobles built lordly dwelling places. On the island of the Pachola Lake there sprang up those beautiful waterplaces—the Jagmandir and Jagnawas. In the splendour of isolation Udaipur grew into fame, while Chitor, with its triple-walled defences, its stately structures and massive forts and bastions sank into decay. The Moslem Tower of Victory, which finally crowned its summits, was the seal which the Moghul set upon its ruins. Mewar passed through the fires of desolation, but the spirit of its rulers and its people was never destroyed. We see Udaipur now much as Tod saw it when he committed the description of the palace and city to his "Annals of Rajasthan." The granite and marble walls, the cupola-crowned towers of the Shimbhu Nawas are here now as then; the terraces and arched walls stand as when the thousands of armed men, the horses and elephants of the levies, assembled in time of danger, or on return from war a vast force that could gather within the outplaced defences. The Shimbhu Nawas has grown greater and not less, and the ridge which bears it is covered from end to end with the gleaming white edifices that have been built in the last two hundred years. Maharatta mercenary and Pindari plunderer alike were checked in their victorious careers when the British Raj came slowly but surely to the rescue of Rajasthan. Wellesley and Lake swept Maharatta Chiefs and Pindari freebooters from the country, Amir Khan's Lancers no longer gleamed at pass or river ford, and Mewar had peace. From that day to this the proudest boast of its rulers has been devoted loyalty to the paramount power, and no one has affirmed this more strongly than the present Maharaja, Sir Futeh Singji. His welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales has been, as already said, a most loyal one and it carries with it an open and deep sincerity which cannot be mistaken.

One could linger here many days, never tired of the picturesque beauty of the scene and drinking in all the charm that envelopes Udaipur. The life of the Ghats that are so gently washed by the Pachola Lake, the colour that comes and goes in the bright sunshine as men and women in many hued garments flock to and fro, the sleepy temple steps, the gallop-past of nobles and their retinues on the back of hurrying mounted messengers—all these are part of a wonderful picture. The dark clad figures of the countrywomen, brass bangles almost to the knee; the holiday groups that loiter on their way with gay turban or bright skirt lighting up the dusty road; the wild face of the Bhil, framed in its setting of flowing locks—one sees these and knows that one is in an old-world place which has kept its customs and traditions almost unbroken. Sunrise and sunset come and go, each revealing new marvels that will make Udaipur live in our memories as no other Indian city can live.

This morning the Prince had some shooting in the jungles, the bag being a chikara, three hyenas and four wild boars. The Princess visited the palace and saw the interior with its marble floored and pillared rooms, armoury and terraces. It was a most interesting visit in every way. Her Royal Highness afterwards drove through the gardens and went to the Duffern Hospital, seeing this part of the city again. A quiet afternoon is being spent at the Residency, and the Royal party will leave for Jaipur this evening, the departure being private.

Standard.—His first few days in Bombay, if the visitor has never set foot on the soil of India before, are likely to be a period of delighted amazement and most enjoyable confusion. He wanders about, drinking in the fulness of the new experience perplexed and absorbed by all he sees, trying to wind his ways through the jumble of human types and unfamiliar customs and costumes, borne before him. It has all the elements of novelty even to one to whom "the East" is not quite unknown, and who may have seen something of Egypt and Morocco and the Balkans, and Asia Minor. Bombay is different from any other town outside India; the tourist will presently discover that India itself has nowhere anything quite like the Island City. Bombay is unique—a diluvius gentium, a well into which the races of Asia have poured themselves or, rather, a reservoir out of which they pass as fast as they flow in. It is full of the wealth of the East and the wealth of the West, and of the poverty and vice of both. It has its places fit for a prince and its human kennels unfit for a dog. The hand of Vishnu, the Preserver, and Shiva, the Destroyer, are felt in their might daily. A splendid industrial and commercial activity makes Bombay rich and great, and a canker is working at its vitals. Every tenth person you meet is doomed to swift and painful death by a terrible disease for which science has no remedy. It is the city of the Parsi Millionaire. It is the City of the Plague.

When you have begun to disentangle your first impressions you begin to appreciate the force of the contrasts which Bombay presents. The East and the West, the Old and the New, are here in curious and piquant juxtaposition. A great deal of that part of Bombay which is called the Fort, and is the centre of the European business life, is very modern indeed. There are enormous ranges of huge public buildings, designed with a fine official disregard for all local associations, great blocks of flats and flourishing shops, some of which might have been transported from Bond-street and others brought from the Edgware-road; and there is a life, essentially English and only touching the East at the fringes, in being here. But a few hundred yards away are the bazaars and the native streets, and you are in the heart of Asia. Of course this is true, more or less, of most of the Indian towns; but it is specially felt to be the case in Bombay, because there the Europeans are not shepherded apart in cantonments, or civil lines, or in any separate quarter of their own, but are sandwiched in among the natives physically, at least, in pretty close contact with them. The lines touch at many points, but they do not merge.

"Society" in Bombay, though the Parsis are knocking insistently at its portals, and will not much longer be kept out, is still English in the English orthodox mode. It is more varied in its constituents, more permeated by the commercial element, and less dominated by the official factor, than in other Indian towns, except perhaps Calcutta. But its forms and customs are those to which we cling with fidelity wherever we settle. There are excellent clubs in Bombay, where the stranger, if properly accredited—much meaning in that "if"—will be welcomed with a most agreeable hospitality: there is a relative abundance of ladies' society, and tea parties, lawn tennis parties and dinner parties prevail; people dance, ride, play bridge, and go out with a good pack of hounds to hunt the jackal; they escape the heats of Bombay by ruralising in the hill stations of the Ghâts, or they flit about the coast in smart little yachts.

In the cool garden of the Yacht Club, at the hours of tea and thence onward till dinner-time, the visitor may almost forget that he is in India. If it is on a Friday, the day when the P. and O. liner discharges its complement, the grounds will be thronged, especially during the weeks of the autumn rush eastward. Except for the dark faces and white cotton garb of the servants there is little that is distinctively Oriental. Ladies are parading the green lawns or taking tea and cooling drinks at small tables set out in the terrace, overlooking the shimmering waters of the roadstead. Immediately opposite lies the State grey guardship, and the wall-sided, yellow-funnelled transport. The band of the Blankshire Regiment is playing a selection from "Véronique." The fragrance of cigarette-smoke is wafted into the air; there is the tinkle of feminine laughter and the buzz of many voices; the women are in light European summer dresses; the men have laid aside the sun-helmet, which shelters us from the noon-day heats, and wear the straw hat of normal civilization; we might be on the Riviera, or at some fashionable country club in the United States, or perhaps even at Ranelagh or Hurlingham.

When you have stayed long enough and drunk your tea, and the sudden eastern night has fallen into its pall of blackness, you will assuredly be asked to dine in some luxurious bungalow or well-appointed chambers. Here, it is true, the flavour is slightly more Oriental. The punkahs will be flapping above your head; bare-footed "boys" will minister to you. But though there may be a curry and a local fish, the viands presented to you will be in the main those of home. You will find a menu card, written in the usual culinary French, in front of you; mutton cutlets and partridges and asparagus, and ices, and olives farcies will appear on the list; you will drink Mumm or Heidsieck, and talk about nothing in particular with your neighbour in a subdued undertone. It is a replica of those sparkling repasts with which we exhilarate ourselves during the London season. You will emerge into the starlight with the consciousness of an evening spent in a reputable and decorous dulness.

But get back into your tikka gharry and tell the driver to take you by the Grant Road past the Munba-devi Tank, along Abdul Rahman Street, by the Bendi Bazaar, and about the native quarter generally. You will not lack entertainment, especially if you strike Bombay, as I did, on the eve of a Royal visit, and at the new moon of the month Kartik, which is the Hindu Feast of Lanterns. The entertainment begins even before you leave Malabar Hill, which is the most desirable residential region, where the luxurious bungalows have their place. Many of these have been rented for a fortnight by Native Chiefs and potentates, who have come into Bombay to pay their respects to the Shahzada. They are in a demonstrative mood; they attest their loyalty to the eye and ear. That is why "The Queen Victoria Royal Band" has been brought up to the lawn Bellaggio, and why its Eurasian artists are fiddling, drumming, and fifeing furiously among the flower beds; that is why The Pines is a blaze of light and why its compound is dotted all over with red, green, and white balls of tinsel stock on little poles. If a man is a Raja, and a Ruling Chief, and a K.C.I.E., entitled to be met at the railway station by a Government House aide-de-camp, and to a salute of several guns there is no reason why his presence should not be made known to the world in a perceptible fashion.

The night, indeed, like Prosperous Isle, is "full of noises;" the Indian night always is, even in the quieter suburbs of the towns, for there are the noises of beast and bird, as well as the sounds made by human hands and throats. The field cricket and grasshoppers are chirping with a loud metallic clank; the blue-grey crows, with heads like jackdaws, which you have noticed all day feeding on dead rats and other carrion, retire to their nests with raucous cawings; weird squeals and chatterings are heard from a thicket, and you know—that is, you know when your driver tells you—that it is emitted by the monkeys who are swinging in the boughs.

When you reach the native bazaar, your coachman must drive at a foot pace, with many stoppages. The narrow twisting streets are swarming with people, spreading all over the roadway in close groups, and solid columns. You will make better progress by leaving your carriage and walking; besides, this will give you an opportunity for observing the people whose various types and tribes you are just beginning to appreciate. Your studies have not gone very far, but you make an attempt to classify and select. In India everybody bears the marks of his trade and profession and social status upon his person, so that his mere outward aspect tells you who he is and what he does. It is as if you could wait for the 9-15 up at Ludgate Hill and as the crowd poured through the turnstiles, you could point a finger and say: "Here is a Roman Catholic, here a member of the Church of England, here a Welsh Nonconformist; this man was born in Lancashire and is on the Stock Exchange; that other does something on commission in coals and wine."

There is ample opportunity for such exercises in the Bombay bazaar. Even a novice can distinguish between the bearded Musulman and the hairless Hindu, between the sturdy, upstanding Sikh or Rajput and the Maharatta, with his rat-like profile, little restless eyes, and receding forehead; between the Brahmin with his oval face and pale yellowish skin, and the outcast, despised Mahar, a little blackened wisp of a man, stunted and ape-like. In honour of the festival many of the people have been to the priests and paid their fee to have their caste-mark repainted, so that their foreheads glisten with weird symbols, balls and lines and ovals and smears, of red and yellow.

The expert can tell you something about almost everybody you pass in the throng. Here is a bunniah, or retail trader, with carpet slippers and a big gamp umbrella in his hand. The bunniah is often fat; for, though he lives generally in the native quarter and in the native fashion, he is frequently rich, and wealth means to a Hindu more butter and ghee and rice and sweetmeats and other viands that produce adipose tissue. Here is a man in white jacket and trousers of a somewhat European cut, carrying a child sitting astride his right hip, and followed by a woman in a purple saree, or square of cotton cloth which serves for hood and bodice, and as much skirt as she needs. It is the prosperous upper servant of a well-to-do family, or perhaps the butler at a club, taking his youngest born, and the more favoured of his two wives, out to see the show. He shuffles along, in ungainly fashion, in his canvas shoes; his wife, in her graceful drapery, with her silver earrings and anklets, is certainly a more distinguished figure, and she walks like a princess, but she keeps respectfully a pace or two behind him, and does not speak to her lord except when he turns occasionally to address her over his shoulder. The women of the lower classes in Bombay and elsewhere in India have a dignity of carriage which is denied to their male owners. Some of them, of the coolie grade, are almost pigmies in stature, their heads are towzled and they are black from exposure to the sun, but a wild doe on the mountain-side does not move with more unfettered grace and freedom. The women walk better than the men, for they bear their burdens on their heads, while their partners and proprietors bend and slouch under the weight of heavy loads carried on the shoulders.

The bazaar is always crowded from early morning until late at night; it is always full of people walking, sitting, lying on the ground, jostling against one another like ants. But perhaps the throng is a little more than normal on this Feast of Lamps, the Diwali, which is one of the great festivals of the Hindu year. The Diwali is held in honour of Lakhshmi, the Venus of the Indian Pantheon, the wife of Vishnu, the Preserver. Lakhshmi, like her Hellenic antitype, arose out of the foam of the sea waves, and she is the Goddess of Beauty; but she is also the Goddess of wealth and Prosperity, and is therefore held in special honour by shopkeepers and tradesmen.

On the Feast of Lamps the gains of the year are dedicated to the Goddess, and every house is lighted for her. The large, Europeanised stores in the bazaar, the "cheap jacks," where they sell all sorts of things, from bicycles to safety-pins, the motor garage where the wealthy native buys his up-to-date car, are hung with tiers of electric lights and glow-lamps, but each little square booth has its own small illumination. Every shop is open and lighted, and its owners are seen sitting beside the implements of their trade. The goldsmith has rows of candles to set off his rows of golden bowls, his cups, and chains, and jewellery work; the dhroff, the small money lender or usurer, piles up his account-books in a heap, with a kerosene lamp on top. A white Hindu temple is all festooned with ropes and wreaths of flowers; a yellow Jain chapel sparkles with coloured lights and looks rather like a Paris café, with its open rooms and balconies and lounging groups. Only the Mahometan mosque stands grimly shut and dark and silent; for Diwali is a Hindu festival, and the children of the Faith have no part in it. Indeed there were times when the celebration was a fruitful source of faction fighting and serious riot. But the vigilant Bombay constables, little sturdy men in blue serge, are scattered freely among the crowds, and in the very centre of the whole turmoil, where the chief Mahometan street crosses the Hindu bazaar, there is a small square brick building which is the police post. There are a couple of sepoy talking to a khaki-clad sowar of the mounted force, standing beside his horse ready to ride to the barracks for assistance if required; and against the door post leans a tall young Englishman in white uniform and helmet surveying the passing stream of humanity, with good-humoured, but not inattentive, indifference—a symbol of that impartial tolerance, combined with the vigorous assertion of public authority in the maintenance of order, which is the attitude of the British Raj towards the religions of India.

Times.—As an Oriental pageant the Prince and Princess of Wales can hardly see anywhere in India a more gorgeous spectacle than the one which was presented this morning by the processional road along which they proceeded from the railway to their beautiful quarters in the Jaipur Residency. The route was more than two miles long, but every yard was lined with troops, and retainers of Jaipur State on foot, on horseback, on elephants and on camels. As for the colouring—that simply defies description. Every shade of every colour was there. To one looking down it the road seemed an endless vista of living rainbows. Equally varied were the equipment and accoutrements, from the smart regiment of Deolia, with their scarlet coats, red zouave trousers to the knees, and white spats with orthodox bazpipes and drums, to the wild, half-naked Nagas, whose dark skin and long black hair set off the brilliancy of their scanty crimson or emerald-green vests and short clothes, as, brandishing mediæval swords, they danced their famous war dance all down the road in front of the Royal procession, one troop taking the place of another as soon as the peace began to exhaust even their wiry frames. Here was drawn up in line the Maharaja's ancient camel corps, carrying huge, unwieldy swivel guns. There was his State horses gaily caparisoned with silver headgear and bangles on every leg. There, again, were his elephants with immense silver forehead plates and heads and trunks elaborately painted in curious designs of many colours, their huge limbs almost concealed under cloth-of-gold trappings—over 30 in number, and one the giant among all the elephants of India.

It was, in fact, a scene out of the Indian retainers' pageant in the amphitheatre at the Delhi Durbar, only with more space for display and a less formal setting, the background on this occasion being long avenues fringed with trees and yellow plains with the Jaipur purple hills beyond.

The reception at the station, where the Maharaja and the highest officials and Sardars in State greeted Their Royal Highnesses on the arrival of their train, was short. But a couple of hours later the Maharaja paid a ceremonial visit to the Residency which was almost immediately afterwards returned by the Prince in the Durbar hall at the Maharaja's palace.

The city of Jaipur is not of much more recent date than Udaipur, but whereas Udaipur has up to the present day continued to live its own life amongst the secluded hills of Mewar, and still wears an old-world look of picturesque remoteness, Jaipur, situated on one of the main lines of communication between Bombay and the Punjab, has grown into a busy commercial town of some importance. It was laid out, moreover, by a famous ruler who, nearly two centuries ago, had as great a love of symmetry as the promoter of any model township in the Western States of America. Jai Singh, one of the great Rajput feudatories of the Moghul Empire, carried his love of symmetry not only to the laying out of wide and regular thoroughfares and cross streets in rectangular blocks of equal proportions, but even to the decoration of every house. Except, perhaps, the white marble Hall of Audience in the centre of the Maharaja's huge palace, seven storeys high, Jaipur can boast no marvels of Indian architecture to compare with Udaipur, but the delicate pink madder tone in which the walls and houses of the city are uniformly distempered imparts to the whole scene a distinctive beauty, especially in the subdued light of early morning and late evening quite unlike anything else in India. Admirably, therefore, does Jaipur adapt itself to unrivalled displays of Oriental pageantry.

The great thoroughfares of the city, like the route to the Residency in the early morning, were thronged with picturesque crowds, who saluted Their Royal Highnesses as they drove past with every mark of respect and loyalty.

Some 150 of the highest officials and nobles, in a blaze of silks and satins and jewels, were seated in the Durbar Hall round a great silver canopy, under which were two golden chairs of State for the Prince and the Maharaja, while the retainers who were not entitled to the honour of a seat stood crowding together in the background. The Princess of Wales and the ladies of her suite viewed the brilliant scene from a gallery.

The Maharaja was dressed with great simplicity in an almost black green robe, but with one diamond of extraordinary size and lustre flashing in his turban. With his stately presence and fine commanding features, with beard and moustache just turning grey brushed out on either side in true Rajput fashion, he looked a worthy representative of his ancient race.

If the Kachwaha Rajputs who rule over Jaipur cannot dispute the racial or historical pre-eminence of the Sesodias of Mewar, their present head nevertheless occupies amongst the ruling chiefs of Rajputana—and, indeed, outside of Rajputana too—a prominent place as an enlightened and progressive Prince. Conservative as he is of all that is best in the traditions of his people, he clings less tenaciously than his neighbour of Udaipur to the inherent sanctity of ancient custom. In regard especially to education and sanitation, he has shown himself exceptionally accessible to modern ideas of good government. The hospitals as well as the schools and colleges of the State of Jaipur compare by no means unfavourably with those of British India, and in the beautiful museum designed and built for the Maharaja by Sir Swinton Jacob the city of Jaipur possesses a unique monument to show that there is no necessary incompatibility between the utilitarian requirements of modern architecture and the most faithful adherence to the canons of Indo-Saracenic architecture at its zenith.

The Prince of Wales and the Maharaja remained for a quarter of an hour in animated conversation. Some formal presentations also were made, and finally the Prince and his suite were garlanded with flowers, as also was the Princess of Wales in the gallery. Then the most brilliant Durbar admittedly ever held in Jaipur—which prides itself, even among Indian States, on the pomp and circumstance of its ceremonies—came to an end. It was, indeed, worthy of the occasion.

23RD NOVEMBER 1905.

Daily Mail.—The Prince shot his first tiger this afternoon (23rd November) in the same district where the King accomplished the feat thirty years ago. His Royal Highness drove a team of six horses through sand for a distance of ten miles, and then took an elephant to the "machan", or resting-place of boughs in a tree.

Reports in the morning were not good, no tiger having been killed for some days.

The Prince had hardly taken his place, however, before the tiger appeared. His Royal Highness got a galloping shot under the near shoulder, and finished the quarry off with a second shot. The tiger was a splendid beast, just under 9 ft. in length.

The Maharaja, the Hon. Derek Keppel, Colonel Beaton, Sir Pertab Singh were of the party.

The Prince was using a fine rifle, and, being a keen sportsman, was delighted with his success.

Daily Telegraph.—So much of the Prince of Wales's time here will be spent in a railway carriage—indeed, so much of the great dominion is, of necessity, only known to the most hardened "qui nai?" from the constantly-changing picture that glides past the train windows, that it may be worth while to set down a few notes upon this way of seeing India.

One goes so slowly on an Indian line and, on the whole, so easily that one can watch the passing landscape as comfortably as from a stage coach. And there is always something to see. Early in the first cool dawn you may raise yourself on one elbow to look out across the purple earth to where the first dull crimson and gold is gathering in the East, but even then you will never be early enough to have anticipated the day's labour. The European conception of the Oriental as an easy-going and indolent man, content to get his work done with the least possible exertion to himself, is only a half truth. It is founded on the fact that the Englishman in India, to a great extent, still keeps to his home hours of work and rest, and, therefore, is busiest and most abroad when the Asiatic rests, and is asleep or indoors during the long cool dark hours, when Indian work in field and city alike is being done. The work in the fields may not be hard, but it is day-long and year-long; even the children do their little share from morning to night. Here, in a little plot of millet, bald of even a stalk in places, and stunted from end to end, is a crazy machan or bird-scarer's perch, like a stork's nest, on four bamboo supports, whereon crouches a seven-year-old boy beneath the scanty shade of a ragged piece of soiled cloth. He has no rattle, but he cries out shrilly as a flight of felon birds swoops down like grapeshot on his charge. A small store of stones he employs shrewdly, and to his youthful mind the goose and the peacock have no sacrosanctity above an inquisitive pair of mynas or a flight of hungry linnets. The train itself helps him not at all. The birds and beasts of India in a surprisingly short time have come to accept the train as a noisy but good-natured kind of elephant that never looks either to his right or to his left or leaves the beaten track.

Between the railway line itself and the wire fencing there generally is a no man's land of grey, unfertile soil, a gritty slope on which the "ak" plant flourishes. This is your veritable emblem of India. With its thick glaucous leaves, its stalk clinging white and purple blossoms, it grows as luxuriantly at Landi Kotal as at Palk Straits. No desert soil is too dry, no rock cleft too poor, to nourish this curious shrub; there is not a poorly-developed specimen or even a dried or browned leaf, of the ak from one end of India to the other. Go up to a plant in the most torrid stretch of waterless stone and sand in the peninsula, in such a place that nothing else—not even the white flowered "gos," its nearest rival—can survive, and nap a stem between your fingers. Instantly there is an outrush of white viscous fluid; the very leaves are reservoirs as well. It is one of the inexplicable freaks of Nature, and were it less common, might have been cultivated under a latin name in hothouses at home. For it is a hard-ome plant though unhonoured, and unsung as it is, it remains the pariah flower of India. Hard by, if the ground be poor enough, will be the hard-ome datura, with its large white trumpets amid the strongly-cut deep green foliage. It is a fine weed, and, like the yellow turwar yonder, prefers ruins and dead soils to thrive among. But an ineradicable habit of the Indian peasantry renders it unpopular. He cunningly extracts from it a simple and efficacious poison and any Assistant Commissioner will confess that the "snake-bite" returns of his district are often swollen by the victims of the datura. Beyond this little strip of desert the interest of the land begins.

Near Bombay the Prince's first travel across India will seem east in pleasant and fertile spots. Beneath Salsette and by Kalyan the deep fringed bananas and feathering cocon-nuts rise from such ponds as are illustrated in the geography books of the nursery, and the rich avenues that shade the village streets sweep past with a dignity that is almost English. The crops of maize are 6 ft. high, and the whole face of the country seems copping with excess of rain. But the Reversing Stations near Igatpuri will put a sudden end to the rich promise of the western slopes of the Ghauts. East of these historic mountains the drought of 1905 will be apparent wherever his long and condensed programme of travel takes him, except in the Punjab, except in the irrigated districts of the south, and except also in Burma. One cannot wonder that a dry season means death for thousands here. To the very horizon the dry, wasted plains of India, seamed with arid watercourses, stretch out; to the visitor the lack of fertility will seem to change but little from end to end of the sub-continent, except in those districts which are fed by the gigantic water distributions of man's execution. This wheeling vision of dust and drought is this year the prevailing sight. The scene from an Indian railway carriage window may include almost everything that is most characteristic in the Empire, the tortured waste of waterless nullahs by the Chambat—the fleeting vision of the pearl-like Taj across the river, with which the East Indian closes its long mileage into Agra—the "karroo" of Bikanir—the green tropical vegetation on the Darjeeling railway, crowned by the Himalayan snows—the lush, rank jungle of Madras—the iron thunderings across the sand—bordered trickles that at this season represent the five rivers of the North-West—the waterfalls and ferns of the Khandala gradients—the grinding curves and everlasting smoke-bound tunnels of the Simla Railway, and a hundred others, all true and transient pictures of different sides of Indian life, all are there for him to see; but the vision that he and most Indian travellers will remember best is none of these. It is such a scene as one has seen ten hundred times, the dusty road crossing the track beneath the dusty bel tree on the one side and the now stunted "padwan" on the other. A single iron rail checks a little party, who stare as the train goes by—perhaps a woman drawing her sari's edge across her lips, while she holds in upon her hips her naked child astraddle; perhaps an older child, running up and waving a welcome to the carriages, and a man attending to one of the two bullocks lest it swerve. Perhaps a padfooted camel, heavily laden on either side with packs of coarse sacking; perhaps a rath or zenana bullock-cart closely veiled against both curiosity and the sun. On the dripping telegraph-wires a green parakeet and a flash of white feathers, as two mynas tumble upon a dusty ground with a spread of wings—the eternal whine of the Persian water-wheel, that can hardly be seen under the shade of a dusty banyan across an allotment of dry plough-marks. The sun beats down fiercely upon the scene and the bullocks blink their fly-ringed eyes in the glare; and the drifting red dust floats from under our wheels upon them all as we watch and go by. A cactus hedge, like a line of escaped sea monsters, holds up its green claws and bat-like hands, all unnaturally bloomed at the edge with yellow flowers, and the raw smell of acacia wood comes from a little fire beside the stone posts of the railway fencing. The man who is cooking there does not deign even to turn his head over his shoulder to see us pass. The picture is gone as soon as it has come, and the dull succession of dry red fields, surfaces scratched and bare, succeeds, again broken only by a rare village or the muddy stagnant pool in which a water buffalo wallows, his nostrils alone standing out above the scum of the water.

Much that is inseparable from one's memory of Indian travel, the Prince and the Princesses will perhaps never see. The crowded and confused panorama of a great railway station, the huddled multitudes lying like dum sheep at night and pressing and shouting like another Babel all the day; the long-drawn cries of "Pan bhare-e-e" or "Pani," from the platform hucksters hurrying up and down the strange meeting at wayside stations of men from Seistan or Mogok over the hasty meal, the curious knowledge of obscure junction villages, where half a day has to be wasted before the train comes in. All these and many more will be smoothed away from in front of the Royal visitors. Still, the unfolding vision of the Indian plains remains.

Englishman.—To-day (November 22nd) was almost wholly given over to shikar and the Prince had his first shot at a tiger. The conditions were unpromising. Although tiger were known to be in the vicinity, there was no news of recent kill, and it was at one time doubtful if any attempt would be made. After lunch, however, it was decided to have a try and the Prince accompanied by General Stuart Beaton and the Hon. Derek Keppel started. They drove from the first ten miles, teams of six horses being required to draw the carriages over the sand. Then mounting one elephant they proceeded to the machans and the beat commenced. The country was sandy and covered with scrubs, which gave a fair amount of cover. The tiger was on the move when the shooting party arrived and very soon a fine beast came galloping through the scrub. The Prince's first shot struck him in the spine, the next hit him just behind the near shoulder and a third shot bowled him over. It turned out to be a fine specimen of "stripes" just under nine feet long. The Prince's first tiger, and indeed his first big game, was killed with a facility the oldest shikari might envy. The tiger was about 120 yards from his machan, and galloping, by no means an easy shot, but the Prince's first bullet practically settled him. Curiously enough His Royal Highness's father killed his first tiger at Jaipur on his memorable tour in India. The Prince, who is a thorough sportsman and enters upon his shikar with every zest, was delighted with his afternoon, as indeed he had every reason to be. The party at once returned to the Residency.

Mr. Stotherd, the State Engineer, who so worthily carries on the splendid work of Sir Swinton Jacob, and Captain Wigram, Aide-de-Camp, organised a little pig sticking for the staff of the Royal Highnesses and such of the visitors who cared to join. Two parties were made up, the first under Captain Wigram including Lord Crichton, Sir Arthur Bigge and Sir Pratap Singh, and the second under Mr. Stotherd, Mr. Dugdale and Lord Shaftesbury. A start was made from the Residency about half past five o'clock, in that darkest hour before the dawn. Horses and ponies were in readiness, generously provided by His Highness the Maharaja with an abundance of beaters, and a move was at once made for the cover where piggy had been marked down. Both parties enjoyed an excellent morning's sport. The country round Jaipur is an excellent morning country with no pitfall except one bad nullah which was carefully avoided. Pig were plentiful, and the Maharaja mounted his guests well. In the course of the morning the two parties accounted for nine pig, which though vary in calibre gave them some hard galloping. All returned to the Residency fully appreciating the kindness of Mr. Stotherd, who not only made complete arrangements for every one's comfort, but gave the visitors all the best of the sport.

While piggy was being ridden hard on the outskirts of the town, sport of a very different character was in progress in the Atishi or palace stables. Animals of all sorts, sambhur, black buck, cheetal, rams, and bulls were admitted into an arena and pitted one against the other. Excepting, however, the rams and the bulls, none of the animals entered into the spirit of the game, and the latter were let into the arena and held with ropes so that they should not seriously hurt each other. But frankly this is not a pastime over which it is possible to enthuse. It lacks every element which goes to provide sport in the true English sense of that much abused term, the elements of personal skill, address, courage and perhaps risk, and it cannot be rated higher than the cock-fighting and bull-baiting of our forefathers. The small company which gathered round the arena included neither His Royal Highness nor the Princess of Wales, nor it can be said that they were either edified or amused.

In the evening the town was brilliantly illuminated and a state banquet was held at the palace at which the interesting speeches were made by the Maharaja and the Prince, the former announcing a further donation of 4 lakhs to the famine fund.

Indian Daily News.—The scenes which marked the arrival of the palace he drove through a city of wide thoroughfares laid out on modern lines, with buildings of rose pink, ornamented with designs in white. Windows and doorways were outlined in chalk, and floral and other designs filled up the available spaces of the walls. A number of triumphal arches crossed the broad roads, which were lined with masts and banners, and mottoes of welcome abounded. "Hail to the noble Prince," "Joy, Joy, Joy," "Happy be their stay," "Britain's power is the joy of India." These were some of the devices that flamed into view and the streets were lined with masses of brightly dressed folk. Reaching the palace the Royal cortege proceeded through handsome gateways and noble courtyards to a series of inner courts leading to the hall of audience. At the first of these all but the Prince and those with him in the Royal carriage alighted, escorting the Royal equipage on foot through winding ways and lines of retainers in saffron raiment to the inner court, reached through a gateway of shining brass. Lines of scarlet clothed men, backed by others in vivid green, flanked the path through the broad court to the steps of the hall of audience at the opposite end. The pillared hall lavishly decorated, opened to the quadrangle, and in its centre stood a wonderful canopy of gold and silver metal work supported by pillars, and enclosed at the base by railings and gates of gold giving access to the two thrones placed beneath the canopy. A great crystal chandelier hung in front of the thrones. The hall was thronged by darbaris in the richest raiment, the Tazmi Sardars, nobles whom the Maharaja always receives standing, being conspicuous for the brilliance and picturesqueness of the vestments they wore, coats profusely embroidered with gold braid, white muslin, kilted shirts and tight trousers of gold and iridescent stuffs. The splendour of the scene was completed by the lines of scarlet robed men extending from the steps of the audience hall to the gateway of the court. Recalling typical pictures of Indian courts, the darbar impressed itself upon the minds of the Royal party as the finest and most brilliant scene yet presented to them. The ceremonials incidental to the exchange visit did not occupy much time. The Prince and the entourage were garlanded and His Royal Highness took his seat beside the Maharaja beneath the Royal canopy, and they conversed together for a few minutes. Thereafter His Royal Highness departed under a Royal salute, and when the sound of the guns had died away the Maharaja left his throne to the strains of a weird native air played by the band and the splendours of the court were quickly dissipated.

Leaving the palace the Prince of Wales drove through the city by another route to the Albert Hall, where he joined the Princess who had been paying visits to the Museum and other institutions. Their Royal Highnesses returned together to the Residency.

Pioneer.—The night journey from Udaipur to Jaipur was made without incident. Torch-bearers were again stationed along the line, and the Royal progress was thus notified to all the country-side, but the population is sparse, for a good deal of jungle is passed through and the shadow of famine rests over the cultivated tracts. The railway station at Jaipur itself showed bags of grain heaped upon the goods platform and other signs of traffic arising out of the assembly of the Sirdars and their retainers here. Not that all have come by any means, for difficulties with the supply of forage have served to keep many away. It is ill-fortune that this should be so, for from every distant corner of the Jaipur State loyal subjects would have flocked to aid their Chief in welcoming the Prince and Princess of Wales. As matters now stand, relief works have been started for the benefit of the more indigent sections of the people, though with good winter rains severe famine will not have to be faced.

Shortly before 8 o'clock this morning a salute announced that the Maharaja had left his palace for the railway station. Part of his route lay through the lines of troops and retainers that kept the roads. Presently His Highness appeared in his State carriage, drawn by four horses, and the quick rattle of kettle drums, the shrill blare of the trumpets heralded his approach all along the line. The Maharaja, a fine dignified figure, wore a dark green coat richly embroidered in gold, with the insignia and ribbon of his G. C. S. I. A golden canopy with green and gold silk hangings, was attached to the body of the carriage and shone resplendent in the morning sun. His Sirdars had already assembled at the station in their handsome darbar dresses. Punctually at 8-30 the Royal train drew up and the guard-of-honour presented arms, while another salute was fired by the State artillery as the Prince alighted. The Maharaja, and his twelve leading Sardars were the central group in the scene. Mr. Colvin introduced His Highness to the Prince, and most cordial greetings were exchanged. Then the Agent to the Governor-General continued his introductions, presenting Colonel Herbert, the Resident, and his Political staff. The Maharaja was introduced to the Princess, and among the presentations afterwards made were Colonel Sir Swinton Jacob, whose name is inseparably connected with modern Jaipur, Colonels Drummond and Pank, Mr. Stotherd, and Captains Fagan and Souter, of the Imperial Service Troops staff. In the first carriage when the party left the station were the Prince, the Maharaja and Sir Walter Lawrence; in the second the Princess, Sir Arthur Bigge and Mr. Colvin. The suite and staff followed in the other carriages, the whole procession being escorted by the well-appointed cavalry of the Deoli Regiment, together with the cadets of the Mayo College, Ajmer, who looked extremely smart in white uniform, with blue and silver turbans. A triumphal arch spanned the road just outside the station. The route taken to the Residency was over 2 miles in length, and from end to end it was lined with State troops and retainers of various kinds. It presented a scene which called to mind the Retainers' Review at the Delhi Durbar, and showed in many of its features a barbaric splendour that is all too surely passing away. Bands of Nagas, long, lithe men of wild aspect with ochre-stained faces and limbs half-draped in green or yellow cloth, danced and engaged in mock combats before the carriages, handling sword and shield in savage fashion. Shikaris, some in red, others in vivid orange or green, stood with coloured wands and matchlocks in green velvet covers. Horsemen with old muzzle-loaders across their knees and talwars at their sides were seen by hundreds. Banners, with the five Jaipur colours (red, white, black, yellow and green) were unfurled. On the right came the State elephants standing impassively with magnificent trappings and howdahs, their painted heads half-hidden by silver chains, the fish emblem given by the Delhi Emperors gleaming as it gleamed centuries ago. Opposite these were the led horses, gorgeously caparisoned, and with gold or silver bangles above their fetlocks or knees. Small field guns, drawn by bullocks almost hidden in green cloth, came next; then camels with several guns, carriages, ekkas and palanquins. A few men in armour were visible now and again with more Nagas ever ready with their warlike dance. Thousands of the city people watched the procession, and where buildings were passed there was the usual crowding on the roof and at the window. The State troops again appeared as the Residency gate was approached, men in khaki, red and rifle green presenting arms. A detachment of artillery, men in forage caps with spikes, were not the least noticeable. A last band of Nagas danced up to the gate and then the carriages and escort came into the beautiful grounds of the Residency. At the entrance to the house a guard-of-honour of the Deoli Regiment was drawn up, fine well set up men in zouaves, red and white gaiters and rifle-green tunics. They looked the picture of soldierly smartness, and their pipers played the National Anthem with spirit. In such manner came the Prince and Princess to Jaipur amidst all the pomp and ceremony that should mark a Royal arrival. The Maharaja shortly took his leave, the "Mizaj Pursi" enquiry followed, and there was an end for a little time of ceremonies. The kettle-drums and trumpets had ceased the stirring sounds of welcome, and the troops and retainers were marching.

This afternoon the Prince received an address from the Ajmer Municipality. It expressed appreciation of the ready sympathy which His Royal Highness had shown in unhesitatingly foregoing his visit to Ajmer on account of the famine. At the same time universal sorrow was felt that such an honour had necessarily to be denied to the people of the city. The history of Ajmer was then recounted, and the address continued:—

"The century of strife and blood-hed which witnessed the declining of the Moghul power brings into strong relief those blessings of British Government which the city and province have now enjoyed for close upon a hundred years. The year 1818, the date of the British occupation, marks the end of the long roll of battles and sieges and begins a period of peaceful progress, chequered only by the famines to which the province has always been unhappily liable, but which are now greatly mitigated by the prompt and liberal humanity of the Imperial Government. No thoughtful citizens of Ajmer can look back upon the past century of British rule without thankfulness or look forward to the future without hope. No longer confined within their walls by the fierce struggles of Rahrors and Maharattas, or by the fear of Pindari freebooters, the citizens of Ajmer have waxed greatly in number and prosperity. Since 1884, with the powers of municipal self-government in Merwara, whose ragged hills, inhabited only by raiding mountaineers, were an unknown and impenetrable jungle before 1818, here has sprung up the thriving commercial town of Beawar; founded in 1835 by Colonel Dixon, whose name is still a household word in the surrounding district, nor has Ajmer ceased under British rule to enjoy the special favour of an Imperial Government greater and more beneficent than any India has yet seen, a government upon which it has claims alike by reason of its historic associations, its administrative and strategic importance and the charms of its climate and situation. The casket which contains this most loyal and humble address supports a model of one of the marble pavilions built by the Emperor Shah Jehan, which has already been restored to its original splendour by the generous interest of the Government of India. The designs upon the sides of casket represent the Ana Sagar Lake, the ancient Arhai-din-ka Jhonpra, or structure of the two and a half days, the shrine of the Dargah Khwaja Sahib, an object of pilgrimage to Mahomedans from all parts of the world, and lastly the Mayo College, not the least signal proof of the anxious desire of the British Government for the enlightenment and good administration of the Native States of Rajputana, as well as of the hereditary landholders of the Ajmer district. We respectfully beg the acceptance by Your Royal Highnesses both of our heartfelt welcome and of this address and casket which, we trust, may be a symbol to Your Royal Highnesses of the universal love and loyalty with which the people of Ajmer in common with the whole population of India regard the members of your Royal House, which is to them, as it is to all India, the symbol of peace, justice and prosperity."

His Royal Highness, in replying, said:—

"Gentlemen,—In the name of the Princess of Wales and on my own behalf I thank you for the expressions of hearty greeting and goodwill which are contained in your address. You have already received from me the message of sympathy which I sent to you from England, and if anything could add to our sincere regrets that we should be receiving you here in Jaipur and not in your own city, it is the very charming description which you have given of Ajmer's history and attractions. We both feel strongly for you in your troubles, and after the long series of your misfortunes we hope that a happy period of prosperity is in store for Ajmer and Rajputana. The designs on the casket will serve as an imperishable record of the beautiful architecture of Ajmer, and I am glad to read of the restoration of Shah Jehan's pavilion. I am equally interested to hear of the Mayo College. You may well be proud to have such an institution in your midst. Both of these will be for all time associated with the name and energies of your late Viceroy, Lord Curzon. Your historical sketch is one from which both you and I draw satisfaction, and I shall be very glad to acquaint the King-Emperor with your loyal expressions. It will be a pleasure to him, as it is to us, to know that you regard his house as the symbol of peace, justice and prosperity."

Times.—With the picturesque and the historical side of the Prince's visit to Udaipur the telegram published in The Times of November 20th has dealt fully. But there is still something to be said regarding the existing political conditions of Rajputana and the relations of its Chiefs to the British Government during the Mutiny of 1857 and since. If Central India still shows in its patchwork of States the marks of Maharatta or Pindari ravages, of the rebellious Viceroy and the successful adventurer, it is otherwise with Rajputana. There a territory more than half as large again as that of over 70 Central India States is divided between only 19, of which 16 are held by the ancient Rajput aristocracy of India. Two more—Bharatpur and Dholpur—belong to Jat princes. Tonk alone has a Mahomedan ruler, the descendant of Amir Khan, the famous Pindari leader, who, when he submitted to the British in 1818, was settled in a kingdom largely quarried from the territories of his ally Holkar. The larger part of it belongs to Central India, and the State owes its place in Rajputana chiefly to the position of its capital. The inclusion in it of the Nimshera district was unfortunate, as Udaipur looked upon that as its own, and the Maharana was again disappointed when it was decided in 1858, that he could not be allowed to reoccupy it. During the eventful days of 1857-58 the British incurred a great obligation to Maharana Sarup Sing of Udaipur, and to the other two great Rajput chiefs, Maharajas Takht Sing of Jodhpur and Ram Sing of Jaipur. With one or other of the great houses represented by these three names are intimately connected all the remaining 13 Rajput States. To them, the smaller principalities look for guidance, and the pre-eminence of Udaipur, at least in point of nobility of descent, is recognized by all Hindu India.

In Central India, as a rule, the governing race is alien from the bulk of the people. In Rajputana, on the other hand, the ruling chief occupies rather the position of the acknowledged head of a homogeneous population mostly connected by the ties of a common descent. There are great feudal nobles a few of whom took the opportunity of troublous times to push their own claims, though generally speaking they followed the chief to whom they owed allegiance, and from whom they expected guidance. When mercenary Hindustani troops in the service of the States joined the great revolt, they felt that Rajputana was a country where they could have little hope of prospering without the support of Government, whose strength lay in their alliance with the bulk of the people, not, as in the case of Mahomedan and Maharatta States, on the force represented by these troops themselves. Therefore the disaffected from Rajputana streamed off to Delhi and Agra when they saw that the general sympathy of the country was against them. There was no need for a Rajputana Field Force like that of Central India to quell rebellion and 400 British soldiers sufficed as a European reinforcement. It would have been very different had the three great Rajput leaders not distinguished themselves by the most conspicuous loyalty. It has already been shown how Udaipur offered a harbour of refuge to the refugees from the Central India garrison of Nimach, in the reoccupation of which place the loyal troops of the State under the guidance of English officers played a notable part. Jodhpur loyally assisted in the suppression of the Thakur of Alwa, whose rebellion was directed as much against his own immediate Sovereign as against the British. The Raja of Kotah was a prisoner in the hands of his own rebellious mercenaries, and was unable to prevent the massacre of the British Resident and his sons. Yet there was no suspicion of his personal loyalty. In the clash of arms around Delhi and Lucknow, attention was diverted from events in Rajputana. That those events never became prominent or serious is due mainly to the unswerving loyalty of the Rajput chiefs. At the same time it would be unjust to ignore the part played by the aboriginal Mers and Bhils despised by Hindu and Mahomedan alike, who stood steadfastly by the race from which they received toleration and recognition. A troop of a rebel Bengal cavalry regiment was disarmed by the Bhil corps at Kherwara. As they moved to Udaipur, intent probably on further mischief, the Bhils of the wild hills, acting on a hint from their comrades of the Bhil corps, are said to have wiped out the disaffected troopers.

In a country so distinguished by its loyalty to the British the Prince's reception will certainly be one of peculiar enthusiasm amongst people with whom the traditions of personal sovereignty are especially strong. It may be asked why the British should have succeeded in awakening a loyalty which Mahomedan and Maharatta alike failed to enlist. Towards the Mahomedan Emperors, to whom they submitted after a noble struggle for freedom, the Rajput chiefs could feel no real affection. They had suffered oppressions and cruelties from them the recollection of which could not be wiped out by any attempts at conciliation, and even those States which, unlike Udaipur, yielded their daughters as wives to the conquerors did so with a bad grace. The Maharattas at least had the tie of a common religion, and would fain have established a blood connexion. Sivaji claimed a Rajput descent, and Maharatta princes of much later date have sought in vain for recognition of family ties with the reigning houses of Udaipur or Jaipur. But, if Rajputana suffered at the hands of the Mahomedan conquerors, it suffered still more from the Hindus of the Deccan.

With the British the case was different. They came into touch with the great chiefs of Rajputana at a time when their great object was not so much annexation as settlement of the elements of disturbance in Central India and Rajputana. They sought no social alliances, and, if they did not offer a restoration of what had already been taken by Mahomedan or Maharatta, they at least held out a guarantee against future aggression. The Rajput, a man of honour himself, soon recognized that he had met another whom he could trust and on confidence, increasing year by year, is built his friendship. When in 1857 it came to a question of adhesion to his new friends or support of their enemies, he never hesitated.

Since then the British Government has had many opportunities of showing its good will towards the Rajput and Jat rulers. Only a few years ago, one had to be deposed for persistent misgovernment, but there was no thought of forfeiture of the State, which was restored, in accord with native sentiment, partly to the State, of which it was an offshoot, and partly to descendants of that State's great Minister, to whom it had been granted. So, too, the possessions of a chief who was found guilty of murder were preserved and restored to order for his infant son.

Unfortunately, drought presses heavily on Rajputana this year, and last week's telegram announces the declaration of actual famine in Jodhpur and in Dholpur. Every Chief would have welcomed a visit from the Prince, but many of them are poor, and the tour has wisely been curtailed. The Prince will visit Jaipur, as his father did thirty years ago, but he will only pass by train through the enclave of British territory of which Ajmer is the capital. In the Maharaja of Jaipur he will meet again a ruler whose figure, clad on state occasions in the quaint costume so characteristic of his part of the country, was a very familiar one in London three years ago. Any one who could be dropped down suddenly in Jaipur might well imagine himself in a city in which some American had been experimenting in the arrangement of Eastern houses in the regular parallelism of Philadelphia or Chicago. Yet, when Jai Sing laid out his city the Pennsylvanian capital had been founded but a few years, and the great commercial centre on Lake Michigan was undreamed of.

In population Jaipur stands first of the Rajput States, though in area it falls far short of Jodhpur, which also enjoys a larger revenue, not, however, in proportion to its excess of area, much of which is sandy waste. Jodhpur falls outside the line of tour, as does far-off Jaisalmer. The former is probably connected in the minds of most Englishmen with that typical Rajput soldier and gentleman, Sir Partab Sing, now head of the Idar State, lying further south amongst the Bombay States, but intimately connected with Jodhpur.

In Bikanir will be seen a good example of one of the minor States. The young Maharaja came of age some seven years ago. Of the same stock as that of the Jodhpur family, he is typical of the Western chiefs governing States much of which is but poor country, lying as they do on the borders of the desert, and even in their best parts not comparable in fertility with the States of Malwa. One product of a sandy country he has been able to offer for the service of the Empire in the camel corps, in which he has taken so much personal interest and which has proved itself so useful.

Amongst the States to which a visit is impossible are Kotah and its offshoot Jhallawar, Tonk, the one Mahomedan State, and the group of principalities represented by Dungarpur and Banswara, whose rulers belong to the same clan as the Maharana of Udaipur. Alwar lies off the route, as does Bhartpur. Dholpur, with its famine on hand, could not afford the expense entailed by a visit, but the inhabitants of its capital will at least have a chance of seeing the Royal party as they pass, next month, from Agra to Gwalior.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Sometime ago it was announced that Their Royal Highnesses would be the guests of Lord Kitchener during their visit to Rawalpindi, and the announcement gave us much pleasure as the discovery that Lord Kitchener had decided to pitch a great camp at Kanna for his Royal guests. Thus the Prince and Princess of Wales will rest in the heart of our Indian Army which in truth is their natural place. A triumphal arch is in course of construction at the Railway station where Their Royal Highnesses will be met, and the roads in cantonments through which they will travel en route to Kanna will be decorated.

24TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—In the evening the town Jaipur was brilliantly illuminated, and a state banquet was held at the palace at which interesting speeches were made by the Maharaja and the Prince, the former announcing a further donation of four lakhs to the famine fund.

His Highness the Maharaja, in proposing the health of His Royal visitors, said:—

"Nearly thirty years have passed and gone since Your Royal father, His Majesty the King-Emperor, then the Prince of Wales, paid a visit to Jaipur. My predecessor, Maharaja Ram Singh, was then Maharaja of Jaipur. Now it is my good fortune to have the distinguished honour of welcoming Your Royal Highness to this city, the home of my ancestors, where I trust the strenuous efforts made to render Your Royal Highness's stay memorable will be successful.

"A most felicitous circumstance in connection with this occasion is the presence of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, whom we most cordially greet. We meet here not as strangers, but as friends, for when I made what to me was that most memorable voyage across the ocean to be present at the coronation of His Majesty the King-Emperor, I had the pleasure of making your acquaintance, and I can assure Your Royal Highness that remembering the kindness and courtesy you showed me on that occasion when I was far away from my native land I do most heartily and with the warmest feelings I am capable of welcome you here.

"I am sorry to say that owing to the failure of the rains this year there is distress in Jaipur, so that, much to my regret, Your Royal Highness's reception has not been on such a scale as I most earnestly desired it should be, and such as I deemed worthy of the occasion. However, I am confident Your Royal Highness understands the circumstances and believe that my loyalty and ardent devotion to the Throne are not to be measured by any outward display.

"When His Majesty the King-Emperor was here nearly thirty years ago he laid the foundation-stone of what is now the Albert Hall built in memory of that visit. I am extremely desirous that in like manner there should be some permanent memory of Your Royal Highness's visit on this occasion. In pondering over the matter I came to the conclusion that no more fitting record of Your Royal Highness's visit, or one more pleasing to yourself, could be made than that I now venture to propose. I doubt not Your Royal Highness is aware that in 1899 a fund named 'The Indian People's Famine Trust' was established. The interest of this fund is available for relief of those who may be suffering from famine in any part of India. I intend with the gracious permission of Your Royal Highness, to add to that fund the sum of three lakhs of rupees; and the Maharani in memory of the visit of Her Royal Highness, who is the first Princess of Wales who ever came to India, begs permission to supplement this by giving a sum equal to that which she gave to this fund at the time of the coronation ceremonies at Delhi, viz., one lakh of rupees. These four lakhs of rupees we intend shall be a memory of Your Royal Highness's visit to Jaipur.

"I am glad that the arrangements made for the tiger-hunt have been successful and that Your Royal Highness has bagged one tiger which will remain a trophy of the event. His Majesty the King, when he came to Jaipur, killed his first tiger here. I consider it a most happy coincidence that Your Royal Highness has this day also killed your first tiger since coming to India. "I do not wish to detain you longer but may I be allowed before closing to wish Your Royal Highness much pleasure and enjoyment on this Indian tour.

"I am sure your presence amongst us will knit us more closely to the Throne if that were possible, and I am sure your interest in this important part of the Empire will greatly be enhanced.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I invite you to drink the health of my illustrious guests. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales."

The Prince in reply said:—

"The Princess of Wales and I are sincerely touched by the feeling words in which Your Highness has proposed our healths, and we are grateful to you, ladies and gentlemen, for the manner in which you have responded to this toast.

"Happily we can claim Your Highness as an old friend, for in all the brilliant company which assembled in London to take part in the coronation of the King-Emperor there was no more striking, or respected personality than that of the Maharaja of Jaipur. His retinue on that occasion—for His Highness travelled to England with all the circumstances of a Rajput Chief and the observances of a great Hindu—prepared us in some measure for the feudal splendours which we see around us in this exquisite capital. But we had no idea of Jaipur itself, its perfect city and the well-ordered administration of the State. We have most unfortunately arrived in Your Highness's country when your people are threatened with scarcity, but the Chief who, with noble munificence, founded the Indian People's Famine Fund, may well be trusted to see that every measure shall be taken to alleviate the wants of his own subjects. And we have listened with feelings of the deepest satisfaction to Your Highness's announcement that you and the Maharani intend to commemorate our visit to Jaipur by respectively presenting three lakhs and one lakh of rupees to the Indian People's Famine Fund. We are greatly touched by this fresh proof of Your Highness's generosity and of your sympathy with those in distress. Believe me that no building—indeed no form of memorial of our visit—could be more acceptable to us than this addition to the funds of the great national work of mercy of which you yourself were the founder.

"I was much interested yesterday in seeing the Imperial Service Transport Corps which is maintained by you in so efficient a condition primarily for the defence of India. I rejoice to think that the corps has been able to win laurels not only in military campaigns but also in the strenuous war which His Highness wages against famine.

"The hospitality of the Rajputs is proverbial, and we shall carry away with us the happiest recollections of our stay in Jaipur, and I shall always remember with the greatest pleasure that I shot my first tiger in your forest.

"In conclusion I wish to convey to Your Highness the message entrusted to me by the King-Emperor, who desires me to express his fervent hope that you and your State may in the future enjoy all possible blessings and prosperity.

"I call upon you, ladies and gentlemen, to join with us in drinking the health of our friend the Maharaja of Jaipur, and in wishing that he may long be spared to his subjects and to India."

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Calcutta Port Commissioners have sanctioned Rs. 20,000 for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on their arrival in Calcutta.

The Naval Commander-in-Chief is expected to arrive at Calcutta about the 18th December with the Hyacinth and Perscus. The For will come later on.

Englishman.—Does it seem unappreciative to say that it is unfortunate in one sense that the Prince and Princess of Wales visited Jaipur so early in their tour? The City of Sunrise is such an exquisitely fashioned and perfect gem that almost every other Indian town suffers by comparison with it. And certainly Jaipur with its painted walls and stucco houses seemed even more unreal and artificial than usual after a delightful sojourn at the house of the Home of the House of Mewar? But this impression has worn off with acquaintance, and one has come to see that Jai Singh in laying out his hundred-foot streets, painting all the houses pink and insisting on an absolutely uniform style of architecture had an eye for decorative effect, artificial, perhaps, but extraordinarily picturesque in softer lights. So indeed it was last night when the city and its suburbs were splendidly illuminated in honour of the Royal visit. The Tiger Fort, which occupied such a commanding position on the ridge to the north-west of the city, was outlined in shimmering light and its scarped face bore a gigantic welcome to the Royal pair. On the trees lining the broad road from the station to the city hung thousands of coloured lanterns glowing softly in the dust haze. Then the city itself was ablaze with tiny butties whose light owing to the width of the streets was even more mellow than is customary. Through these graceful scenes the guests of the Maharaja drove to the palace for the State banquet last night.

The banquet was remarkable in many respects. It was splendidly served in the handsome Hall of Audience and everyone was delighted at the success of the Prince on his first pursuit of big game. But nothing was more noteworthy than the intense pride and joy of the Maharaja in the entertainment of the Royal guests. He eagerly awaited them at the entrance hall and conducted them to the chairs of State. His Royal Highness was in evening dress with the ribbon of the Star of India, and the Princess, a truly regal figure, was magnificently gowned wearing a magnificent necklace and tiara of diamonds. Then when the curtains of cloth of gold were rolled back and Their Royal Highnesses passed into the Banqueting Hall, the Maharaja remained in the reception room, conversing with his ministers whilst dinner was in progress. As soon as the wine was on the table, he rejoined the Prince and himself proposed the health of His Majesty the King-Emperor, standing, a fine, dignified, courteous figure, whilst his Minister read the speech proposing the health of the Royal visitors. In all this there was a dominant personal note. The Maharaja met and was received with every consideration and courtesy by the Prince and Princess of Wales on his visit to England for the Coronation ceremony. To the honour of entertaining the Heir-Apparent and his consort was added the privilege of returning the kindness of valued friends, and the Maharaja showed his appreciation of it in every look and gesture.

After the speeches a charmingly informal hour was spent in the inner courtyard of the palace, where a band of native musicians played in the plaintive minor key which distinguishes all Indian music, and Their Royal Highnesses entered into unrestrained conversation with all who are doing good work in Jaipur in whatsoever capacity. But the centre of royal interest was the Prince's tiger, which was borne in on a charpoy and admired, whilst old sportsmen pointed out how cleanly and well His Royal Highness's rifle had done its work. Very pleasant it was, too, to notice Her Royal Highness's keen pleasure in the spoil of her royal husband's rifle. The Princess of Wales, whilst dignified and stately in repose, has a singularly bright and gracious air when animated. She enjoyed the telling of the story of the afternoon as much if not more than His Royal Highness himself, and lent a ready ear to all who could speak with authority on the merits of the afternoon's sport. It was, indeed, one of those rare hours when the reserve their exalted station imposes upon the members of the royal family was brushed aside for the moment and one caught a glimpse of that simple family life which does so much to endear the royal house to their subjects.

As news of tiger was received from two quarters, it was hoped that His Royal Highness might repeat his success of yesterday. The most encouraging reports came from Sangar, about five miles from Jaipur, where a tiger was located, and soon after eleven o'clock the Prince left for the rendezvous by special train. But it was not to be, for only half-an-hour before His Royal Highness arrived the brute broke away and disappeared. Recognising at once that this was to be a blank day His Royal Highness returned to the Residency. It was thought that Her Royal Highness might like to visit the ruins of the city of Amber, four miles from Jaipur, which was abandoned by Jai Singh when he built the present capital of the State, but the Princess preferred to remain quietly at the Residency, whence the Royal train left privately for Bikanir at six o'clock. Many did, however, visit Amber, and came to the conclusion that whatever his merits as a builder, Jai Singh was a Goth to leave Amber for Jaipur.

Only one circumstance has tended to affect the complete success of the visit. The last rains were extremely scanty and the shadow of scarcity hangs over large areas of Jaipur. Good winter rains would still save the situation, but if these fail hard times are in store for many of the peasantry. Signs of acute distress are not yet apparent, and the prices of food grains are moderate. Should famine conditions unfortunately supervene, the remedy may be left with confidence to the ruler who has bust up the people's famine trust and who met the great famine of 1899 with a generosity splendid in even that memorable year.

Bikanir for several weeks past has been busily preparing for the Prince of Wales' visit and the arrangements are now complete. The Maharaja has personally superintended all the preparations and the splendid new Lallgarh palace of red sandstone has been completely renovated and is now as luxurious and beautiful a residence as can well be imagined. Around the palace is a large and perfectly arranged camp for the staff and the guests who are assembling to meet the royal party. The camp is lit by electric light. The palace grounds are bright with bunting and altogether the sight is a most picturesque and delightful one.

The arrival to-morrow is timed for 8-30 A.M. The railway station has been tastefully decorated and the procession along the route to the palace promises to be a brilliant spectacle. Hundreds of Rajput nobles with their gaily dressed and barbaric retainers have arrived from the desert and seated on camels will line a considerable portion of the road to-morrow morning. The rest of the route on which numerous triumphal arches have been erected will be guarded by the Imperial Service Troops, the Maharaja's irregular soldiery, and a number of men on camels in chain armour, the splendid Camel Corps being drawn up along the last quarter mile leading into the palace gardens. The Prince and Princess will be escorted by a troop of Lancers and by a special section of the Camel Corps. The rehearsal this morning was a wonderful sight and reminded spectators in a striking manner of the scenes at the Delhi Durbar.

To-morrow afternoon the Royal party will proceed to Gujnr, 21 miles from the capital, where a delightful shooting camp has been arranged, and in the evening the Prince will enjoy two or three hours' duck shooting. On Saturday morning His Royal Highness will have a sand grouse shoot. The birds are reported to have made their annual appearance in huge numbers and a record bag may be expected. Some forty small tanks covering all the ground in the neighbourhood of Gujnr will be stopped, and thus the grouse will be driven to seek water on the Gujnr lake. A second morning's sport will be provided on Monday morning. The old palace at Gujnr has been converted into a perfect shooting box and most of the party will proceed out in motor cars along a perfect road which will be watered throughout its entire length. Their Royal Highnesses will return to Bikanir on Monday afternoon, and the Prince will then review the Imperial Service and State troops. The State banquet which will be held that evening will take place in the old city palace in the banqueting hall, and the departure is timed from 11 o'clock p.m.

Judging from the completeness of the arrangements the Bikanir visit should prove an unqualified success.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—This morning the members of the Royal entourage went out pigsticking and had excellent sport, one party securing four and another six boar. Other members of the party visited the Maharaja's stables and witnessed animal combats in an arena. They included cock-fighting and encounters between pairs of cheetal, black buck, sambar stags, buffaloes and wild boar. The sports on the whole were tame, men holding the animals by ropes. The exhibition concluded with a display by performing birds, a cockatoo firing off a small cannon. Neither the Prince nor the Princess was present at these sports. If news of tiger is satisfactory, His Royal Highness will go out shooting this afternoon. To-night a banquet will be held at the palace.

The Prince of Wales succeeded in securing his first tiger yesterday afternoon. The prospect of a tiger shoot was doubtful owing to the fear that the game had been alarmed by the frequent firing of salutes during the past few days, but in the forenoon satisfactory news was received and the Prince drove out to the jungle about 12-30 accompanied by General Beatson, Sir Pertab Singh, and a few others. The spot where the tiger had been marked down was about ten miles from Jaipur, and after driving some distance the party proceeded on elephants to the machans. After a wait of about two hours the beat was successful, a tiger appearing in the scrub jungle about four hundred yards from where the Prince was stationed in his machan. It came on at a run, and when within a hundred and twenty yards the Prince fired, hitting it in the side. A second shot struck the tiger on the left shoulder, wounding it mortally, and the Prince fired again, hitting it in the throat to despatch it quickly. The animal was a fine male measuring 8 feet 7½ inches. The Prince returned to the Residency about seven o'clock, highly pleased with the success of the expedition. At night the city was illuminated, and a banquet was held at the palace. The palace and other buildings were picked out with myriads of white lights, and on the fortress hillside the word "Welcome" was emblazoned in flame. Throughout the city also a pretty effect was obtained by numbers of coloured lanterns hung in the trees, after the manner of Chinese and Japanese lamps, but having an octagonal shape, the design being peculiar to Jaipur.

There was a large gathering at the banquet, the guests being received by the Maharaja and Colonel Herbert, the Resident. The Prince of Wales took in Mrs. Herbert to dinner, and Colonel Herbert escorted the Princess. Dinner was served in a noble hall, lavishly decorated, and was a very brilliant function. The Maharaja joined the company after dinner and proposed the health of the King-Emperor, which was loyally honoured. On behalf of the Maharaja a speech proposing the health of the Prince and Princess of Wales was read by a member of the State Council.

The announcement of His Highness's donation and that of the Maharani towards the Famine Fund was received with much applause. The toast was cordially honoured.

The points of the speech, which was well delivered, were marked by loud applause, the references to the Maharaja's munificence and to the success of the Prince's tiger shoot being especially emphasised. After the speeches the company adjourned to another part of the palace, where an entertainment was given by native musicians, the Prince and Princess being much interested in the native music and instruments. The Prince's tiger was borne into the hall for inspection, and a very fine and noble beast it was. Before leaving the palace Their Royal Highnesses and the rest of the guests were garlanded.

Preparations for the Royal visit to Lahore are proceeding apace. We understand that the Reception Committee will issue all tickets for admission to the Shalimar Gardens in connection with the Royal visit on the 29th November, on which occasion the gardens will be illuminated. It has been decided that, as the entertainment is given by the people of Lahore to Their Royal Highnesses, the generous offer of the Hon'ble Nawab Fateh Ali Khan, C.I.E., to defray all expenses cannot be accepted and that the expenses of decoration and illumination will be defrayed by a general subscription. In the case of residents of Lahore tickets will be issued only to persons who have subscribed to the Reception Fund. The number of admissions is limited, and in case applications are received on behalf of a number of persons in excess of the limit fixed, it will of course be necessary to give preference to the applications of those whose subscriptions are greater. Applications for tickets should be addressed to Mr. M. L. Darling, Assistant Commissioner, Lahore, and should specify the number of persons in the party for whom tickets are required. A limited number of tickets will be issued for a stand, which will be erected along the road by the Chiefs' Camps for the convenience of persons who desire to see the Royal Procession on the 28th November. It will, it is hoped, be possible for the spectators to drive through the city to the Gol Bagh in order to see the presentation of the Municipal address there. There will be a stand in the Gol Bagh, to which admission will be by ticket. Tickets to the stand in the Chiefs' Camp and the Gol Bagh will be issued on the same principles as apply to the issue of tickets for the Shalimar illuminations. At dusk on the 1st December there will be a fireworks display near the Volunteer Parade Ground by the Chauraji, and for this no tickets will be required. An official communiqué gives in outline the programme of the proposed festivities.

Pioneer.—Jaipur's streets are thronged with people to-day, for, in addition to the city population, there is a host of country folk keeping holiday in honour of the Royal visit. The broad paved roadways are filled with an ever-moving crowd, and from time to time the scoura of the Sardars pass along, or the way is cleared for the Maharaja himself in his carriage with a modest escort, for His Highness is simple and unpretentious though his full Durbar is always a spectacle of splendour. The city has its loyal mottoes in abundance, from ordinary good wishes for the King as well as welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales to such expressions as "Accept our Homage," and "Justice be thy guide." There are triumphal arches and Venetian masts with fluttering banners all along the route to the palace, and above all rises the Isri Lat, the high tower now encircled by triple rows of flags, each of which marks a storey. The great palace, which, with its various buildings and courtyards, covers one-seventh of the whole space within the walls of the city, is humming with excitement, for preparations are being made for a banquet to the Royal visitors to-night, and for illuminations in their honour. The visitors are inspecting the long rows of stables and carriage houses, the elephant quarters, and even the small lake with its alligators. Jaipur is now one of the show places of India, and there is much to see, from the old observatory of Jai Singh with its curious instruments to modern buildings such as the Albert Hall and Museum, the School of Art, etc. One can see the cunning artificers at work in silver, brass, and enamel, or examine the finished products of their labours. The jewellers will tempt us with their wares and there are marble images, small and large, to be had by the thousand. The beautiful public gardens, too, with flowers and foliage, flourishing in this waste of sand are a welcome change from the busy streets. The hills, which look over the city from three sides, have their forts, embattled walls, and palaces, while from some points can be seen Amber, the ancient capital which Jai Singh deserted in 1728 when he laid out Jaipur, the City of Victory, and marked the lines of its streets with mathematical accuracy. In these peaceful days the need of fortifications no longer exists, but bastion and gateway still stand, though wall and parapets are never manned.

One cannot but be struck with the arid appearance which the country about this city presents. The desert creeps up almost to the walls, and this year the failure of the rains has made barren many an acre that yields grain crops for the people and forage for the cattle. There is sand on all sides, and even the trees are dust-laden. Lake and tank throughout the state are at a low level, and no relief can come until the winter showers fall. The failure of these would be serious indeed, for already the Maharaja has had to open relief works, as a period of scarcity has been entered upon. It is sad to think that His Highness's subjects should be among the first to feel the effects of drought at this time, for it was he who founded the Indian People's Famine Fund, to which he has given such generous donations, but one may be quite sure every step has been taken well in advance to meet immediate distress and to make full provision for the future. If famine comes in its severest form, there will be abundant relief at hand. Even the expenditure on the Royal visit will help the people, for many a poor labourer has been given work, and there are hundreds of ways in which money has been spent locally. Care also has been taken that no Sardar shall impoverish himself by bringing a large retinue here.

The Prince and Princess are very comfortably housed in the Residency, their Suite and Staff being in camp close at hand. The Residency is a very handsome building with a well-kept garden, which even the drought has failed to affect. The Deoli Regiment, under Major Waller and Captain Tristram, furnish the cavalry escort and also the guard for the Residency, while the Durbar troops and police are on duty in and about the grounds. The Deoli Regimental pipers played some airs after dinner last night, the music being much appreciated.

The Times of India.—In connection with the visit here (Quetta) of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales it is expected that the Chiefs, headmen and notables of all Baluchistan will subscribe towards the permanent memorial in commemoration of the visit. The form of the memorial will be decided when the aggregate amount contributed is ascertained.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales performed the very pleasant task of presenting Mr. Dassabhoj Dadabhoj, station master at Grant Road, with a pair of gold links enclosed in a beautiful case and bearing the Royal crest in appreciation of the excellent arrangements made by him in connection with the departure of the Royal party from the Grant Road station. Mr. Dassabhoj was presented to His Royal Highness by Sir Walter Lawrence.

Mr. Dassabhoj joined the railway service in 1864 when he had only thirteen years of age. He joined as a signaller, then served in the office of the late Mr. J. R. Duxbury, and was four years later promoted to be a telegraph master. He was then transferred to the traffic department, and ultimately he was appointed station master at Grant Road. During the riots he saved the lives of many passengers, who had come to Bombay unawares, by sheltering them. The most important service Mr. Dassabhoj rendered as a station master was about thirty years ago, when he was in charge of the railway station at Gholwad. Cholera of the most virulent type broke out there, and within the first twenty hours of its appearance it accounted for nearly five hundred people. In about a week's time the epidemic wiped out almost the whole population of the place, numbering over two thousand. Numbers of bodies were buried in the sands at the beach, about two feet deep, by Mr. Dassabhoj, who was assisted by the late Mr. Wharton, the then Permanent Way Inspector.

25TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Native Chiefs have begun to arrive in Lahore for the occasion of the Royal visit. The Rajas of Chumna, Lambagraon, Mundi and Maler Kotla with their staffs have already come. The Rajas of Nabha and Jind were expected on Friday.

Daily Chronicle.—The journey from Jaipur to Bikanir was another short stage, but was entirely unique, lying as it did through the very depths of the far-famed desert of Rajputana. The approach to Bikanir consists of hundreds of miles of burning, arid sand, extending like an illimitable ocean to the horizon, while the fiery sun of the sub-tropics gives even in winter a hint of the intolerable heat of midsummer.

In this desert no animal or plant life can exist; agriculture is impossible except in irrigated tracts, and the scanty population maintain themselves with difficulty by means of their flocks and herds, which feed on the bushes and scanty herbage of an occasional oasis. The rest is sand and mirage.

The stamp of the desert was indelibly impressed even on the Maharaja's reception of the Prince at the station this morning. One of the dominant features of the State is that camels are everywhere used instead of horses, owing to their capacity for going so long without water; and Bikanir has become famous for its Camel Corps, which the Maharaja led in person to China in 1901, and which has since done good work in the very similar deserts of Somaliland. This Camel Corps was assembled at the station, and escorted the carriage of the Prince and the Maharaja to the palace, while the feudatories of the state mounted upon camels followed behind with their retainers. The route was lined with mounted camelmen in the chain mail of two centuries ago, forming a picturesque array. The procession indeed was extraordinarily picturesque, the silent camelry in their scarlet and white, and the Lancers in silver blue and brown, moving through the ranks of mail-clad camelmen, while the olive green uniforms of the city guard stood out prominently against the background of low red houses. In the distance the tawny sheen of the illimitable desert melted into a far-off mirage, and made a perfect desert scene. The Prince is staying at the beautiful Lallgarh palace, which was designed by Sir Swinton Jacob, and overlooks the sandy wastes of the desert, which lap right up to its walls.

The visit here is a holiday, and is to be wholly given up to shooting. The famous Gujnar tank, twenty miles away, has been specially reserved for the occasion, and 15,000 imperial grouse have been marked down for the gun. The Prince, with a select party of guns, shoots until Monday. The Prince shot extremely well at Jaipur, killing his tiger with a precision that the oldest shikari might envy. It was the shot of his life.

The Maharaja of Bikanir is the finest shot in Rajputana, and is also a splendid specimen of the modern educated Rajput, representing a totally different school from the orthodox ruler of Jaipur and the conservative ruler of Udaipur. His ancestors took the side of the British in the Pindari war, the two Sikh wars, and the Mutiny; and he himself has already followed in their footsteps by leading his Camel Corps to China. He is a young man, twenty-five years of age, of extremely handsome presence. Like the Maharaja of Jaipur, he visited London for the King's Coronation, and so has met the Prince and Princess before. His palace is furnished with every modern convenience, including electric lights, motor-cars, and a motor-boat; and the journey to the Gujnar tank will be performed in motor-cars.

The route of the Royal train from Jaipur to Bikanir lay across the fringe of the Western Desert and over great stretches of undulating sand, sparsely broken by patches of scanty scrub. Here at Bikanir we are in the heart of the desert, in a city in a sea of sand, which breaks against the dull red battlement walls. Many of the preparations made fittingly to receive Their Royal Highnesses were stamped with the impress of the desert and with those distinctive characteristics which a half nomadic life leaves on peoples all the world over.

The Royal route lay from the station past the walls of the town under the shadow of the old palace and out into the open, where stands the Maharaja's new and princely abode on land literally filched from the desert. The view about a mile from the station afforded the most perfect spectacle of a desert city the heart of man could desire. Here were the dull red battlemented walls, the fretted windows, and graceful chattras of the old palace and the temples and houses of the town stretching away till lost in the khaki waste beyond. Opposite a scanty series of low sun-baked walls, ending abruptly in the desert, which rolled away into the most complete mirage conceivable. If anyone conjure up the picture his memory retains of Damascus or any of the ancient cities of Asia Minor, he will possess an accurate idea of the picture Bikanir presented this morning. And the impression of an oasis in a desert was still further heightened by the entire absence of the expectant animated crowd. The roadside contained none but the retainers marshalled to honour the Heir Apparent and his Consort.

The Guard of Honour of the Imperial Service Troops was composed of as fine a body of men as we have seen in these travels—a lean, hard-bitten body, most of them wearing the emblems of good service in Somaliland and China. Faultlessly equipped in scarlet and white and orange as became the troops of an aide-de-camp to the Prince, they were a credit to the state. Outside was drawn up the Bikanir Camel Corps, splendid men on splendid animals, who did good soldiering with the Somaliland Field Force. And from this point it was the Camel—that emblem of desert life—which dominated the scene.

First however came the State Lancers in their resplendent uniforms of silver, blue, and claret. Then a wild array of the camelmen of the principal Sardars, mounted on scraggy beasts and clothed in flowing garments of sage green and yellow, carrying long and curiously wrought jezails: they looked more like the fierce Arabs who tormented the French in Algeria than any race commonly associated with India. Camels drawing luggage vans rattled past on the way to the station and camels bore immobile warriors clothed in chain mail from head to foot. We returned to traditional India for a moment with a group of giant elephants, painted in royal fashion, and to the India that is so fast slipping away in the spectacle of an enormous double-decked vehicle like a decayed omnibus to which two fine elephants were harnessed tonga fashion. And then we merged into what we are in danger of regarding as the commonplace with a mile or so of the green-robed swordsmen who constitute the city guard. The artist who designed the state liveries of Bikanir is a genius in his way. What could be more grateful to an eye tired by illimitable stretches of red stone and tawny sand than these lines of live green footmen!

Down this road between the ranks of green-coated swordsmen came a solitary camelman. Then the quaintest sight imaginable—a company of the Camel Corps, a bobbing array of scarlet and white sowers advancing in absolute silence. When they passed this noiselessness gave way to a faint swishing as the padded feet met the dust, but the impression created by this large disciplined body, mounted on huge well-fed brasts, passing mutely, can scarcely be described. Next the Royal carriage with the Prince in naval uniform, the soldierly young Maharaja in the uniform of his Camel Corps, and Sir Walter Lawrence; the second Royal carriage with Her Royal Highness the Princess, more bobbing camels, smart lancers, and the whole motley array. Their Royal Highnesses drove straight to the Maharaja's new home, the stately and beautiful Lallgarh palace on the outskirts of Bikanir. The Maharaja is fortunate in this that when he decided to build himself a new home he secured the co-operation of Sir Swinton Jacob as architect. The palace is the most perfect modern building in the Hindu style in India—an entirely graceful pile of fretted red sandstone, nobly proportioned and harmonising entirely with its environment. Their Royal Highnesses have not been more splendidly housed since they landed at Bombay.

Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Bikanir must be regarded mainly in the light of a little relaxation after the long round of ceremonies so carefully and exactly observed. There are no long state functions. The Nured Parsi was performed soon after the arrival, and then His Highness called upon the Prince at the Lallgarh palace, where the visit was returned. The Prince was now free to pursue the main object of his visit, a few days' shooting. Everyone knows that His Royal Highness is one of the finest small game shots in England, and men of no mean experience of shikar were filled with admiration at the way in which he used his gun in the bit of duck shooting provided at Jaipur. Not everyone knows however that he is a real whole-hearted enthusiast in the pursuit of game. Those who know how His Royal Highness goes shooting, as the phrase is, say with all respect that he is like a schoolboy going for a holiday, so ardent is he and fresh and keen. Certainly everything pointed to his having the shoot of his life here.

In the neighbourhood of Bikanir is the best stand for grouse shooting in India, perhaps in the world. The species chiefly visiting those parts is the imperial grouse, about thirteen inches in length, seventeen to eighteen ounces in weight, and amazingly strong and rapid on the wing. The great place for the birds is the Gujnar tank, about twenty miles from the city, where the most elaborate arrangements have been made to give His Royal Highness the best of sport. The character of the shooting here can best be indicated by what happened last November. On the Gujnr tank and the adjoining sheets of water eleven guns accounted for 2,841 head of game, in two days. Sir Phillip Grey Egerton, well known as a fine shot at Hurlingham, secured 307 birds to his own gun, in a single day. As there are reputed to be fifteen thousand birds on the lake and all the smaller tanks in the vicinity have been stopped, so that the birds will be driven to drink at Gujnr, the prospects of the shoot are sufficiently indicated.

The imperial sand grouse invariably proceeds to the nearest water pool between a quarter to eight and eleven A.M., in order to quench his thirst, so that all the big shooting to-morrow will be done between those hours. As for the manner of the shooting, one of those who participated in last year's battue wrote:—"Shortly after sunrise and about half-past seven o'clock the first grouse made their appearance. Now and then they arrived in couples, now in packs of ten to fifteen. Sometimes they appeared to be whirling over the water in thousands. Between eight and nine o'clock the fusillade was extraordinary as pack after pack came flying in, only to be fired upon and to disappear in another direction for their morning drink." The shooting will be from butts carefully screened by boughs. If anything were wanted to complete this picture of a most promising shoot it would be that on the fringe of the water stands the Gujnr palace, a charming shooting box, in a delightful old-world garden. Thither went Their Royal Highnesses, who will be accommodated in the palace, by motor-car this afternoon, and also the staff, for whom a camp has been pitched in the garden. It was hoped that the Prince might get a few duck in the afternoon, but we have no news.

Field, The Country Gentleman's Newspaper.—Among the mingled impressions which the Prince of Wales will bring back with him from India will, we may reasonably anticipate, be a vivid sense of the attractions of Indian sport. Like his illustrious father, he is a keen sportsman, and he can not fail to appreciate very heartily the opportunities which are to be afforded him of big game shooting under the most favourable auspices. Pigsticking will probably be denied him, as it was to the King during his famous trip. But if His Royal Highness misses this exhilarating experience, he will yet be provided with sport infinitely more exciting than is to be met with in English coverts or in Scotch deer forests. Indeed, we learn from a clear and vivid Reuter's Special Service telegram in Thursday's papers that he shot his first tiger on Wednesday near Jaipur—a fine specimen (9ft.) bowled over on the gallop through the jungle.

Following in his father's footsteps, he will, in the Terai, that wonderful district of jungle which stretches away from the plains of northern India to the borders of Nepaul, have an opportunity of indulging in big game shooting on the grandest scale. We hear of battues in this country, but the most ambitious achievements on an English estate are mere child's play compared with the gargantuan carnival of sport which in India is provided for the visitor of distinction. When His Majesty was on his visit to the Terai a leading member of his staff was curious enough to have a camp state taken. It worked out somewhat in this way: Camp followers, 4,000; camels, 600; elephants, 163. The equine element was a detail, for in the Terai, where grass, or what in that region passes for it, grows sometimes to the height of 20ft., the horse is of little use. The elephant is the animal which does duty there. Perched in a howdah high above the ground, the sportsmen are in the best position to spot the tiger in the undergrowth, and to put a bullet into him when he makes his dash for freedom, or, what often happens, his deadly rush on the narrowing line of beaters encircling him. This form of tiger hunting, though safe as compared with the pursuit of the beast on foot, is not entirely devoid of danger. A wounded animal, maddened by pain, will sometimes make a phenomenal leap on to the head of the elephant, and cause the animal to stampede, with disastrous results to the occupants of the howdah. The Prince will, no doubt, be safeguarded from untoward incidents of this kind as far as it is possible to take precautions. Yet necessarily he will be in the thick of the fray, for his companions on the expedition, European and native, will deem themselves humiliated if he returns without a good bag. His Majesty the King was not particularly fortunate during the earlier part of his excursion in the Terai country; but a record of six tigers, two killed with single shots on one eventful day, showed that the reputation of the district for game was not belied. Something of the phenomenal success achieved on that occasion was no doubt due to the elaborate anticipatory measures taken by the Nepalese Prince, who, days before the battue, had had fires kindled in narrowing circles until the animals were driven into a comparatively small tract of jungle, which was reserved for the hunt. Nevertheless, the feat was a remarkable one, and it has, as it deserves, a conspicuous place in the annals of Royal sport.

Allied with tiger shooting in the Terai is an exciting form of wild elephant hunting. An animal, by preference a bull, is turned up in the jungle and pursued relentlessly. He is game at the outset, and gives his antagonists some unpleasant quarter-hours when he turns and lumbers after them at a pace which it would not be deemed possible by the inexperienced sportsman for the great brute to maintain. But the exertion eventually tells on him, and, completely tired out, he ultimately surrenders with a bad grace. Great ropes are whipped round his hind legs by skilled huntsmen, and he is a prisoner, marked out, after a system of taming and training, for work in the service of man. The King during his trip had a splendid run after a bull elephant, which was eventually captured in this fashion, and he took away with him as a trophy one of the brute's tusks, which was sawn off very soon after the tying-up process. His Majesty, in his eagerness on this occasion, stood in some peril. A second elephant broke through the jungle near where he was posted, and was making straight for him, when it was dropped by two fortunate shots from members of his party.

Legitimate spot of the character of that we have sketched will be very far from exhausting the Prince's sporting programme. In India, and especially at the native courts, pastimes which have long since been obsolete in England flourish, together with many forms of amusement which have never had a footing here. Hawking, for example, is most assiduously pursued by some of the native princes, and the cockpit, or the Eastern equivalent of it, is also a great institution where the British prejudices against cruelty to animals do not carry weight. One peculiarly Indian sport, much in favour with the Mahratta Princes, is deer hunting, in which cheetas or leopards play the part of hunter. In early morning the sportsmen rendezvous at some likely spot near the town, and the cheeta, which is brought in a bullock cart in the charge of a keeper, is taken out under the guidance of the chief shikari, or professional hunter, to a point from which a herd of deer have been sighted. The animal, seeing the quarry, is eager for the fray. With a deft turn of the hand the keeper slips the muzzle and the cheeta is off. With cat-like action it works its way sinuously through the grass until it gets within a few yards of the unsuspecting deer. Then, with a bound, it springs upon one of the herd, usually marking down some lordly buck which is keeping guard on the outskirts of the feeding ground. The stricken animal rears and dashes about for a minute, and then sinks down in its death agony. At this point the members of the hunting party rush up, the keeper seizes the cheeta, re-muzzles it, and the coup-de-grace is given to the deer if life is not already extinct. Then a move is made to another centre, and the process is repeated. It is a most exciting form of sport when the conditions are good; but it sometimes happens that the cheeta is lazy and will not see the prey. Then the business is a little tame, and those who have not had prior experience of the hunt are apt to vote the cheeta a fraud as a hunter. The native chiefs of the old school have a great penchant for contests between beasts which in this country would be voted cruel. Elephants, rhinoceri and bulls are all made to provide sport at times. At Baroda, which the King visited, but which is left out of the itinerary of the Prince and Princess of Wales for well-known reasons, there is a vast arena, in which on great State occasions the populace is favoured with a spectacle in which fights between the animals we have named play a conspicuous part. It is a somewhat brutal display, which jars on the sensitive nerves of the Englishman who has been bred up to the belief that deliberate cruelty and true sport are incompatible terms. Indians, however, are not fastidious in these matters, and one of the strange paradoxes which the life of the country presents is the existence of the most hideous cruelty to animals side by side with a system of religion which regards the destruction of animal life of whatever kind as an unpardonable sin.

Unquestionably the influence of British customs and habits of thought is changing the attitude of natives towards sport, as it is altering their life in other respects. Princes educated under the new system in training colleges are insensibly brought to view sport through the spectacles of the governing race, and, as far as they can, they fashion their pastimes on approved Western lines. Polo, as played in India, will present much the same kind of attraction as in England. Horse racing supplies a bond between the East and the West more intimate than any other that exists. A race meeting at one of the Presidency towns or at a leading up-country station brings together in friendly rivalry and close companionship leading representatives of both races. The native masses as dearly love the spectacle and moralists will be sorry to learn, but as keenly on the results as the inhabitants of London or the great English towns. During his sojourn in Calcutta the Prince of Wales will have an opportunity of seeing an Indian race meeting at its best. The picturesqueness of the spectacle will appeal to him, for the crowd he will see on the Maidan will be a vastly different one to the somberly clad, if animated, gathering which assembles on Epsom Downs on Derby Day, or even the gay throng which affects Ascot on Cup Day. But what will probably impress His Royal Highness still more will be the value of sport as a factor in promoting good relations between the two races. In the common love of the chase and of the horse Briton and Indian find congenial neutral ground. There racial prejudices are sunk and real friendships made, and there the two races recognise the good qualities which each possesses. The community of interests and tastes created does much to smooth the rough places of Indian life. We are not sure, indeed, that sport is not the most powerful agency that we have working for us in India. Most certainly not the least beneficial results which will flow from the Prince of Wales's tour will be those associated with his sporting expeditions, in which he will be brought into intimate and unrestrained contact with the manliest of the sons of India.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Bikanir at 8.30 this morning (21st November) and had a brilliant and most cordial reception. After the ceremonies at the station they drove by an interesting route lined by the Camel Corps and other State troops and retainers to the new Lallgarh palace. After an exchange of visits between the Maharaja and the Prince this morning, the Royal party will proceed by motor to the shooting camp at Gujair, twenty miles from Bikanir, where they remain until the last day of the visit. Here arrangements have been made for an imperial sand grouse shoot.

The startling contrasts encountered during the last few days of the Royal tour have been symptomatic of the greater and more dramatic contrasts of scenes and races yet to come. From the old-world city of Udaipur and its natural charms to a city like Jaipur, whose thoroughfares are laid out on the American plan, was a transition from the East to the West, tempered by the feudal panoply and orthodox Hindu observances which surround state ceremonial. If Udaipur and Jaipur are distinct in their architecture, they are alike in being ruled by Chiefs who cherish ancient good. In Jaipur, the preservation of the feudal, the barbaric and the picturesque in State ceremonies in a greater degree than elsewhere in Rajputana compensates for the note of modernity in its broad streets and for the birthday cake decoration of its pink buildings. Dwelling in the midst of a city planned on lines adopted in the most advanced of Western countries, the Maharaja of Jaipur—a rigidly orthodox Hindu, who carried sacred Ganges water with him when he voyaged to England to attend the King's Coronation—surrounds himself with all the pomp and splendour of a Hindu Saladin. The mediæval spirit is maintained in all the circumstance of his court, from the state and lurid colour of the Durbar and his hunting men in sage-bued green, to the munificence which bestows bounteous charity in honour of the Royal visit in the shape of donations of four lakhs of rupees towards the Indian Famine Fund. What could have more completely revealed the world of another age to the present than the appearance at the banquet in the palace of the trophy of the Royal guest's prowess as a hunter, the royal tiger slain by the Prince of Wales, the first that had fallen to his gun in India, which was borne into the hall for all to see.

From the Aladdin realms of Udaipur's lakeland palaces and the barbaric splendour of Jaipur's Vedic scenes, we have now been whirled to a city in the desert. It is one of the most dramatic of India's contrasts that Bikanir, a city built on sand and surrounded by sand spreading away like a vast sea, seems as far removed from ancient ways as the poles asunder. The Chief of a State in the desert, the Maharaja of Bikanir, is no typical desert chieftain, as such may be conceived. It was a thoroughly Europeanised and soldierly Chief that greeted Their Royal Highnesses on their arrival at his capital this morning. Tall, good-looking, and, unlike his brother Chiefs of Jaipur and Udaipur, speaking perfect English, he presented a striking figure in the uniform of his own Camel Corps, which he accompanied to China and which also did valuable service in Somaliland. The scene at the station was another of the brilliant pictures which have succeeded each other so rapidly since Their Royal Highnesses landed in India. A guard of honour was furnished by a hundred rank and file of the Camel Corps, attended by the State band. In review order of white tunic and breeches, with saffron and red turban and cummerbund and black riding boots, the detachment made a very imposing appearance. Nine State Sardars, with their attendants, were present in their brightest raiment, and the decorative scheme was completed by a number of boys in saffron and scarlet robes placed upon the roof of the stations buildings. They were the pupils of the Durbar High School in new uniforms of the State colours and they carried vivid little flags. They gave an effective background of blazing colour to the whole picture. The presentations to Their Royal Highnesses were conducted under a silver pillared canopy, and after the Prince had inspected the guard of honour, the procession to the new Lallgarh palace began. The route lay for over two miles along a broad road lined by companies of the Mounted Camel Corps, State retainers on camels, State troops and men in armour, camel carriages, and carriages drawn by elephants through gardens past the old palace, now called the fort, through the Curzon Gardens to the new palace, a handsome pile of buildings in red sandstone in the Saracenic style of architecture. The low square buildings in red sandstone typical of Bikanir which were passed on the way were greatly in contrast with the style of buildings seen in other cities visited. Large numbers of people were gathered along the route and cheered loudly as the Royal procession passed.

As already telegraphed, the Prince shortly after arriving at the palace received a visit from the Maharaja, returning it about an hour later. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Maharaja and members of the Royal Suite, in the afternoon drove by motor to the shooting camp at Gujnr, where arrangements had been made for their stay until Monday. The Prince was driven by Mr. Drummond in the Maharaja's 24-h.p. Brazier car. The whole party requiring a number of cars, the Maharaja's own cars had been reinforced by three large cars sent by the Maharaja of Gwalior.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The programme for the third day of Their Royal Highnesses's stay at Jaipur has been again one of recreation and sport. Early this morning the members of the entourage made an excursion to Amber, the ancient capital of the State, six miles from Jaipur. When Jaipur was founded in the eighteenth century, Amber was deserted en masse, but the ruins are full of interest, and the old palace where the visitors had breakfast well repays a visit.

Another party went out pigsticking, and secured four boar and a hyena. An incident of the sport was an exceptional feat performed by Sir Pertab Singh. Charged by a boar, Sir Pertab jumped his horse over the pig, spearing him as he passed.

After breakfast the Prince went out after tiger again, another having been marked down.

Visits to the Maharaja's library, the observatory and other places of interest filled up the day for the Princess and other members of the party until preparations had to be made for departure.

Their Royal Highnesses are timed to leave Jaipur at 6.30 this evening, reaching Bikanir to-morrow morning. The arrangements for the visit to Bikanir are almost exclusively concerned with shooting.

The Prince was to-day disappointed in his hopes of shooting another tiger. Accompanied by a small party he went out at twelve o'clock by special train to Sanganeer, about six miles away, where a tiger had been marked down in the neighbourhood of the station. On reaching Sanganeer the shikaris gave the information that the tiger had disappeared. He had visited the kill early in the morning, but had left his lair about 11.30, going off among the hills. The tiger's lair was in a cavern in the hillside, and a machan had been erected upon the side of a neighbouring hill in front of which the tiger had to pass to reach the hill. News of the shoot had caused large numbers of people to collect in the neighbourhood, doubtless with the result of frightening the animal away. On receiving information of the tiger's disappearance the Prince, who did not alight from the train, returned to the Residency, a special train going back immediately. Some members of the staff, however, went out and viewed the kill, inspecting the traces of the tiger's visit.

The departure of Their Royal Highnesses from Jaipur this evening was private.

Outlook.—The Royal tour in India has passed through a week of brilliant episodes. At Udaipur, with its vision of lake and marble, and at Jaipur, with its pink streets, the Prince of Wales has visited the most beautiful and the most bizarre of all the cities of India.

Penny Illustrated Paper.—The Prince of Wales held a Durbar at Indore, at which the Central India Chiefs were presented to him.

Queen, The Lady's Newspaper.—Early in this Royal progress through the Indian Empire the Prince of Wales cannot help being struck with the extraordinary variety of the scenery and the magnificence of the great cities. After Bombay, the Liverpool and Manchester of India, there is the railway journey through the Ghats—one of the most interesting enterprises in India, during which the mountain zones are traversed.

Then Udaipur, often termed the most beautiful city in India, where the scenery is a blend of Kashmir and the English Lakes.

Next Jaipur (which I have attempted to describe in an earlier series of Indian articles in the Queen), that unique "rose-red city" which would have seemed to have suggested the street plans of American cities, and is one of the most progressive of Indian cities.

A very striking contrast is afforded by the fortress cities of Ajmer and Jodhpur, two Oriental Gibraltors, and Bikanir, the desert city.

Leaving the highly cultivated Rajput State of Mewar, he plunges into the great desert of India, which might be compared to the Kalahari desert of South Africa. Here the Prince breaks new ground, and reaches a comparatively unknown India. In fact, it is only within the last year or so that the locomotive has penetrated through the heart of this vast desert, and now a railway some 300 miles long links up Central India with the Punjab. Many Royal tourists have preceded His Royal Highness in India in the last quarter of a century or so, from His Majesty King Edward VII (when Prince of Wales), the late Duke of Clarence, the Czar, down to the Duke and Duchess of Connaught in 1903. But the Prince and Princess of Wales are the first to penetrate this Indian Sahara.

It may be asked why a little-known pastoral principality like Bikanir should be selected for the high honour of a visit from the Heir to the Empire. Obviously only a few of the twenty principal States out of the 600 odd separate Native States in India can be included in the Royal itinerary.

In short, it might not be altogether inaccurate to say that the reasons for the particular States selected are not only political but in some measure topographical, or even recreative. The young Maharaja of Bikanir—he is only 26 years of age—is not only the ruler of one of the chief Rajput States, but is one of the most modern type of native rulers—enlightened, humane, enterprising, and loyal. During the terrible famine of 1899-1900 he acted with zeal and conspicuous humanity and generosity. Then his loyalty to the British Raj was manifestly shown by the large contingent from his Imperial Service Corps which he sent for the Chinese punitive expedition.

As to the topographical reasons, in this extensive tour throughout all India it is, of course, important to economise time and space as far as possible. Since the new railway was completed last year from Jaipur to Bikanir and Bhatinda, where it joins the main line from Calcutta to Allahabad, Delhi, and Peshawar, much time is saved by taking this route instead of the ordinary tourist route via Delhi.

The fact that the Royal party are much pressed for time was rather amusingly illustrated at Indore the other day, when some of the ceremonial splendours at the Durbar of the Central Indian Chiefs had to be curtailed, an omission which was gracefully and tactfully accounted for in His Royal Highness's speech.

Then, few will grudge the Prince a little recreation after all his hard work, and Bikanir is one of the best sporting centres in India. Indeed it is one of the few districts where it is possible to add lions to one's "bag." Then, hyenas and a kind of deer called nilgai are plentiful.

Bikanir has nothing to attract the tourist—no sights, no ancient monuments, and no "scenery" in the conventional interpretation of the word. The greater part of the 22,000 square miles of which the State consists is waterless desert. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how the country can support a population equal to that of Glasgow; but, though apparently bleak and arid, yet camel-breeding is conducted on a very large scale, and camels are the chief source of wealth. A considerable trade is also done in woollen fabrics. Water is obtained with difficulty, wells having usually to be dug some 200 feet deep. It is rash to hazard a suggestion for a trade opening, but it would seem that dealers in artesian well equipment might find a market in Bikanir. It is only within the last few years that artesian wells have been systematically used in the deserts of West Australia, and the results have been, I believe, most encouraging.

The origin of the name is curious. When Bika, one of the Rajput Princes of Marwar, set out to found a kingdom in the desert, the site of the capital was given up by its owner on condition that his name Nira should form part of the new city; hence Bikanir.

As Bikanir is quite out of the tourist track, and, indeed, is known to hardly any English people beyond the officials of the Rajputana Agency at Ajmer, introductions to the Political Agent are almost essential. But, as I have mentioned above, there is practically nothing to attract tourists, but a visit to some of the wells is interesting. They are not lined with stone or brick, but with a curious kind of basket-work made with twigs.

Then, the old palace can be visited. Though imposing looking at a distance, it is little more than a straggling group of bungalow-like buildings, containing an enormous number of rooms. This is due to the Rajput custom which makes it undignified for a ruling chief to live in his predecessor's apartments.

Saturday Review.—No more brilliant and picturesque welcome awaits the Prince and Princess of Wales during their Indian tour than they have received in Udaipur and Jaipur. At a time when London was black with fog the Royal visitors were participating in gorgeous sunlit ceremonies to the description of which even the special correspondent admits he is unequal. The Rajputs are as famous for their hospitality as for their prowess. In the Maharaja of Jaipur the Prince was greeted by an old friend, and the Durbar arranged in his honour is said to have been the most brilliant ever held in Jaipur—a record which only those who know what Jaipur can do in the way of public ceremonies can properly appreciate. Remarkable as it was, it would possibly have been more splendid still but for the fact that the state is threatened by scarcity. The Maharaja's intention to commemorate the Royal visit by a special donation to the Famine Fund of four lakhs of rupees is certain to leave a strong impression on the native mind.

Spectator.—It is most natural that the Prince of Wales should be taken first to see the Protected States of India, where semi-Royal Courts still exist, and splendid palaces, and separate, if small, armies, and where the cities when en fête, especially those of Rajputana, seem to blaze with colour and light and movement like so many scenes in a great opera. The Royal visitors cannot but be delighted with such scenes; and their welcome, too, is genuinely cordial, for the Princes are well aware that, if they are overshadowed by the British Throne, they are protected by it against insurrection, and the well-remembered and oppressive ascendancy of Delhi. Care, however, should be taken to let the Prince of Wales see the much more important though duller masses under our own dominion, who supply all our revenue, and nearly all our native soldiers, and whose industry maintains the marvellous agriculture, and the ever-moving internal commerce, which enable more than two hundred millions of people to live in a comfort and security which, though broken by the Asiatic liability to drought, and consequent famine, is as great as that of any thickly packed population in the world. This caution is the more necessary because it is certain that our rule in India, though it has brought security and peace, has made the external life of the people much more dull, colourless, and uninteresting. "It is a grand sceptre, yours," say reflecting natives, "but it is a leaden one." The more we can break the monotony of life, especially in Eastern Bengal, which has not seen a pageant for a century, the better; and the visit of the Prince and Princess is a great opportunity.

Times.—Straight out of the yellow desert flooded with the morning sunshine the Royal train rolls into Bikanir station, gay with orange and red, the colours of the State. The Bikanir Camel Corps, which did such admirable service in Somaliland, occupies the place of honour, drawn up in a semi-circle outside the station and posted along the two miles of route to the new palace, where the Prince and Princess of Wales are entertained. Riding camels, transport camels and even camels harnessed to carriages are everywhere a conspicuous feature in the picturesque display, while the smart regiment of the State Lancers and the State Infantry in their orange and red uniforms are not unworthy of the high reputation which the Bikanir Camel Corps has achieved among the Imperial Service Troops.

Though in many of the outward circumstances of the Royal visit the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales at Bikanir was bound to resemble the receptions at Udaipur and Jaipur, there are, nevertheless, some features of peculiar interest in this little Rajput State which differentiate it from all others. With the exception of Jaisalmer it is the furthest outpost thrown out across the Thar or Indian desert towards the Indus by the Rajput power in the hey-day of their ascendancy. Cut off from the rest by almost trackless spaces of desert sand, the great-walled city with its stately mansions and temples and the imposing old palace in which a junior branch of the Royal house of Jodhpur has reigned for centuries is a signal monument, not only of the warlike prowess, but of the administrative capacity, which created and has maintained the State of Bikanir in defiance, as it were, of the adverse forces of nature as well as of man.

The young Prince himself is by no means the least interesting feature in his State. His attractive personality is almost as well known in England as were his gallantry and efficiency amongst his comrades in arms in China, where he commanded his own detachment of Imperial Service Troops during the expedition of 1900 for the relief of the Peking Legations. In his new palace, another of Sir Swinton Jacob's architectural creations, combining with the comfort and usefulness of the West the elegance and beauty of the best period of Northern Indian Art, he leads the life of an English gentleman, a keen soldier and a keen sportsman, and yet at the same time a Hindu Prince devoted to his people and legitimately proud of his great racial traditions. His example, perhaps more than any others, encourages the hope that the extraordinarily difficult problem of giving to the young rulers of India an education which shall help them to assimilate the best ideas of the West without divorcing them from the sympathy of their own people may not after all prove altogether insoluble.

The Royal visit to Bikanir is to be largely devoted to sport, and after the usual ceremonial visits had been exchanged in the forenoon the Royal party proceeded in the afternoon to Hainer, about 25 miles out, where they will encamp till Monday.

Times of India.—Native Chiefs have begun to arrive in Lahore for the occasion of the Royal visit. The Rajas of Chumba, Lambagraon, Mundi and Maler Kotla with their staffs have already come. The Rajas of Nabha and Jind are expected to-day.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS.

Praja Bandhu, 19TH NOVEMBER 1905.—The long-expected visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales became a realized fact in the second week of this month, and was celebrated at the capital of the Presidency with festivities and illuminations worthy of the illustrious visitors as well as of the first city of the British Indian Empire. The enthusiasm manifested by the masses as well as the classes was indeed extraordinary, and the decorations and general illuminations of the city designed and carried out by the leading citizens of Bombay lent a splendour to picturesque Bombay which must have deeply impressed the Royal visitors. The leading Anglo-Indian paper justly remarks that "Bombay has never before witnessed such a scene of intense enthusiasm and the fervent loyalty of the greeting surpassed all expectations." We join our contemporary in the observation that the reception was wholly spontaneous, having been organised and carried out by the representatives of the people. "It was an object-lesson revealing in the most striking manner the genuine and sincere loyalty of the natives of India to the British Throne. It was the unsought and voluntary rendering of homage to the King-Emperor and the members of his family." It must give genuine gratification to all loyal Indians that Their Royal Highnesses were deeply impressed by the expressions of enthusiastic good-will extended to them by all classes, races, and creeds of the population of Bombay, and that they carried away with them the happiest reminiscences of their sojourn in the city. The charm and dignity of the personal bearing of His Royal Highness and his graceful and eloquent reply to the address of the Bombay Municipal Corporation will always be remembered with delight. We have no doubt that, wherever His Royal Highness goes, the same loyalty and enthusiasm will await him, and that his tour throughout this once prosperous land will always be remembered by him as one of the happiest undertakings of his life.

Mahratta.—Since the time the visit of Their Royal Highnesses was announced up to the night of Tuesday last officers of the Bombay Government had to look to the minutest details of the big show from the gathering of Native Chiefs in the capital to the setting of tiny bunting and coloured lights. Bombay being the gate of the Indian Empire, the local officials had to perform the very difficult task of producing the rosiest first impressions on the minds of the Royal visitors, and we are glad to congratulate them on having executed it so admirably. They were ably assisted in this work by the Bombay Municipality and the leading men of the city, who formed the Reception Committee. The hearty co-operation between officials and non-officials, Europeans and Natives; which was so prominently manifested in this exhibition of India's loyalty towards the Royal family of England, is a cheering sign in so far as it shows that there is at least one sentiment which animates people of all classes in India. The Indians are loyal by instinct, and the sight of their future Sovereign could not but touch the hearts of those who participated in the festivities organised in his honour. Thousands of people flocked to the city from all parts of the Presidency to witness the show, and the railway, steamer, and tramway companies carried on a roaring trade. The Royal visit thus brought blessings to many, and although it emptied the pockets of thousands, it furnished unbounded entertainment to people, which they will not forget for years to come. The Royal visit furnished absorbing occupation to all classes of people, but none, we believe, looked forward to it with such expectant eagerness as those who always love to bask in the sunshine of official favour and think it the summum bonum of their existence to obtain a title or a decoration. Many of these worthy spirits had been preparing for months past for this big event. Some promised large donations to public objects, such as the museum or the entertainment fund, others commenced cultivating closer intimacy with high officers, and others still set about devising novel modes of demonstrating their loyalty Unfortunately for such people, however, the Royal visit to Bombay has been so far comparatively barren, and although the patient souls can afford to wait till the next New Year's Honours Gazette we cannot but sympathise with them in their heavy disappointment We must at the same time congratulate the four fortunate recipients of honours who were singled out for Royal favour during the Prince of Wales's sojourn in Bombay. Sir S. W. Edgerton has got his K.C.V.O., probably for collecting the Native Chiefs in Bombay to receive Their Royal Highnesses, while Mr. Gell, the Police Commissioner of Bombay, has certainly earned his humble M.V.O. for his excellent police arrangements. Sir David Sassoon and Sir Currimbhoy Ibrahim obviously got their knighthoods for 12 lakhs (?) and three lakhs of rupees respectively, unequal prices no doubt, but deservedly recompensed all the same. What have we gained? What have the people at large gained by these individual favours? To them the only tangible result of the Royal visit would be perhaps the reminiscences of the illuminations on Tuesday night or the discomforts of a journey to and from Bombay. The Princes assembled in Bombay were, we understand, often treated like common people and the Rajkumars brought down to escort Their Royal Highnesses were hardly distinguishable from ordinary sowars. There were half a dozen official functions, such as the Municipal address, the opening of Princess Street, the foundation of the Royal Museum, the laying of the first stone of the Alexandra Dock, the levée, the reception and exchange of visits with Native Chiefs, and even the Indian ladies were brought into service to swell the chorus of loyalty. But where do the people come in amidst this big tamasha? Has the arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales benefited the general tax-payer in any way beyond the sight of millions of oil buttees at his own expense? A truly Oriental sovereign would have granted a boon of remission of taxation or at least fed the poor on such an auspicious occasion, and yet our rulers who are so fond of Oriental customs when they serve to magnify their own power or humiliate Indians forget them exactly when such customs are likely to touch their own pockets. Inconsistencies like these do not go unmarked and produce an effect which can never be obliterated by manufactured addresses or illuminations. We wish Their Royal Highnesses during their six days' stay in Bombay had devoted at least a few hours to see the real condition of the masses for themselves and to learn their wants at firsthand. They would have endeared themselves to the Indians far more effectively by going straight amongst the people and knowing their joys and sorrows than by carrying out the programme chalked out by officials. If our small voice will have any effect at all, we wish to be plain-spoken and offer a suggestion which Their Royal Highnesses will do well to take into consideration. We believe the Prince and Princess of Wales have not come to India simply to be carried and exhibited from place to place by Indian officials as curiosities to evoke demonstrations of loyalty to the Empire and to glorify the British administration in India, but the whole programme of their tour as announced to the public looks as if they have come here for nothing else. If the future Emperor of India really wishes to carry away with him a correct and true impression of the condition of the people, he should shake himself face of all official trammels and endeavour to get at the truth beneath the surface Royal visitors may come and go, and the only abiding result in the popular memory will, we very much fear, be the immense waste of India's money for a costly and purposeless pageant."

Gujarati and Jain, 19TH NOVEMBER 1905.—"The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India has been duly signalled by a display of great pomp and gorgeous pageantry and the Prince has given us an excellent certificate of loyalty. Only a few short years ago we were branded as traitors. Will the certificate of loyalty which we have just obtained from the Prince alter our position, or will it remain inoperative like the pledges in the Proclamation of 1858? Promises were generously made to the people of India in that document, but the policy of the officials remained as harsh and unsympathetic as ever. The people are looked upon as an inferior and subject race, and the faith of the public in Royal assurances of good-will and sympathy is thus profoundly shaken. Both the Sovereign and Parliament place implicit reliance upon their subordinate representatives in India and do not care to see how the people are practically governed by them. The latter have turned a deaf ear to the prayers of the Congress, and the arbitrary administration of the country continues unchecked. It is a mistake to gauge the loyalty of the Indians by the vast crowds assembled in the streets to catch a glimpse at the Prince and Princess of Wales. The sentiments of the educated classes afford a truer index of India's loyalty. Both the educated and the middle classes are no longer content with mere verbal expressions of sympathy and good-will, but wish to know how far these are translated into acts. If the Prince will bring the grievances of the Indians to the notice of his Royal father and thereby assist in practically elevating their status, then only can his visit be said to have achieved its true object." [The Jain makes somewhat similar comments, and remarks that the Prince should visit not only centres of wealth and prosperity but remote, out-of-the-way villages because, in the opinion of the paper, a visit to rural areas alone is likely to convey to his mind a correct idea of the condition of the people.]

Vishvi, 20TH NOVEMBER 1905.—"The illuminations in Bombay during the past week were splendid, and people thronged the streets in immense crowds to witness them. It is but natural that the hearts of Europeans should be stirred by such marks of public rejoicings, but what is there in them that appeals to the hearts of natives? Do the Indians consider that as the joy of the Europeans increases, their own joy is bound to decrease in proportion? It is a sign of stupidity that natives should crowd the streets to witness the illuminations in honour of the Royal visitors. It seems that they like to rejoice at their own folly, and it is impossible to foresee to what plight they will be reduced hereafter. They should have felt ashamed to show their faces, stamped with the brand of slavery, in public on the night of the illuminations. The festivities were in honour of the conquering community, not in honour of those who have been reduced to a condition of servitude. Should not the minds of the Indians have been filled with despondency at the sight? It is a pity that there is so little true enlightenment in India. If all the Indians were to awaken to their true condition, we would never witness such sights as were witnessed in Bombay on the night of the illuminations. At present we can only pray that the day when the Indians would realise their true condition may soon dawn upon this country."

Indu Prabodh, 18TH NOVEMBER 1905.—A correspondent writes to the Indu Prabodh.—"Now that the delirium consequent upon the Royal visit is abating, may we inquire as to the tangible good that has come to the city from so momentous an event? It is stated in high quarters that the Prince has come to India to make an intimate acquaintance with the people and to know their real wants and grievances! The visit to Bombay is over, and let us see how far this object has been achieved. Has the Prince made an intimate acquaintance with the people of Bombay and has he known their wants and grievances? Is the Prince aware that more than 100,000 inhabitants of Bombay have no beds and take the night's rest on the footpaths and on the public roads without a roof over their heads? Has he been made acquainted with the fact that 80 per cent. of the population of this beautiful city is very poor, so poor that they cannot afford the expense of buying milk for their children and that consequently the infant mortality in the city is appalling? Does he know that on account of the scanty rainfall of this year, the epidemic of plague, it is feared, will be more severe than in any of the previous years, and that what little money the people had saved for emergencies has been spent away in the tamasha of the Royal visit, and that consequently they are in a worse plight than before? Does he know that more than 60 per cent. of the mill-hands in Bombay are in the hands of the money-lenders and grain-dealers? If he does not know all these things, but only sees the flags and the illuminations and only hears the flattery of interested parties, the visit must be said to have failed in its primary object. If the visit was organised to test the loyalty of the people, then it was absolutely unnecessary, for no sane person can doubt the deep-rooted loyalty of the Indian people."

Sind Gazette, 21ST NOVEMBER 1905.—"We are frequently asked what Karachi is going to do to perpetuate in a useful and suitable way the memory of the historic occasion of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to the capital of Sind. We have hitherto wanted to see whether any suggestion would come from the people of the Province themselves. But though there seems to be a general wish to mark the occasion in some suitable manner, no definite proposals have been forthcoming, and we think it therefore our duty to come forward with a suggestion. After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that the best way of signalling our pleasure at this unique visit will be to increase the hostel accommodation at the Dayaram Jethmal Arts College. The College is an institution which all classes of the community can join in supporting, and a separate building could be erected and named after the Prince and Princess of Wales. For the last two years the College Board has realised the utter insufficiency of the hostel accommodation but has been unable to do anything for want of funds. From our own enquiries it would seem that there is not enough room for even half the students who receive their education in the College. If a sum of Rs. 50,000 were subscribed, it would not be difficult to obtain a corresponding sum from Government, and with a lakh it would be possible to provide rooms for all the students who are likely to attend the College during the next fifty years. To effect this object we would suggest the immediate formation of a strong committee with the Commissioner in Sind as Chairman. The amount required would be readily realisable from the various Municipalities and District Local Boards, the Mirs, Jaghirdars, officials, rich merchants and the public bodies of Sind, as also from His Highness the Mir of Khairpur."

Rast Gofar and Jama-Jamshed.—Commenting on the contribution of four lakhs of rupees by the Maharaja of Jeypore to the Indian People's Famine Trust, the Rast Gofar writes:—"His Highness could not have given a happier turn to his charitable instincts which he has directed with remarkable foresight to serve a two-fold purpose. While his donation of four lakhs of rupees to the Famine Fund is devoted to a very worthy humanitarian object, it would serve, at the same time, to enhance the loyal

Times of India.—Native Chiefs have begun to arrive in Lahore for the occasion of the Royal visit. The Rajas of Chumba, Lambagraon, Mundi and Maler Kotla with their staffs have already come. The Rajas of Nabba and Jind are expected to-day.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS.

Praja Bandhu, 19TH NOVEMBER 1905.—The long-expected visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales became a realized fact in the second week of this month, and was celebrated at the capital of the Presidency with festivities and illuminations worthy of the illustrious visitors as well as of the first city of the British Indian Empire. The enthusiasm manifested by the masses as well as the classes was indeed extraordinary, and the decorations and general illuminations of the city designed and carried out by the leading citizens of Bombay lent a splendour to picturesque Bombay which must have deeply impressed the Royal visitors. The leading Anglo-Indian paper justly remarks that "Bombay has never before witnessed such a scene of intense enthusiasm and the fervent loyalty of the greeting surpassed all expectations." We join our contemporary in the observation that the reception was wholly spontaneous, having been organised and carried out by the representatives of the people. "It was an object-lesson revealing in the most striking manner the genuine and sincere loyalty of the natives of India to the British Throne. It was the unsought and voluntary rendering of homage to the King-Emporer and the members of his family." It must give genuine gratification to all loyal Indians that Their Royal Highnesses were deeply impressed by the expressions of enthusiastic good-will extended to them by all classes, races, and creeds of the population of Bombay, and that they carried away with them the happiest reminiscences of their sojourn in the city. The charm and dignity of the personal bearing of His Royal Highness and his graceful and eloquent reply to the address of the Bombay Municipal Corporation will always be remembered with delight. We have no doubt that, wherever His Royal Highness goes, the same loyalty and enthusiasm will await him, and that his tour throughout this once prosperous land will always be remembered by him as one of the happiest undertakings of his life.

Mahratta.—Since the time the visit of Their Royal Highnesses was announced up to the night of Tuesday last officers of the Bombay Government had to look to the minutest details of the big show from the gathering of Native Chiefs in the capital to the setting of tiny buntings and coloured lights. Bombay being the gate of the Indian Empire, the local officials had to perform the very difficult task of producing the rosiest first impressions on the minds of the Royal visitors, and we are glad to congratulate them on having executed it so admirably. They were ably assisted in this work by the Bombay Municipality and the leading men of the city, who formed the Reception Committee. The hearty co-operation between officials and non-officials, Europeans and Natives, which was so prominently manifested in this exhibition of India's loyalty towards the Royal family of England, is a cheering sign in so far as it shows that there is at least one sentiment which animates people of all classes in India. The Indians are loyal by instinct, and the sight of their future Sovereign could not but touch the hearts of those who participated in the festivities organised in his honour. Thousands of people flocked to the city from all parts of the Presidency to witness the show, and the railway, steamer, and tramway companies carried on a roaring trade. The Royal visit thus brought blessings to many, and although it emptied the pockets of thousands, it furnished unbounded entertainment to people, which they will not forget for years to come. The Royal visit furnished absorbing occupation to all classes of people, but none, we believe, looked forward to it with such expectant eagerness as those who always love to bask in the sunshine of official favour and think it the summum bonum of their existence to obtain a title or a decoration. Many of these worthy spirits had been preparing for months past for this big event. Some promised large donations to public objects, such as the museum or the entertainment fund, others commenced cultivating closer intimacy with high officers, and others still set about devising novel modes of demonstrating their loyalty Unfortunately for such people, however, the Royal visit to Bombay has been so far comparatively barren, and although the patient souls can afford to wait till the next New Year's Honours Gazette we cannot but sympathise with them in their heavy disappointment We must at the same time congratulate the four fortunate recipients of honours who were singled out for Royal favour during the Prince of Wales's sojourn in Bombay. Sir S. W. Edgerley has got his K.C.V.O., probably for collecting the Native Chiefs in Bombay to receive Their Royal Highnesses, while Mr. Gell, the Police Commissioner of Bombay, has certainly earned his humble M.V.O. for his excellent police arrangements. Sir David Sassoon and Sir Currimbhoy Ibrahim obviously got their knighthoods for 12 lakhs (?) and three lakhs of rupees respectively, unequal prices no doubt, but deservedly recompensed all the same. What have we gained? What have the people at large gained by these individual favours? To them the only tangible result of the Royal visit would be perhaps the reminiscences of the illuminations on Tuesday night or the discomforts of a journey to and from Bombay. The Princes assembled in Bombay were, we understand, often treated like common people and the Rajkumars brought down to escort Their Royal Highnesses were hardly distinguishable from ordinary sowars. There were half a dozen official functions, such as the Municipal address, the opening of Princess Street, the foundation of the Royal Museum, the laying of the first stone of the Alexandra Dock, the love, the reception and exchange of visits with Native Chiefs, and even the Indian ladies were brought into service to swell the chorus of loyalty. But where do the people come in amidst this big tamasha? Has the arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales benefited the general tax-payer in any way beyond the sight of millions of oil buttees at his own expence? A truly Oriental sovereign would have granted a boon of remission of taxation or at least fed the poor on such an auspicious occasion, and yet our rulers who are so fond of Oriental customs when they serve to magnify their own power or humiliate Indians forget them exactly when such customs are likely to touch their own pockets. Inconsistencies like these do not go unmarked and produce an effect which can never be obliterated by manufactured addresses or illuminations. We wish Their Royal Highnesses during their six days' stay in Bombay had devoted at least a few hours to see the real condition of the masses for themselves and to learn their wants at firsthand. They would have endeared themselves to the Indians far more effectively by going straight amongst the people and knowing their joys and sorrows than by carrying out the programme chalked out by officials. If our small voice will have any effect at all, we wish to be plain-spoken and offer a suggestion which Their Royal Highnesses will do well to take into consideration. We believe the Prince and Princess of Wales have not come to India simply to be carried and exhibited from place to place by Indian officials as curiosities to evoke demonstrations of loyalty to the Empire and to glorify the British administration in India, but the whole programme of their tour as announced to the public looks as if they have come here for nothing else. If the future Emperor of India really wishes to carry away with him a correct and true impression of the condition of the people, he should shake himself free of all official trammels and endeavour to get at the truth beneath the surface Royal visitors may come and go, and the only abiding result in the popular memory will, we very much fear, be the immense waste of India's money for a costly and purposeless pageant."

Gujarati and Jain, 19th NOVEMBER 1905.—"The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India has been duly signalled by a display of great pomp and gorgeous pageantry and the Prince has given us an excellent certificate of loyalty. Only a few short years ago we were branded as traitors. Will the certificate of loyalty which we have just obtained from the Prince alter our position, or will it remain inoperative like the pledges in the Proclamation of 1858? Promises were generously made to the people of India in that document, but the policy of the officials remained as harsh and unsympathetic as ever. The people are looked upon as an inferior and subject race, and the faith of the public in Royal assurances of good-will and sympathy is thus profoundly shaken. Both the Sovereign and Parliament place implicit reliance upon their subordinate representatives in India and do not care to see how the people are practically governed by them. The latter have turned a deaf ear to the prayers of the Congress, and the arbitrary administration of the country continues unchecked. It is a mistake to gauge the loyalty of the Indians by the vast crowds assembled in the streets to catch a glimpse at the Prince and Princess of Wales. The sentiments of the educated classes afford a truer index of India's loyalty. Both the educated and the middle classes are no longer content with mere verbal expressions of sympathy and good-will, but wish to know how far these are translated into acts. If the Prince will bring the grievances of the Indians to the notice of his Royal father and thereby assist in practically elevating their status, then only can his visit be said to have achieved its true object." [The Jain makes somewhat similar comments, and remarks that the Prince should visit not only centres of wealth and prosperity but remote out-of-the-way villages because, in the opinion of the paper, a visit to rural areas alone is likely to convey to his mind a correct idea of the condition of the people.]

Vihari, 20th NOVEMBER 1905.—"The illuminations in Bombay during the past week were splendid, and people thronged the streets in immense crowds to witness them. It is but natural that the hearts of Europeans should be stirred by such marks of public rejoicings, but what is there in them that appeals to the hearts of natives? Do the Indians consider that as the joy of the Europeans increases, their own joy is bound to decrease in proportion? It is a sign of stupidity that natives should crowd the streets to witness the illuminations in honour of the Royal visitors. It seems that they like to rejoice at their own folly, and it is impossible to foresee to what plight they will be reduced hereafter. They should have felt ashamed to show their faces stamped with the brand of slavery, in public on the night of the illuminations. The festivities were in honour of the conquering community, not in honour of those who have been reduced to a condition of servitude. Should not the minds of the Indians have been filled with dependency at the sight? It is a pity that there is so little true enlightenment in India. If all the Indians were to awaken to their true condition, we would never witness such sights as were witnessed in Bombay on the night of the illuminations. At present we can only pray that the day when the Indians would realize their true condition may soon dawn upon this country."

Indu Prakash, 18th NOVEMBER 1905.—A correspondent writes to the Indu Prakash:—"Now that the delirium consequent upon the Royal visit is abating, may we inquire as to the tangible good that has come to the city from so momentous an event? It is stated in high quarters that the Prince has come to India to make an intimate acquaintance with the people and to know their real wants and grievances! The visit to Bombay is over, and let us see how far this object has been achieved. Has the Prince made an intimate acquaintance with the people of Bombay and has he known their wants and grievances? Is the Prince aware that more than 100,000 inhabitants of Bombay have no beds and take the night's rest on the footpaths and on the public roads without a roof over their heads? Has he been made acquainted with the fact that 80 per cent. of the population of this beautiful city is very poor, so poor that they cannot afford the expense of buying milk for their children and that consequently the infant mortality in the city is appalling? Does he know that on account of the scanty rainfall of this year, the epidemic of plague, it is feared, will be more severe than in any of the previous years, and that what little money the people had saved for emergencies has been spent away in the lamasha of the Royal visit, and that consequently they are in a worse plight than before? Does he know that more than 60 per cent. of the mill-hands in Bombay are in the hands of the money-lenders and grain-dealers? If he does not know all these things, but only sees the flags and the illuminations and only hears the flattery of interested parties, the visit must be said to have failed in its primary object. If the visit was organised to test the loyalty of the people, then it was absolutely unnecessary, for no sane person can doubt the deep-rooted loyalty of the Indian people."

Sind Gazette, 21st NOVEMBER 1905.—"We are frequently asked what Karachi is going to do to perpetuate in a useful and suitable way the memory of the historic occasion of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to the capital of Sind. We have hitherto waited to see whether any suggestion would come from the people of the Province themselves. But though there seems to be a general wish to mark the occasion in some suitable manner, no definite proposals have been forthcoming, and we think it therefore our duty to come forward with a suggestion. After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that the best way of signalling our pleasure at this unique visit will be to increase the hostel accommodation at the Dayaram Jethmal Arts College. The College is an institution which all classes of the community can join in supporting, and a separate building could be erected and named after the Prince and Princess of Wales. For the last two years the College Board has realised the utter insufficiency of the hostel accommodation but has been unable to do anything for want of funds. From our own enquiries it would seem that there is not enough room for even half the students who receive their education in the College. If a sum of Rs. 50,000 were subscribed, it would not be difficult to obtain a corresponding sum from Government, and with a lakh it would be possible to provide rooms for all the students who are likely to attend the College during the next fifty years. To effect this object we would suggest the immediate formation of a strong committee with the Commissioner in Sind as Chairman. The amount required would be readily realisable from the various Municipalities and District Local Boards, the Mirs, Jaghirdars, officials, rich merchants and the public bodies of Sind, as also from His Highness the Mir of Khairpur."

Rast Gofar and Jam-e-Jamshed.—Commenting on the contribution of four lakhs of rupees by the Maharaja of Jeypore to the Indian People's Famine Trust, the Rast Gofar writes:—"His Highness could not have given a happier turn to his charitable instincts which he has directed with remarkable foresight to serve a two-fold purpose. While his donation of four lakhs of rupees to the Famine Fund is devoted to a very worthy humanitarian object, it would serve, at the same time, to enhance the loyal devotion of the people to their Royal guests. No monuments would be erected to commemorate the Royal tour through India would be directed to a more humanitarian object than the one which seeks to help the starving needy in the throes of killing hunger. His Royal Highness made repeated references to the feelings of sympathy and commiseration with which the Royal family views the unpleasant prospect which awaits Native States in Rajputana and elsewhere, and nothing certainly could be more gratifying to the Prince than that he should be made a medium to alleviate the distress of the needy and indigent poor. We devoutly wish that the Government of India follows up the noble example of the Maharaja of Jeypore by subscribing a magnificent quota of its own to the Famine Fund, which would not only serve to cement the bonds of unity more firmly between the rulers and the ruled, but would be valued as a fitting demonstration of the sympathy and affection with which the Royal family regard India. Not that we want India to make capital out of her show of loyalty, but we certainly do not wish that Government should let slip the opportunity opened out to them for winning over the hearts of the people and endearing them more than ever to their Royal masters. Some timely remission of an odious tax or impost, some privileges which they will value most as a further step in their political progress, some of these blessings, if not all, are what we desire Government to bestow upon the people as a fitting climax of the events connected with the Royal tour." [The Jam-e-Jamshed makes somewhat similar remarks and concludes:—"It is to be trusted that the rulers of other Native States will, in commemoration of the Royal visit, make it a point to send handsome contributions to the fund which, as the Prince has aptly said, is a 'great national work of mercy.'"]

Bhāla, 21st November 1905.—"Taking advantage of the Prince of Wales' visit to India, the Times of India has asked the question, 'Are the Indians truly loyal to British rule?' and has tried to give an answer to it. Before informing our readers of the answer given by the Times we must see why the question is raised at all. There can be no doubt that India belongs to the Indians and not to the British. The tendency throughout the world is that the people of any country like to be governed by themselves and not by foreigners. India is the only large country in the world that is at present under alien sway. China was at one time threatened with the evil of foreign domination, but was luckily saved by the example of Japan. China is now able to boast of a trained army of one million, and in a decade its strength will be raised to three millions and a half. We also see that all countries in the world, that are under foreign sway, are trying to get rid of it, and naturally our rulers may think that the same desire for autonomy animates the Indians. And consequently they must be curious to know whether the Indians are truly loyal to the British Government. Perhaps they suspect that the loyalty of the Indians is merely lip loyalty and that at heart they do not like British rule. There is no doubt that lip loyalty is utterly worthless. But it rests with our rulers exclusively to make us truly loyal to British rule. Indians were loyal so long, but it is uncertain whether they will continue to be so. If Government wish them to be loyal, let them show a true regard for the well-being of the people. It is impossible that a people should be loyal to a selfish Government. The policy of the British Government is not calculated to foster the sentiment of loyalty among the people of India. The industries of the country have been ruined; drought and heavy assessments have reduced the people to a state of semi-starvation. The Arms Act has emasculated them, and if the present policy of our rulers remains unaltered, the Indians will soon become a nation of slaves. The British have established peace throughout the country, but the people have lost their martial spirit. Peace under such circumstances is not very desirable. Let Government, therefore, change the trend of its policy before it is too late. It was hoped that the Prince's visit would stimulate the loyalty of the people, but we are now convinced that the Prince will not be able to do anything beyond making a few conventional speeches and participating in gaieties got up in his honour."

Batmidar.—The Batmidar (Yeotmal), of November 18th, referring to the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to India, state that the object of kings and princes visiting the countries which they rule is to acquaint themselves with the true condition of their subjects and to redress their grievances as far as possible. If the Prince of Wales has come to India with this object well and good, but if he has come merely on a pleasure trip, his tour in India will prove to be a misfortune to the people of India.

The Sudarshan (Basim), of November 19th, states that it will be especially pleasing if His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales were to show that although he is being royally entertained in India he is aware of the true condition of the country, but how can the truth be made to reach his ears?

The Berar Samachar (Akola), of November 20th, states that the real condition of the people of India is being concealed from the Prince of Wales by the lavish hospitality which is being accorded to him. The money expended will have been well spent if the Prince forms good resolutions for the future and determines to give their due rights to the people of India, allowing no distinctions to be made between Europeans and natives.

Mysore Star.—The Mysore Star, of the 20th November, says that Mr. Muthana, the officer in charge of the arrangements for the elephant hunt in Mysore during the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, should be more liberal in paying the poor hill-tribes so as to make them work with enthusiasm. The editor says that these hill-tribes are quite indispensable in the hunts, as they are great experts in the art. He goes on to say that unless these people are satisfied, the arrangements for the entertainment of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in this particular will not be a success, though the Mysore Government might spend ever so much money. So the editor draws the attention of His Highness the Maharaja to this matter.

Kistna Patrika.—The Kistna Patrika, of the 15th November, expresses its pleasure as Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales—the future Emperor and Empress of India—have travelled a distance of 6,000 miles and come to India to note the condition of their subjects, and greets them cordially on behalf of the Telugu country. It hopes that they will appreciate the loyalty of the Indians and pitying their poverty do some act tending to the public good to commemorate their visit.

The Hindustan (Lahore), of the 24th November 1905, writing about the forthcoming Royal visit to Lahore, says that the Prince of Wales will see nothing of real India, the authorities will not let him know the real condition of the people of India, and will prevent representative native newspapers falling into his hands. His Royal Highness will not be given an opportunity of seeing the representatives of the educated community, while starving and almost naked natives will be hidden from his view.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 19th November, says:—"After a busy and doubtless gratifying time in Bombay Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have left for Indore. From one of the most important cities in India to an important Native State the change will be striking and suggestive and will appeal strongly to the imagination of the Royal visitors. The sight of the young Holkar may remind the Royal visitors of the actual ruler who has been forced into retirement. We do not know whether the retired Maharaja will seek, or will be granted an audience of the Prince of Wales. The likelihood is that the shady side of the relations of the Government of India with the Native States will be kept from the knowledge of the heir to the British Empire. Else the Prince might wonder why a ruler in the vigour of life and the full possession of all his faculties should have abdicated his powers or been put aside in favour of his young son. The Prince of Wales doubtless knows that it is not for him to probe the inner and more mysterious problems of the Indian administration, and he must take men and things as he finds them. The loyalty that greets him is real and the welcome sincere, and with these His Royal Highness will have to rest content."

Advocate.—The Advocate (Lucknow), of the 10th November, says:—"The Gujrat has drawn attention to the necessity of making the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales understandable by the masses. In Asiatic countries such visits have ever been associated with boons conferred on the people. Even now Indian Princes and Chiefs make their tours in unfrequented parts of their territories memorable by deeds of charity that touch all people. It is quite natural under the circumstances that the masses should like very much to see the present visit associated with the grant of certain concessions that would be enjoyed by all classes of people without any distinction. It was at one time given out that the Salt Tax would be abolished to commemorate the Royal visit. The rumour has been contradicted. It were well if some way could be found out to satisfy the popular expectation."

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Bikanir, 21th November. The startling contrasts encountered during the last few days of the Royal tour have been symptomatic of the greater and more dramatic contrast of scenes and races yet to come. From the old world city of Udaipur and its natural charms to a city like Jaipur, whose thoroughfares are laid out on the American plan, was a transition from East to West, tempered by the feudal panoply and orthodox Hindu observances which surround State ceremonial. If Udaipur and Jaipur are distinct in their architecture, they are alike in being ruled by Chiefs who cherish ancient good. In Jaipur the preservation of the feudal, the barbaric, the picturesque in State ceremonies in a greater degree than elsewhere in Rajputana, compensates for the note of modernity in its broad streets, and for the birth-day cake decoration of its pink buildings. Dwelling in the midst of a city planned on lines adopted in the most advanced of Western countries, the Maharaja of Jaipur, a rigidly orthodox Hindu who carried the water of the sacred Ganges with him when he voyaged to England to attend the King's Coronation, surrounds himself with all the pomp and splendour of a Hindu Paladin. The mediæval spirit is maintained in all the circumstance of his court, from the State and lurid colour of the Darbar to his hunting men in sage green. The munificence which bestows bounteous charity in honour of the Royal visit in the shape of donations of four lakhs of rupees towards the Indian Famine Fund preserves the mediæval spirit of largess. What could have more completely revealed the world of another age than the present—than the appearance at the banquet in the palace of the trophy of the Royal guest's prowess as a hunter. The Royal tiger slain by the Prince of Wales, the first that had fallen to his gun in India, was borne into the hall for all to see, and remembering scenes witnessed earlier in the day, it was not difficult, even amid the assembly of modern uniforms of men and women in modish evening clothes and in halls where candles and electricity, crystal chandeliers and incandescent lamps, provided strange contrasts, to get back into the heroic age. The music of the Hindu bards was potent enough to transform the white shirt fronts to visions more in keeping with the vision of Vedic chivalry and the glories of the chase that the note of the occasion conjured into being. Devices like divinity in humanity humanity in divinity gave the hint also that regal deeds might still be enshrined in verse and story to become the glory of the future in the tale of prowess of the gods.

From the Aladdin realms of Udaipur's lake-land, the palaces and barbaric splendour of Jaipur's Vedic scenes, we have now been whirled to a city in the desert. It is one of the most dramatic of India's contrasts that the ruler of Bikanir—a city built on sand and surrounded by sand spreading away like a vast sea—seems as far removed from ancient ways as the poles are asunder. The Chief of a State in the desert, the Maharaja of Bikanir is no typical desert Chieftain as such may be conceived. It was a thoroughly Europeanised and soldierly Chief that greeted Their Royal Highnesses on their arrival at his capital this morning. Tall, good looking and, unlike his brother Chiefs of Jaipur and Udaipur, speaking perfect English, he presented a striking figure in the uniform of his own Camel Corps, which he accompanied to China, and which also did valuable service in Somaliland.

The scene at the station was another of the brilliant pictures which have succeeded each other so rapidly since Their Royal Highnesses landed in India. The guard-of-honour was furnished by a hundred of the Camel Corps attended by the State band. In review order of white tunic and breeches, with saffron and red turban and kammerband and black riding boots, the detachment made a very imposing appearance. Nine State sardars with their attendants were present in the brightest raiment and the decorative scheme was completed by a number of boys in saffron and scarlet robes placed upon the roof of the station buildings. They were the pupils of the Darbar High School in new uniforms of the State colours, and they carried little flags. They gave an effective background of blazing colour to the whole picture. The presentations to Their Royal Highnesses were conducted under a silver pillared-canopy, and after the Prince inspected the guard-of-honour the procession to the new Lallbagh Palace began. The route lay for over two miles along broad roads lined by companies of Mounted Camel Corps, other State retainers on camels, State troops, men in armour, camel carriages and carriages drawn by elephants. Past the old palace, now called the Fort, through the Curzon Gardens to the new palace, a handsome pile of buildings in red sandstone in the Saracenic style of architecture. The low square buildings in red sandstone typical of Bikanir which were passed on the way were greatly in contrast with the style of building seen in the other cities visited. Large numbers of people were gathered along the route and cheered loudly as the Royal procession passed.

As already telegraphed, the Prince shortly after arriving at the palace received a visit from the Maharaja, returning it about an hour later. The Prince and Princess accompanied by the Maharaja and members of the Royal suite in the afternoon, drove by motor to the shooting camp at Gujner, where arrangements had been made for a stay until Monday. The Prince was driven by Mr. Drummond in the Maharaja's twenty-four horse Brazier, the whole party requiring a number of cars. The Maharaja's own cars were reinforced by three large cars sent by the Maharaja of Gwalior.

Observer.—Though the Prince and Princess of Wales have barely crossed the threshold of India, their influence has been felt through the length and breadth of the Empire. In the bazars men of many creeds and castes have discussed the speech on the Apollo Bunder, and have pronounced it good. Chiefs and people have welcomed them with enthusiasm that astounds Anglo-Indians, and may compel some of them to revise opinion on the attitude of natives towards the British Raj. Apart from the popular aspects there are less obvious considerations that are likely to give permanent value to this visit. The presence of Their Royal Highnesses at this crisis in the affairs of India has a beneficent action. Already it has removed the sting of agitation, and turned thoughts from controversies that are not without danger. Even a week in Bombay brings conviction on this point.

Pioneer.—The Prince of Wales will hold a levée at Government House, Calcutta, on the 29th December.

Pioneer.—All round Bikanir as far as the eye can reach the desert spreads out its yellow carpet to the sun. To-day the little station has been turned for the Royal visit into a pavilion of orange and scarlet, its very roof lined with the boys of the Darbar High School, clad in turbans and tunics of those colours.

The Royal train arrived with its customary punctuality. The boys waved flags in rhythmical salute, and the guard-of-honour from the Ganga Risala smartly presented arms. The Maharaja, in the white uniform faced with scarlet of his Imperial Service Camel Corps, was on the platform, surrounded by the high officials of his State. The Agent to the Governor-General for Rajputana, Major Bruce, the Resident, and the European officials were in attendance, and once again the usual introductions and presentations were made, while a Royal salute was being fired. Then the route was taken to the new palace at Lallgarh, one of Sir Swinton Jacob's most successful adaptations of the Indo-Saracenic style of architecture to modern uses. For nearly two miles the roads were lined with the troops of the State and the City Guard. The Camel Corps occupied the place of honour outside the station, drawn up in a semi-circle facing the exit, and very smart and serviceable they looked in their white and orange uniforms on their picturesque, if ungainly, mounts. Camels were indeed conspicuous all along the route, camels with men in armour, transport camels and even camel carriages, alternating with bodies of State infantry in scarlet tunics and dark zouave trousers and orange and white turbans, and squadrons of State Lancers in dark blue and maroon and white puggis, and City Guards in sage-green. Though on a more modest scale the general effect resembled that at Jaipur, and the crowds which had assembled to witness the procession, though in less serried masses, were no less keenly alive to the exceptional character of the proceedings. Under the city walls and past the fine old palace within the Fort the Royal procession, with the Prince of Wales and the Maharaja in a carriage-and-four with outriders at the head, passed on under a succession of triumphal arches and loyal inscriptions to Lallgarh. The visit to Bikanir is, however, intended mainly as a period of rest and recreation for Their Royal Highnesses, and the usual visits and presentations which were quite informal having been disposed of in the forenoon, they proceeded in the afternoon to a camp laid out for them at Gujner, some 25 miles away, where excellent sport is expected.

This city in the wilderness is a wonderful instance of how man's perseverance and ingenuity can set at defiance Nature in her most hostile form. There are palaces and houses which are rich in beautiful carvings, the towns within the walls and fortified gates seem solidly built, while the detached structures at Lallgarh have all a charm in spite of their desert surroundings. Now with the pomp of military display the people in their gayest attire, flags and bannerets fluttering everywhere, Bikanir is enjoying its loyal demonstrations with great enthusiasm.

Native Chiefs have begun to arrive in Lahore for the occasion of the Royal visit. The Rajas of Chumba, Lambagraon, Mandi and Maler Kotla, with their staffs, have already come. The Rajas of Nabha and Jind are expected to-day.

27TH NOVEMBER 1903.

Englishman.—The great grouse shoot on the Gujner tank to-day was an extraordinarily successful affair. Twenty-one guns took part and were split up into several parties. His Royal Highness and the Maharaja being posted in adjacent butts on the lake adjoining the Gujner palace. The Prince was in excellent form and accounted for 207 birds, the Maharaja making the next best bag with 109. The grouse were wilder than usual, and His Royal Highness thoroughly enjoyed his morning's sport. The total bag amounted to 1,000 imperial grouse, 24 small grouse, 15 duck and one hare. The arrangements were excellent, several of the guns being driven out 15 miles across the desert in the early morning. Shooting began at 7.50 and lasted just three hours, and the whole arrangements were excellent.

Notwithstanding the exertions of the morning His Royal Highness was out again on Saturday afternoon, for an hour's sport, when he was accompanied by the Maharaja. He bagged a chinkara. The members of His Royal Highness's staff and the Maharaja's personal guests had a little pigsticking. Gujner is almost as famous for its pig as it is for grouse. There is excellent cover for piggy near the lake, and he is fed night and morning in much the same fashion as are the fortunate Udaipur pigs from the Khas Oodl. His Royal Highness's staff, a band of very keen sportsmen, deserve the best that can be given them. At Jaipur Sir Arthur Bigge, Lord Crichton, Mr. Frank Dugdale and Lord Shaftesbury held their own in very good company. One achievement of Sir Partab Singh's, which was not talked of until afterwards, deserves recording. His Highness was running down a boar which turned and charged gamely. As piggy came up Sir Partab jumped his pony over him and simultaneously striking downwards with the spear laid the good boar low. It was a pretty feat of horsemanship and skill. Advancing years have not yet weakened this gallant Rajput's seat in the pigskin and dimmed the keenness of his eye. But to return to Saturday's pigsticking, four boars were speared, one of which showed stubborn fight and gave the English visitors an excellent idea of what a Rajputana pig can do.

Sunday, as has been the case hitherto and will be throughout the tour, was a quiet day. Divine service was held at the Gujner Palace in the morning. The Royal party returns to Bikanir to-morrow and leaves for Lahore after dinner.

Englishman.—After the presentation of the Municipal Address at Prinsep's Ghat the Prince and Princess of Wales will leave the ghat by the eastern entrance and will pass across the Ellenborough Course, and thence on to the Red Road, on the sides of which will be erected galleries for the accommodation of school children who will sing the National Anthem as the Prince and Princess go past. The Lieutenant-Governor and the others will go by the shortest route to Government House so as to reach Government House before the Prince and Princess arrive and will join the Viceroy and the Government of India officers in the official reception. Arrangements are being made to accommodate about 3,000 people at Prinsep's Ghat where a dais and gallery will be erected.

Indian Daily News.—Bikanir.—The arrangements at the shooting camp at Gujner are on an elaborate scale, even to the provision of electric launches for crossing the Sugansagar Tank. The grouse shoot began this morning and news has been received here that excellent sport is being obtained.

Yesterday in proceeding to Gujner a motor brake carrying a party of fourteen broke down a few miles from Bikanir, the water tank bursting. One of the party returned on camel back with the news and carriages were sent out to convey the stranded men to Gujner.

The Prince has had most enjoyable sport at Gujner to-day, the sand grouse shoot being extraordinarily successful. Twenty-one guns took part, these being split up into several parties. The Prince and the Maharaja were posted in the adjacent butts on the Gujner lake adjoining the palace. His Royal Highness was in excellent form, no fewer than 207 birds falling to his gun. The Maharaja made the next best bag with 109. The grouse were wilder than usual, and the Prince thoroughly enjoyed his morning's sport. The total bag amounted to 1,000 imperial grouse, 20 small grouse, 15 duck, and one hare. The arrangements were excellent. The party at Gujner included, besides the Prince and Maharaja, Mr. Colvin, Sir Arthur Bigge, and General Beaton. Other parties were at Sugansagar, Golri Togirot tank, and Motawat tank, several of the guns being driven fifteen miles across the desert in the early morning to reach the shooting places. Shooting began at 7.50 A.M. and lasted just three hours. The programme of the day's sport included arrangements for pig-sticking by members of the suite in the afternoon.

The Prince went out yesterday afternoon for an hour's sport, accompanied by the Maharaja, and shot one chinkara. The Prince's staff and the Maharaja's guests went out in three parties for pigsticking, securing four boars, one of which showed great fight, giving the English visitors a good idea of what the Rajputana pig can do. The Princess saw the pigsticking from a carriage.

It appears that the accident to the motor brake conveying the guests to Gujner on Friday consisted of the breaking of a pipe of the water tank, while the carburettor also gave trouble. The defects have since been remedied.

Their Royal Highnesses, with their suite, attended divine service at eleven o'clock this morning. The service was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Green from Ajmer, who went out to Gujner camp early this morning. A day of absolute rest was passed by the Prince and Princess at the Gujner house and garden.

The programme of the Royal visit to Calcutta is now better advanced, and the following are details of what is likely to be done during the week which Their Royal Highnesses will spend in this city.

The Royal train is timed to reach Howrah at 3.24 P.M., local time, on December 29th. Their Royal Highnesses will be received at the platform, which, with the approaches to the railway jetty, will, of course, be profusely decorated, by the District Magistrate of Howrah, the Commissioner of Police, and others. On the railway pontoon, Their Royal Highnesses will, as previously mentioned, be received by the Chairman, Vice-Chairman, and members of the Port Commissioners and will embark on the Port Commissioners' ferry steamer Howrah, which also will be decorated. The Howrah with the Royal party and the Port Commissioners will then leave for Prinsep's Ghat under a Royal salute, escorted by a number of gaily adorned steam launches. As all the shipping in port will also be in festive array, the scene on the river is certain to be impressive. The public landing will, as is now generally known, take place at Prinsep's Ghat, where the Royal visitors will disembark at 4 o'clock. A grand-stand to seat 2,500 persons will be erected there, in the centre of which will be a raised dais, where the presentation of the address to His Royal Highness and of the jewel to the Princess of Wales by the Calcutta Corporation will take place. After the presentation a Royal procession, in which no other carriage will be permitted to take part, will be formed, the route being across the Ellenborough Course by Havildar's tank on to the Red Road, thence by the north-east gateway to Government House. Their Royal Highnesses will be escorted by the 15th Hussars, a mounted battery of Field Artillery, a squadron of Native Cavalry, the Imperial Cadet Corps, and the Calcutta Light Horse. The route along the Ellenborough Course will be prettily decorated with Venetian masts, and there will be stands along the Red Road, where, besides the school children, the general public will be assembled.

The Reception Committee have already received applications from the Parsi and Mohammedan communities, who will build stands for the convenience of their own people. The school children will be located in a central position in stands, which will be specially erected for them, the boys on one side of the road and the girls on the other. Bands will be stationed at various points. The children will carry small flags, and as the Royal party approaches, they will wave a welcome and together sing a verse of the National Anthem, and then a verse of "God Bless the Prince of Wales." The bands stationed along the route will play as the procession passes.

On Saturday, 30th December, it is probable that His Royal Highness will present colours to the King's Own Regiment in the morning. In the afternoon he will attend the Races in state, the arrangements being made by the Stewards of the Calcutta Turf Club.

On Sunday, the 31st, there will be a State service at St. Paul's Cathedral.

Monday, 1st January, will open with the usual Proclamation Parade, which His Royal Highness and the Princess will attend in State. An attraction at the parade will be the presence of the 15th Hussars. As at present arranged, His Royal Highness will attend the University Convocation in the afternoon, where he is to be invested with the degree of D.C.L. Unfortunately this engagement will clash with the Grand Military Chase which will be run for at the Tollygunge Course, and in which some officers of the Hussars and other distinguished military men will ride. Possibly some means will be found to get out of the difficulty. In the afternoon Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales attends a pardah party at Belvedere, and at night there will be the usual State banquet at Government House.

Tuesday, 2nd January, has been set apart for a public reception, which will be wholly Indian in character, and will last from 4 to 7 P.M. A pavilion of horse-shoe shape to hold 9,000 persons will be constructed on that portion of the maidan between Chowringhee and the Casuarina Avenue. In the centre of the pavilion will be a dais, richly decorated in Indian style, for Their Royal Highnesses. On their arrival the National Anthem will be sung in the vernacular, and then certain old Indian ceremonies will be gone through, according to the teachings of the Shastras and the Koran. The pavilion will be lighted by electric light, the tanks will be illuminated, massed bands will play selections of music at intervals, and a selected choir of school children will sing "God Bless the Prince of Wales". There will be a Bawl dance, Tibetan ghost, and other dances.

The decorations all about will be on a lavish scale, the Casuarina Avenue in particular being decorated with hanging tapestries painted by Signor Gilhardi. The entertainment will end with a display of fireworks, and on the return journey to Government House the road will be lined by 1,000 men carrying lighted torches.

On Tuesday, the 3rd, Their Royal Highnesses will drive through the city to see the illuminations. The procession, so far as at present known, will start from Government House by the south-east gate at 9-15 P.M. and will proceed along the following route:—Government Place, East, Red Road, Outram Avenue, Chowringhee, Esplanade East, Government Place, Old Court House Street, Dalhousie Square, East, Lal Bazar Street, Lower Chitpore Road, Harrison Road, Strand, Fairlie Place, Dalhousie Square, West, Hare Street, Strand, Auckland Road, Northbrook Avenue, Esplanade, West, to the south-west gate of Government House.

On Wednesday, the 4th, there will be a shooting expedition, somewhere not far from Calcutta.

Thursday, the 5th, will be another great day, when His Royal Highness will, in full State, lay the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall. Great preparations are being made for this event, accommodation being provided for 2,500 persons.

On Friday, the 6th, Their Royal Highnesses will leave for Darjeeling, returning thence by rail to Diamond Harbour, where they will embark on board the Renown for Rangoon.

Morning Post.—(By H. E. Prevost Battersby: Bombay, 9th November 1905). Guns, guns, and guns again. Thirty-one guns for Their Royal Highnesses's arrival; thirty-one guns for His Majesty's Birthday; thirty-one guns on His Excellency's embarkation, and guns once more for the Governor of Bombay. Then, when all visits of ceremony had been paid, thirty-one guns as the Prince left the ship, a Royal salute when he reached the Bunder, and thirty-one guns when he stepped on shore. In a country where a man's significance is exactly announced and precedence so jealously regulated by gun fire, where his lifelong ambition may be to add one more cartridge to his salute, the importance of filling the air with reverberations and dimming the harbour with smoke can be conceived, and seeing that every detonation had a double echo from the islands and the hills, how completely such an objective has been realised may be imagined.

The noise of the guns seemed to go to the heads of the natives: they came pouring in thousands out of the city, shouting as they ran. They left whatever they might have been doing, and started like a brown swarm of bees for the harbour, buzzing inordinably, a jabber of excited anticipation; fat Parsees, burly Hindus, and women loaded with babies, panting and perspiring but pursuing with the rest. The sea front was speedily a braid of colour twenty turbans deep, till an indignant member of the European police, the yellow pugaree about his helmet alone relieving his immaculate whiteness, became aware of the invasion, and bicycled down upon it. He had only his indignation, a small cane, and a limited supply of the vernacular, but they sufficed for the purpose, and he drove, in the end, the brown thousands back, barking at them, from one direction and then from another, just as a collie shepherds a flock of sheep. So they missed the near approach of the Renown and her escort, the battleship conspicuous through the hot sea haze by the colour of its great flags, the red cross of the Admiral's pendant, the gorgeous heraldry of the Prince's standard, the sacred ensign of St. George.

The smoke of the guns drifting down the calm water hid presently all the incoming ships, save those proud flags spread out against the gray-blue sky; symbols, one might think them, of an unclouded purpose still floating, though its efficient instruments were veiled. In line abreast the four warships steamed past Kolaba, the Proserpine and For inshore, then the Renown, and beyond her the big four-funnelled Terrible. They found all the shipping dressed for the occasion, and broke out their own bunting as soon as moorings had been picked up. It is a curious thing that though flags are proper to ships they only seem expressive when put to their explicit uses. There was all the pomp and splendour of a mastery of the seas in the Renown's great ensign and standard, but there is not the least air of festivity in a warship dressed in flags. She loses all her threatening dignity, and gains nothing in decoration. However, the open-mouthed crowds of Bombay no doubt thought differently since Bombay had adorned herself in flags in the tiresome and unimaginative English manner. One looked for the East, at least, to come in here; to show us that surprising handling of colour which is such a commonplace in its personal decoration. But either the East had had nothing to do with it or gave fresh proof of that sedulous imitation which is eating like a canker into its decorative art. Draped balconies, wreathed pillars, Venetian masts, and festoons of bunting: there was nothing in Bombay that would discredit London's sorriest efforts to look gay. She had succeeded in disfiguring even her fine buildings without adding the least elation to their effect.

Temperatures here still run well up into the nineties, a moist heat that encourages movement in neither mind nor body, though skies are cloudless and the air seems clear, and thus movement avoids the middle hours of the day; and it was close on four when the Prince landed. There was erected above the steps of the Apollo Bander, where all great personages set foot in India, a crimson shamianna, or open pavilion, where all the military and civil magnificence of Bombay was assembled to meet him. A white tunic such as the Prince was wearing, with the badges of his rank and the pale blue riband of the Star of India, represents military splendour in the East, but the splendour of the Indian potentate is just what pleases him, and there is very little in the way of prismatic opportunity in which he does not delight. One is grateful for his emerald-greens and turquoise-blues, his sumptuous purples, his flaming reds, his pale, delicate tints and touches, his silks, his velvets, his stiff embroideries, his airy gauzes, his prodigal plastering of himself with gold and jewels; but it is impossible to describe him in detail without rendering him grotesque, a thing which he never is, whatever his magnificence. So the glories of Meherban, Rawalji, Jam, Raj Saheb, Naik Nimbalkar, Thakor, Sar Desai, Rao, Nawab, and Maharaja, which met the Prince on his arrival, must merely be imagined; it was compounded of all colours and materials seen through a haze of gold.

All approaches to the Bunder having been swept clear of the crowd, the city looked almost deserted from the sea, all visible streets being empty save where the escort was drawn up. Had the intention been to provide contrast it was certainly attained when the Royal procession formed and moved off into the town.

A brown crowd, lean, lightly clothed, and very tolerant of pressure puts twice as much humanity as a white one into the square yard, and the crowd in the Fort, which is now the business quarter, seemed packed twice as tight as ever brown humanity can go. In the open space about the Wellington Fountain, whence the Governor's, the Viceroy's, and the Prince's processions diverged on their several routes, the crowd, fifty to five hundred deep, covered every spot except the guarded roadway. It looked as if water poured over it would not have reached the ground. The front rank sat on its chin, the next on its elbows, the next on its heels, the next knelt, and so on up to tiptoe, and friendly waists and shoulders. It was a solid wedge of brown flesh and blood. When the white-clad mounted police backed into the edge of it and the edge winced, the movement spread backward through the entire mass, like a chorous gesture in comic opera or a wheat-field bending to the wind. When any in the cramped front ranks showed signs of rising the prowling, yellow-capped native constables knocked them back on to their stiff calves or elbows with the hilts of their little swords. No one resented this assistance to symmetry; a crack over the head seemed quite the accepted restorative on such occasions, a sort of first aid.

A queer crowd! meek, yet assertive, with an eye, a rather sad eye, for a good horse and a good rider; free, good-humoured, and quick with its comments, the talk rolling to and fro over those tens of thousands in a curious hard, clattering roar. One wondered of what all those brown heads were thinking, if they thought at all. But they were shy of questions; almost resented any curiosity as to why they were there. "What should we expect?" replies a coolie. "He is a Prince who comes into his realm." The expectancy was confessed on every face, and probably some vague hope lay, unconfessed, behind it. A big country fellow, who had driven his bullocks in for the show, waved the inquiry aside. "Who can know what is in the King's heart?" he answered gravely.

One should be grateful if the Royal tour yield as much as that—the thought in the minds of the common people of goodwill going out to them from the heart of the King. The Devil, pleaded the Sinner in the Persian story, is everywhere, but the Powers of Light are only here and there. It thus behoved a poor man, he argued, to treat with respect an influence so obviously interested, whatever gifts might be thought appropriate to the Supreme Being. Thus, too, for Hindu and Muhammadan the Supreme Being in their allegiance across the seas, of whom they see nothing and hear nothing that interests them, comes to count inevitably for something less than the Darkness at their elbow, whom they find it politic to propitiate.

It is well, therefore, that they should associate the Prince as closely as they do with his Royal father. "Raja aie!" "The King comes!" they cried as they waited, and their welcome could hardly have been heartier if it had been the King indeed. The white tunics of the British troops, of the 10th Hussars and Horse Artillery were alternated effectively in the procession with the blue and red of the 33rd Cavalry, a silladar regiment looking fit for anything, carrying the sword under the near saddle flap, and the rifle slung by a new equipment across the back, the splendid uniform of the Imperial Service Lancers, the sky-blue lungi with jewelled agrette, black, gold-braided tunic with red facings, and red cummerbund of the Rajkumar cadets, and the gold and scarlet, white breeches, and jack boots of the Governor's Bodyguard, perhaps the finest ceremonial troops in India, every man of them inches over six feet. They almost dimmed the Royal carriage with its gorgeous golden umbrella, but the waiting people had clearly eyes for nothing else, risking a fresh crack from the constable's sword in their efforts to keep the Prince in sight, and surging, shouting after him in a flood of colour the instant the roadway's guardians were removed.

Newcastle Daily Journal.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India promises to be as memorable, and to have the same happy results, as that made by King Edward thirty years ago. Everywhere the Royal visitors are being welcomed with the utmost enthusiasm, and from the spontaneous warm-heartedness of their reception the Prince and Princess have been made to feel, as His Royal Highness said, as if they are at home among their own people. That the same enthusiasm will mark the subsequent stages of their tour there is every reason to believe. There is only one feature to disturb the general happiness, and that is that certain districts are threatened with distress, if not actual famine. These recurrent periods of distress will, with the extension of irrigation works, become things of the past; but, in the meantime, they have to be taken account of when the rains fail. In the Jaipur State, which has been splendidly entertaining the Prince and Princess, distress or famine may ensue if the winter rains fail. The enlightened ruler of the State has taken every possible measure to mitigate the said consequences, and, in commemoration of the Royal visit, has given a further donation of four lakhs of rupees to the Famine Fund, which he originally started by a gift of twenty lakhs. The Maharaja's two donations amount to nearly £160,000, a truly princely gift, which will be followed by handsome donations from other parts of India if the necessity should arise.

Pioneer.—We publish to-day the first accounts of the series of meetings that are being organised at the district head-quarters throughout the United Provinces to carry through the scheme for the Medical College that is to be a memorial of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. There can be no sort of question by this time that the Medical College is what the public really desires. From the moment that the suggestion was put forward by the Maharaja of Ajodhia, we believe in the first instance, it was adopted all over the Provinces with a singular unanimity that made it quite clear that whatever difficulties might be encountered it was not a feeling of preference for any alternative project that would stand in the way. The origins of the movement were not less notable in their spontaneity. The Maharaja of Ajodhia and his fellow Talukdars took counsel together, and it was only when their private action had placed the scheme on an assured footing that it was produced before the public and the support of the Lieutenant-Governor requested and obtained. If for a moment there was the shadow of a feeling in the public mind that the part of Oudh had been somewhat too prominent, that passed off as soon as it arose, and there is now nothing to choose between the two portions of the Province in the heartiness of the support that they are giving to the common cause. There seems to be no doubt remaining now as to the success of the scheme. Ten lakhs of rupees, the minimum required for a start, represents a large call on the voluntary subscriptions of such a community as that of the United Provinces. Such a sum would be very easily raised, no doubt, with any official "encouragement," not to say stimulus. But the Government has wisely determined to let this be a people's memorial in the fullest sense of the word. The difficulty has been to resist the feeling among the people themselves that the Commissioner and Collector ought to come forward and lead the way, but it has been resisted except in so far as those officials have attended meetings, and being elected to the chair, have lent an assistance that it would have been churlish to refuse. In the truest sense the Government has been relying on the spirit of the public, and the reliance has not been misplaced. Six and a half of the ten lakhs have already been promised and the local Committees are only at the beginning of their work. The Oudh Districts at present take the lead, but it is a lead that will soon be disputed, though after all it is not the occasion for provincial rivalry. The movement is a joint and combined movement of the two provinces, the first combined movement of the kind, for a common end in which all classes are working together. There has been nothing quite like it in our recollection; and it is only to be accounted for by the existence of a universal feeling that the College is not merely a real want, but that it will be the most acceptable memorial that could be offered to a Prince whose sympathy with the alleviation of sickness and disease has been prominent ever since he came to manhood.

Pioneer.—A meeting was held in the Victoria Hall, Fyzabad, on the 22nd instant at 4 p.m. to raise subscriptions in connection with His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's Memorial Fund. Rai Gokul Chand Bahadur proposed that Mr. R. E. Hamblin, Commissioner of Fyzabad, should take the chair. The proposal was seconded by B. Manohar Lal, Chairman, Municipal Board, and passed unanimously. Mr. Hamblin said:—

"Gentlemen,—You all know the object for which we are assembled: it is to collect subscriptions towards the cost of erecting the buildings of the proposed Lucknow Medical College. Such a College was contemplated 35 years ago, but the proposal was then dropped. The present has been held a favourable time for its reconsideration, and Sir Partab Narain Singh, K.C.I.E., Maharaja of Ajodhia, has placed the proposal before the public. A meeting has been held at Lucknow and about five lakhs have already been subscribed. The proposal includes a hospital, class rooms, library, museum, laboratories, residences for students and professors, and suitable recreation grounds. Local committees have been formed in each district, and it was with much pleasure that I accepted the invitation of the Fyzabad Local Committee to preside at this meeting.

"There is one prominent reason why the present is a favourable time for considering the proposal. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales are now visiting India, and it is thought these Provinces should possess a memorial of their visit which would perpetuate the fact of the visit, and at the same time be a source of permanent benefit to the Provinces. It is hoped that if sufficient subscriptions are raised that the Prince may lay the foundation-stone during his coming visit to Lucknow. We wish then to have a memorial to commemorate the visit. Our loyalty can be shown by our subscriptions, but it would be a mistake to imagine that our loyalty needs to be proved in any such way. We all love and revere our Royal Family; our late gracious Queen-Empress Victoria by her wise and sympathetic rule caused all the various parts of her vast dominions to unite in fervent loyalty towards the Crown. Many of you have doubtless read the excellent book by Kazi Aziz-uddin Ahmad about Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and will have therefrom learnt, if such indeed were necessary, fresh reasons for loving and respecting these two members of the Royal Family. These two have come to India so that they may learn something of the country and peoples over which they will have, let us hope at a long deferred date, to rule. It is a great mistake to imagine that Kings and Queens have only pleasures in life and no duties. Every one has his duty to perform, and the higher his place the more arduous and responsible his duty. This was recognised by the present King-Emperor when he came to India many years ago to make friends with the people here. He spent many years learning the duties he was later on called to do, and how excellently he spent his years of apprenticeship is shown by the position now held by our mighty Empire, and his great success as a ruler. He has well-earned his new noble title of Peace-maker, with which he has been acclaimed by the world's public opinion. Following the example of his Royal father, the Prince of Wales wishes to acquire similar experience. May we not give him the happiness of knowing that his visit to these Provinces will result in a permanent benefit to the people. We know how desirous the King and the Prince of Wales are to help hospitals and diminish pain and suffering. The Prince would wish that his visit should result in a permanent benefit to the people of these Provinces, and we can by our subscriptions help this wish to have effect.

"Besides this first great reason of a memorial of the visit, there are the second and third great reasons that we will be helping forward a great work of charity and a public benefit. It is one of the highest duties in a civilised community for each to do all in his power to lessen the amount of sickness and suffering in the country. How can we better accomplish this duty than by joining in starting this college from which in future years will issue doctors fully qualified to do all that lies in human power to fight with illness and disease. Many a sick man in the future will bless the generosity of those whose subscriptions enable him to secure proper medical treatment. I would also just mention a further practical reason for aiding this work, and that is that it will provide a fresh source of employment for educated persons. The medical needs of the country are very great, for we know from our own experience that not only do old forms of sickness continue, but new ones arise. In the great fight against illness that goes on daily there is need of every recruit that can be secured. There is also a large demand for medical men for sanitary purposes of the Provinces. We are not able to rival the magnificent generosity of the Maharaja of Balrampur, but each can give what he can spare."

On the conclusion of the speech B. Manohar Lal made a stirring speech in English, which was followed by another in Urdu by M. Mahomed Faiq. M. Imtiaz Ali then proposed, and B. Gopal Lal seconded the names of certain residents to be added to the list of the local Committee.

A public meeting of the citizens of Agra was held on Thursday, 23rd November, in the gardens of Pandit Jagan Nath Sahib. Rais and Pleader of Agra, in connection with the Memorial of the Royal visit.

Mr. Saiyid Alay Nabi Sahib, B.A., Vakil, High Court, Rais and Municipal Commissioner and Secretary of the Prince of Wales's Reception Committee of Agra, Hakim Saiyid Sakhawati Ali Sahib, Rais and Honorary Magistrate, and certain other gentlemen were unavoidably absent.

Kunwar Kanhai Singh Sahib was voted to the chair.

The following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

I. That a local Committee of the Prince of Wales's Memorial Fund, consisting of the abovenamed gentlemen, with power to add to their number, be formed at Agra, the aims and objects of which will be as follows:—

To form Sub-Committees of the said fund at the headquarters of all the tehsils of Agra district and to open subscription lists in aid of the Medical College, Lucknow, which will unquestionably be a great boon for the living and the future generations of these Provinces.

II. That the Commissioner of the Agra Division, the Collector, the District Judge and the Civil Surgeon of Agra, and Raja Balwant Singh Sahib Bahadur, C.I.E., of Avagarh, be requested to become patrons of the committees and to co-operate with their cause.

III. That Pandit Jagan Nath Sahib be elected as General Secretary, and Saiyid Abdul Husan Sahib, Khan Bahadur, and Munshi Dwarika Prasad Sahib, as Joint Secretaries of the Agra Local Committee.

IV. That as most of the members and the local authorities are very busy over the preparations for the Royal visit, the next meeting of this committee be held early in January 1906; the exact date to be notified by the Secretary later on.

That a copy of these proceedings be sent to the Prince of Wales's Memorial Fund Central Committee, Lucknow.

A Meerut correspondent telegraphs on the 25th instant:—A meeting in aid of the Prince of Wales's Memorial Fund was held at the Town Hall this morning, Mr. W. H. Cobb, C.S., presiding. Resolutions were carried approving the Central Committee's proposal for establishing a Medical College at Lucknow to commemorate the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to these Provinces, and for strengthening the local Committee by adding more names to the present ones. In addition to the promise of subscriptions, Chaudhri Dube Singh, Rais of Asowral (Rs. 1,000), and Lala Ramanajayal, Rais of Meerut (Rs. 500), about Rs. 3,000 were subscribed in the meeting by the following gentlemen and others:—Mr. W. H. Cobb, Magistrate, Rs. 100; Sheikh Wahibuddin, Rs. 1,000; Rao Kurshed Ali Khan, Rs. 500; Lala Banarsi Dass, Rs. 250; Lala Dulip Singh, Rs. 250; Nawab Asad-ullah Khan, Rs. 100.

Rangoon Gazette.—In connection with the coming visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, the following proposals which have been made by the Administrators of the Victoria Park are likely to be carried out. The road through the Park will be closed to carriage traffic previous to the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses on the afternoon of 13th January. It will be left open throughout the afternoon for foot-passengers. Their Royal Highnesses's carriage will arrive at the south-west end of the road where it joins Cemetery Road, and will proceed to the eastern gate of the Zoological portion of the Park. Here the Chairman of the Administrators of the Park will deliver a short address. Their Royal Highnesses will then inspect the Park and will drive out through the gates presented by Mr. Sofaer. Admission to the Park will be by ticket. The Park will be closed from to-day to enable it to be put in order. The water-supply which has been so generously granted by the Municipality will shortly be laid on. The tanks will be cleaned and the grass will be made as presentable as time permits.

Western Daily Press (Bristol).—The tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales through India continues to be followed with sympathetic interest in this country, whilst in India itself it is the main topic of conversation and press comment. From the moment that the Royal party landed at Bombay, success has attended the enterprise, and the Royal visitors have been received by all sorts and conditions of the Emperor's subjects with the utmost enthusiasm. The Prince himself has entered whole-heartedly into the sports of the people, and his public utterances have been dignified and tactful. The Princess has, moreover, endeared herself to the native women of all castes and creeds, and nothing whatever has occurred to mar the triumphant progress of the illustrious tourists. Yesterday the Royal party encamped some distance to the north of Bikaner, the little Rajput State which possesses many distinctive characteristics. The feudatory Prince of Bikaner is a young man of great capability. He is described as practically an English gentleman, for he has made himself familiar with this country and all its institutions. In him the East and West have met. Proud of the traditions of the Hindu race, the Prince of Bikaner has become imbued with the keen sense of the value of Western civilisation, and he has introduced into his State many innovations, which half a century ago would have been deemed impossible there. To-day the Royal party will bid adieu to the feudatory Prince of Bikaner, and will proceed by rail to Lahore, the capital of the great province of the Punjab, which has figured so conspicuously in Indian history, and has given to the Indian native army some of its most superb horsemen. The fight for the Punjab was long and violent, but, perhaps, no province is now more loyal to the British Raj. It is rather unfortunate that at the present juncture the Punjab is not at its best. In consequence of the scarcity of rain, the population has been hard pressed for food supplies. The shortage has never quite amounted to a famine, but there has been considerable hardship amongst the natives. The Prince of Wales will be able to see for himself how greatly some parts of India, particularly in the north-western provinces, are dependent upon irrigation works. It has been the policy of successive Viceroy to promote, by every possible means, the multiplication of these irrigation works, to which Lord Curzon made special reference in one of his valedictory speeches. The outlook in this respect is steadily improving, and no doubt within a reasonable time the artificial circulation of water throughout certain provinces of India will have reduced the risk of famine almost to the vanishing point. But it is just as well for the Prince of Wales to see the system in the making, and to make himself acquainted with the embarrassments against which large sections of India's native population have so frequently to contend. Lahore, where the Royal party will to-day arrive, is a picturesque and interesting city, the seat of the Moguls. Its population is about two-thirds that of Bristol, and there are around it some of the most picturesque vistas which Northern India can afford. Lahore will be the last stopping-place of the Royal tourists prior to proceeding to the furthest point on the Indian frontier. At Peshawar they will be on the confines of Afghanistan and at that point the cavalcade will turn back towards India, and in a week or so hence the Prince and Princess will be present at a large-scale review of Indian and British troops at Rawalpindi.

It is almost a pity that the Amir of Afghanistan could not be persuaded to journey eastwards from his capital at Kabul to Peshawar, there to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales in Darbar. The political effect of such a meeting would have been important, more especially as there have recently been current some rumours descriptive of the Amir's attitude towards the Indian Government as not quite so cordial as might be desired. The most recent British Mission to Kabul was not an unqualified success. Very little was achieved, and there is an impression that the Amir himself gained considerably more than he conceded. It is a fact, however, that the Amir has drawn his subsidy since the British Mission returned from Kabul, so that whatever may be his political leanings he has not failed to avail himself of the financial part of the bargain. But if the Prince of Wales is not fated to meet the Amir, His Royal Highness is, according to an apparently well-authenticated report, destined to make the acquaintance of an equally picturesque personality. The announcement is to the effect that, on the invitation of the Indian Government, the Tashi Lama of Tibet will journey to Calcutta, there to be presented to the son and heir of the Emperor of India. The Prince and Princess are timed to arrive at Calcutta during the final days of the year, so that there will be plenty of time to complete the arrangements for what will be a significant and historic meeting. When the Dalai Lama left Lhasa, the Tashi Lama became the spiritual head of the Buddhist Church. His influence amongst the Tibetans and others of the Buddhist faith is enormous, and the great point about the impending meeting is that the Tashi Lama has never, for any purpose whatever, quitted the territory of Tibet. That he should do so with the express intention of meeting the Prince and Princess of Wales is a fact the significance of which can hardly be overestimated. In the eyes of the Tibetans he is the embodiment of all spiritual and temporal power, and he is also held in the greatest veneration by all the members of the Buddhist sect wherever they may happen to be. It is understood that the Tashi Lama has always been well disposed towards the Indian Government; and had the now deposed Dalai Lama listened to his advice, there would have been no reason for the British military expedition to Lhasa. That was an enterprise which was open to criticism. But what has been done cannot be undone now, and it is better that every possible measure should be adopted for the purpose of making the best of the situation as it stands. Even if no other benefit had accrued from the Royal tour in India, that journey would have been fully justified by the bringing of the most responsible of all Tibetans into close and cordial touch with the direct representative of the Emperor of India in Calcutta. The meeting should do much to remove any lingering bitterness and suspicion that may exist in Tibet regarding the attitude and intentions of the Indian Government. For it cannot be supposed the mere signing of the treaty would at once effect a change of public opinion in Tibet. It must be the policy of the Indian Government to cultivate the best possible relations with this curious people, and the most effective way to do this is to bring their most distinguished and most responsible representative into close and agreeable communication not only with the Indian and Imperial Governments, but with the direct representative of the Sovereign himself.

28TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Lahore is ready to receive the Prince and Princess of Wales. It has made its preparations hurriedly, but not inadequately. Time was short, for although the Royal visit might have been anticipated two years back, the exact date, the exact programme, could not be settled until near the eleventh hour. Once the details were fixed, the work went forward with a bound, and is now complete. Lahore is to-day en fete. Its miles of white drear road glitter in holiday garb. The glorious winter sunlight, soft but brilliant, illumines a spreading spectacle of gaiety. In all directions avenues of colour stretch forth into the distance, symbolising the abounding joyousness of the populace. Every public thoroughfare glows with many-hued hangings. Every public building and almost every private building flutters its welcome. Numerous triumphal arches impart Oriental pomp to the scene. The desert of drab kunker smiles. At night endless illuminations will cast their glamour over the Royal routes. It is not the thousands of willing rupees which have wrought this manifestation. It is not even the thousands of willing workers. It is the spirit of the Punjab, the exuberant spirit of loyalty, which, proud of itself and of the object of its enthusiasm, has thus burst into song.

For, what do these decorations typify? They are assuredly no formal assumption of darbar raiment. No Gazette notification prescribed them. Spontaneously they sprang up. A single Indian nobleman, with a munificence which is the badge of his tribe, offered to defray the entire cost of the work "on behalf of the citizens of Lahore," but the citizens of Lahore, while recognising the true nobility of the intended gift, would have none of it. Their public spirit came strong upon them. They would not be denied the gratification of bearing their own share in the welcome: they insisted on an open subscription list. Hence, when the Prince of Wales feasts his eyes upon the blaze of colour by day and of lantern by night, he will rightly read into the display an expression of sincere goodwill—of goodwill towards himself, towards the Royal house of which he is the pillar, towards the nation and the empire of which his illustrious father is the exemplar. He will see in the decorations an Indian tribute of appreciation to the justice and benevolence of British rule. The flag; and the banners, the pennons and the streamers, as they float merrily overhead, will tell him that the Punjab feels honestly merry to see its Prince and future Emperor. They will tell him that the people are merry because, under the British Crown, they enjoy peace and prosperity; because the days of oppression and tyranny are gone for ever; because strife and violence no longer redden the soil; because, in this pre-eminently rural province, agriculture pursues its humble course in perpetual serenity. Shadows there are indeed, but they are the shadows of natural misfortune from which no country has ever or can ever be wholly preserved. What every Punjabi feels, what every Punjabi desires by his decorations of house and street to attest before the Prince, is that the frowns of Nature are as nothing to him at this glad moment. Far is all this from blind adulation of, paramouncy. Punjab political opinion is neither undiscerning nor unintelligent. Its emblem is the lion, not the buffalo. But every critic, even every caviller, appreciates the distinction between vicerealty which comes and goes and true royalty which is the fount of governmental perfection. The most censorious of the native newspapers of the Punjab can to-day utter nothing but sweet sounds. As one Hindu editor in Lahore wrote recently: "The capital of the Punjab is feeling a thrill of loyal emotion in anticipation of the visit which has already roused the enthusiasm of the princes and people of Rajasthan."

Loyalty may be but of the lip. Punjab loyalty is triumphantly proved to flow from the heart. The sword of the Punjab has been drawn, the blood of the Punjab has been shed, in times that history will never forget, to support British dominion. Hereabouts stands the main gateway of the British Indian Empire. On the fidelity of the gate-keepers, too oft attested to be ever doubted, the security of the whole estate depends. Here, if anywhere, in the future, as in the past, will the destinies of India be re-determined. Here live and flourish the manliest races any Eastern clime ever bred. Here staunchness and gallantry are almost vulgar virtues. From here springs the flower of the world-famous Indian Army. It is not from a freak of geographical fancy that the grand military manoeuvres in commemoration of the Rhyas' tour are of rare place in the Punjab. It is not from an accident of distribution that the Punjab plains provide High Asia with an Aldershot. Every man who to-day will stand by the road-side to cheer the brilliant procession, will understand the inner political meaning of his own hurrah and of the Prince's answering recognition. The thousands who greet the Prince will represent the millions who would delight to greet him with the same shout. If the cry of the province—the guard-room of India—could to-day become articulate in the Prince's ear it would take up the thrilling motto "Thy Sentinel am I!"

Englishman.—A little less than a century and a half ago one Beeka, a cadet of the ruling house of Jodhpur, led three hundred of his clansmen into the heart of the desert. Those three hundred Rahtores went forth to slay or be slain, and like the hundred men of Marseilles, who knew how to die, consummated the French Revolution, and changed the face of Europe, there was no withstanding them. After early successes against the outlying tribes Beeka came by agreement to rule over the Jats, the strongest and most numerous of the desert peoples, and on a little kankar ridge at the back of beyond laid the foundations of his capital. History does not tell us how he and his people supported life in this practically rainless country, whilst wells three hundred feet deep were being dug, but the grip of the Rahtore cadet on the land never relaxed. Hardened and protected by the desert this foray was the beginning of a great warrior State, the Bikanir of to-day.

The very existence of Bikanir as a city seems to be an insult and an affront to nature. There is absolutely no ostensible reason for its being. The sun-baked, wind-worn, machiolated walls stand knee-deep in a vast sea of sand which laves the very bases of the fortifications. North, south, east and west the watch tower looks out upon this tawny waste, broken only by little patches of poverty-stricken scrub and by a tiny temple or two, which are obviously offshoots of the capital. To this desert city came Their Royal Highnesses and their staff, frankly for the purposes of a little shooting to vary the strain of a long round of ceremonies, and with them others who were not to shoot and who anticipated with some little distress four days' idleness in the wilderness. But whilst these came with heavy hearts they remained with light ones, for they were days of unrestrained joy. The charms of the desert city lie not on the surface, but they are there for all who have eyes to see.

The fascination of the desert has grown on everyone, the dignity and the solemnity of these vast untamable wastes. And with that fascination has come the exhilaration of this bracing, sand-dried air, the joy of the golden sunsets. Does it seem absurd to call the desert beautiful? Yet in the hush of dawn, when after a moment's hesitation the glorious sunlight floods the sky bringing with it the faint stirring breeze, it is nothing less. At eventide when to the unbroken stillness of the barren land the sun goes down wrapping the sky from delicate yellow fading into exquisite green, which we associate with clear winter evenings at home, it can leave none untouched. Even on the outskirts of the city the desert has its little mysteries, criss-crossed with tracks, which begin nowhere and end nowhere, traversed by hard, lean, sun-burnt peasants moving with the unhastened gait of the East coming from and disappearing into the empty horizon.

The desert has left its mark upon Bikanir and its peoples. The city is like nothing else in India, and is more Arabian or Saracenic than Hindu. The sun-baked and red-coated walls, the flat roofs suggest Damascus and Asia Minor rather than Hindustan. While the main streets of the bazaar are as bright as those of any Indian town, crowded with clamorous vendors and shrill-tongued buyers, in the side roads takes a silence rare in the East. The desert has also left its impress upon the manner and habits of the people. Physically it would be hard to find a harder set of men than these dried, lean, fiery peasants, and their habit is of the simplest. A coat and turban of the coarsest country cloth suffices for the men, nor do the comely women seem to indulge in finery. The Bikanir bazaar is about the best example of genuine swadeshi to be found in a town of its size in India. Some foreign wares must be imported, but the proportion is trifling. Such glimpses as were afforded of the homes of the people revealed a cleanliness as exact as that of the desert.

When the characteristic life of the bazaar palled, there were the bizarre antiquities of the palace and the fort. Tradition says that no ruler of Bikanir should dwell in the halls occupied by his predecessors, and hence has grown up within the walls of the fort that clings to the city's defences a great irregular pile without harmony and without design. On the walls of the outer portal are impressed the marble models of the little hands of those widows burnt with their lords. Within is everything incongruous that the East can show. Shady courtyards where fretted walls and balconies look into the cool depths of a marble tank, veritable haunts of ancient peace, open into chambers splashed with the cheapest and most tawdry colours; marble halls with gold and silver chairs of State are but the annexes to rooms hung with degraded green chandeliers and walled with willow pattern plates. Here appalling engravings of the early Victorian period hang on walls painted with scenes from the Hindu mythology. There crude drawings of an elephant chariot and a palanquin sandwich a sketch of a locomotive. In the well kept armoury the weapons of Rajput chivalry hang side by side with Moorish jezails, Andrea Ferara blades, and maces brought to Palestine by the Crusaders. Cheek by jowl with these relics of the centuries is the new wing, a mass of carved sandstone lighted by the electric light. There, as the Maharaja and his circle have removed to the new Lallgarh Palace, the silence of abandonment broods over all, whilst from window and balcony you look over the khaki wastes and listen to the melodious cry of the bullock driver as he urges his oxen down the ramp to draw water from the three hundred-foot well.

Side by side with these memorials of the past is arising a new Bikanir. In their tour through Rajputana Their Royal Highnesses have visited the States of these widely varying types of native rulers of Udaipur, conservative and orthodox, but of the strictest honour; of Jaipur, orthodox of the orthodox, but animated by the most generous instincts; and of Bikanir, a representative of the modern school. His Highness the Maharaja of Bikanir was educated at the Mayo College, and has passed through the training which after mature consideration has been decided upon as best suited to the present generation of Indian Princes, and in many ways his personal influence can be felt in the State. An Aide-de-Camp to the Prince, His Highness is a fine, soldierly figure and his Imperial Service Troops are a credit to the State. Whether as camelry in Somaliland or as infantry in China they showed the best martial qualities. The Bikanir gaol is as well managed as any in the world and its carpets have acquired a fame which necessitated the creation of a separate industry outside the gaol walls to meet the demand.

The Lallgarh Palace, a couple of miles from the town, a beautifully proportioned pile of carved red sandstone, is one of the most perfect specimens of modern Hindu architecture. The design is from the prolific brain of Sir Swinton Jacob, but His Highness gave the freest play to his creative genius. To these qualities the Maharaja adds those of the perfect host. Every detail of the large camps at Bikanir and Gujner was personally supervised by him, and the arrangements were perfect. If His Highness did not literally offer half his kingdom to his guests, he placed everything in his possession at their disposal.

The peculiar characteristics of Bikanir were never so clearly revealed as on this progress. Indeed the scenes in the streets were like a series of vivid pictures from biblical history. The women gathered on the flat house tops, patches of green and yellow and red, silently watching the Royal procession pass and bursting into shrill chatter the moment it had disappeared. Each little hole in the wall was a nest of eager faces splashed with the gorgeous hues of the saris. In the side streets the people were not permitted to congregate, so narrow are they that they scarcely permitted the Royal carriage to pass, but the moment the escort turned into the broader highways the whole population was seen to be out for the tamasha. Although here and there Bikanir had succumbed to the tendency to tawdry bunting, for the most part the decorations took the only possible Oriental form of the hangings of parti-coloured cloth. Through streets of mud-built houses freshly coloured a brick red, through the streets of handsome dwellings of the most richly carved red sandstone, drove the Prince and Princess through variegated crowds who salamed profoundly as the cortege passed, and then broke into exclamations of pride and joy. The route lay through the town by the most sacred temple where once stood the Beekas fort, and then past the old palace to the Lallgarh. The streets were lined with the smart State troops whose presence was hardly needed, so orderly were the people.

Some of these characteristics Their Royal Highnesses were able to observe on arrival at Bikanir, but not until this evening could they fully appreciate the peculiar charms of the desert city. There was a second grouse shoot in the morning from 7 till 10 o'clock, when the Prince, shooting beautifully, made the best bag with 150 birds, the spoil of the day being 800 birds. His Royal Highness was delighted with his sport, as also were the members of the staff, and all left Gujner charmed with the completeness of the Maharaja's arrangements and fully appreciative of his splendid hospitality. Then in the late afternoon His Royal Highness motored in from Gujner and joining Her Royal Highness at the old palace first examined its treasures, especially the armoury and the Sanscrit manuscripts, and accompanied by the Maharajah went for a semi-State drive through the town.

The Prince afterwards presented medals for service in Somaliland to nine native officers of the Bikanir Camel Corps, complimenting the officers on the smart appearance of the men and the men on having so many in the ranks decorated for service in China. The Camel Corps was raised in 1889 by Captain Kettlewell of the Indian Army, its object being for the Imperial defence at home and abroad. The strength is 500 men and 500 camels. Three-quarters of the men are Rajputs, the remainder Sikhs and Muhammadans. The Corps went to China in 1900 without their camels and took part in the capture of Peitang fort, and were with the allied armies at the advance on Paoing Fu. For ten months they served in the Far East making great friends in the field with the Americans and the Japanese. On one occasion the Bikaniris pitched the American soldiers' camp for them and gave them food and blankets, a kindness which was never forgotten. In 1902, after the Delhi manoeuvres, the Corps went to Somaliland and acted as pioneers to the flying columns under General Manning. They fought at Daratoh where Captain Walker gained his Victoria Cross and Captain Hughes was wounded. They formed part of the square at Jidballi for which a clasp to the medal is given: 8 men were killed and 13 wounded. The Maharaja is the Colonel of the Corps and an Honorary Major in the Indian Army.

The festivities at Bikanir concluded to-night with a splendid banquet in the new dining hall of the old palace. Unfortunately, however, neither the Prince nor Princess of Wales were present, as, acting on the advice of his medical adviser, His Royal Highness decided to dine quietly at the Lallgarh Palace. This decision was arrived at in consequence of the hard work the Prince has already done and in view of the heavy programme awaiting him at Lahore. The dinner, which was held in the magnificent carved red stone hall, was a brilliant success and was attended by the Prince's staff and the numerous guests assembled in the camp. The Maharaja, who came into the room at the close of the dinner, was accorded a great reception, and after the toast of the King-Emperor was duly honoured, he spoke as follows:—

"Your Royal Highnesses, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—There is nothing in this world that could possibly have given me greater pleasure than Your Royal Highnesses's visit to my State, therefore when I saw the Royal train steaming into the railway station at Bikanir I felt that my highest ambition had been realized. I am deeply sensible of this very great honour which Your Royal Highnesses have conferred upon me, and it has not only been very much appreciated by myself and my family, but also by all my people. This honour and pleasure has further been greatly enhanced by the gracious presence of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. Your Royal Highness already knows how proud and pleased I felt when you were kind enough to tell me, after the reception at the India Office, in London, that you proposed to do me the great honour of appointing me your Aide-de-Camp, and I have most pleasant and grateful recollections of my visit to England and of the great courtesy and kindness which I received at the hands of Your Royal Highnesses and the other members of the Royal Family, as well as the nobility and gentry of England. If by good fortune Your Royal Highnesses are pleased with your visit to Bikanir, and have not been put to any serious inconvenience during your stay here, I shall indeed feel gratified, and that I have done something, however little, to show my gratitude in return. I have been considering as to what would be a suitable and at the same time a useful way of commemorating the Royal Visit. We have long felt the necessity of a building on the lines of a Town Hall, which will be open to the public for meetings, lectures, etc. If this meets with Your Royal Highness's approval, I propose to add a wing on either side of this hall into which we shall remove our armoury and Sanskrit library now hidden away in the fort, which would thus be thrown open to the public. Also we have in anticipation already started this building, which at the present moment is some 10 or 12 feet above the ground, and I now beg Your Royal Highness's permission to name it after you. It has been designed by that eminent architect Colonel Sir Swinton Jacob, and is situated in the new Curzon Gardens, that are being laid out, and in close proximity to the Victoria Memorial Club, which Your Royal Highnesses inspected this evening.

"I do not propose to take up much of your valuable time, but before proceeding further I would like to take this opportunity of assuring Your Royal Highness of the steadfast and staunch loyalty of myself and my State to the British Throne (cheers). It is not for me to dwell upon the past services rendered by the House of Bikanir to our Sovereign in the mutiny and in the Afghan and Sikh Wars. I consider it a great privilege to have gone at the head of my regiment to China in 1900, and feel specially pleased at the thought that I was perhaps the first Chief in India to have gone across the seas on active service, under the British rule. Although to my great regret I was prevented from personally going out, my troops have also had the distinction of fighting for the King in Somaliland (applause). I greatly regret that circumstances have prevented the carrying out of the review of my troops, which was to have taken place this afternoon, and I would beg that on your return to England you will tell His Majesty, not only of our unfailing loyalty and devotion, but that you will also be pleased to assure His Majesty from us that not only I and my troops, but every man in Bikanir is ready to lay his life down for His Majesty at his command. It may perhaps not be out of place to mention here that I have offered to further supplement our contribution to the Imperial Service Troops by an addition of half of my regiment of infantry, and for which we are awaiting sanction. Ladies and Gentlemen, I now ask you to join me in drinking to the health of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and wishing them a long life and every happiness and a most enjoyable tour in India (cheers)."

His Royal Highness's speech was then read by the Hon'ble Mr. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General, as follows:—

"I thank Your Highness most sincerely for the kind words in which you have proposed the health of the Princess of Wales and myself. It is a great pleasure and satisfaction to us that we have been able to avail ourselves of your kind invitation to visit you at Bikanir. Thanks to your friendly welcome and generous hospitality, you have made us feel as if we were at home. In any case, the Maharaja's face is very familiar to us and our children, for, besides having had the pleasure of seeing him in England two years ago, there hangs at Marlborough House an excellent portrait of His Highness, his gift to me, in the uniform of the Bikanir Corps. I have been much struck by the fine soldier-like appearance of that force. I know what they have done on active service. It will give me much pleasure to tell the King-Emperor of the smart appearance of the men, most of whom wear the medals for China and Somaliland, and of the excellent condition of the camels. I shall assure His Majesty that he has every reason to be proud of Your Highness's contribution to the Imperial Service Troops, and will also inform him of your further generous offer to augment it by the addition of half of your infantry regiment. We have always heard of your interesting city and house. Your great ancestors in times past won for themselves the proud and appropriate title of 'Lords of the Desert,' but coming here we realise how, through your enterprise and artistic knowledge, you have as it were raised from the desert a palace, beautiful in its architectural design and construction, and replete with every comfort, which you have so hospitably placed at our disposal. The Princess and I are much gratified to learn that Your Highness proposes to commemorate our visit by erecting a building, a Library, which will also contain the beautiful and historic armoury of Bikanir. We heartily approve of Your Highness's suggestion, and I am proud to think that it is your wish to call it after me. You have also permitted me to see and enjoy what may fairly be described as one of the wonders of Bikanir—its sport. My experience of two delightful mornings' shooting at Gajner will never be forgotten. In conclusion, I wish to deliver the message of friendship and good wishes to yourself and your State from the King-Emperor, to whom I shall gladly communicate your assurances of loyalty and devotion to his Throne and person, and I ask all present to join me in drinking long life and happiness to the Maharaja of Bikanir. I did not say goodbye to him this evening, for I am glad to think that he will join my staff as my Aide-de-Camp at the coming manoeuvres in the North, and if anything could further add to my debt of gratitude for all His Highness's hospitality, it is the ready and considerate manner in which he has excused my attendance at this banquet in accordance with the recommendation of my medical adviser, which decision I deeply regret."

The speech was greeted with loud applause.

The palace and its adjoining buildings as well as the city of Bikanir were splendidly illuminated during the evening, and the scene was brilliant in the extreme.

Morning Post.—Thirty years have passed since last an heir to its Imperial Throne set foot in India, and thirty years, brief as this period may seem to the East, is a very considerable one in the making of our Eastern Empire. Thirty years covered that tremendous term in its story which saw, under Clive and Hastings, our grip fastened on the Southern Deccan by the heroic capture and defence of Arcot, the subdual of Bengal at Plassey, the final crushing at Wandewash of the hopes of France, the extinction of Mughal ascendancy at Baksar, the first defeat of the Rohillas, and the conclusion of our victories over the Marathas by the Treaty of Salbai. Those were the years of belligerent gestation, the terrible years which must be before empires are born, and none of those which followed could feel quite the same throes, the same trembling in the balance between death and being. In the last thirty since our present Sovereign viewed as Prince of Wales his Eastern inheritance, a maturation of a very different kind has been in progress. True, the acquisitive tendency has not altogether ceased, but its inclination has been rather towards extension than absorption. We have been content internally to consolidate our influence, while without we have reluctantly enlarged our borders. To the west and north the territories we have acquired are small in extent, but rich strategically in potential value. We have pushed our frontier nearer in both directions to the vast ramparts of the hills which have offered to the inhabitants of Hindustan an immemorial protection of which they have never yet, thanks to internecine dissensions, been able to avail themselves, and beyond this frontier our supremacy has been established in Sikkim, Kashmir, Hunza, Chitral, and Baluchistan. Eastward, it has been rather material than political advantage which has dogged our footsteps—and really the phrase does not describe inaptly many of our territorial acquisitions—since, in annexing the valuable provinces of Upper and Lower Burma, we have made ourselves the neighbours, possibly the undesired neighbours, of two great Powers.

But the significance of the last thirty years is not to be sought in territorial accretion, but in the changes wrought by our system of government on the minds and aspirations of those we have ruled. The conscientious benevolence of our methods as a dominant suzerain over a land of diverse and divided peoples is now beginning to bear visible fruit, and the quality of that harvest will be of more importance to the British nation in the next half century than any other of the problems which India may propound. In England, the question excites as little interest as did the religious susceptibilities of the Hindu before the Mutiny, yet the understanding of the moral forces we are creating in India concerns more nearly our future in that country than was our fortune there once affected by a less excusable ignorance. An attempt will therefore be made in these letters to give, as the occasion serves, behind the pomp and ceremony of a Royal progress, some account of a development, very curious, scarcely predicable, and perhaps unique in the history of nations, with which the Indian Government has and must increasingly have to deal, and which may even become a disintegrating influence in English politics; a development of deep interest philosophically, yet pregnant with solicitude for many to whom philosophy is but an empty dream.

His first view of Bombay might well make the traveller wonder if he had indeed arrived in India. Great hills to the eastward bound the wide harbour, melting southward into mist, while on the other hand, smeared over by its morning pall of smoke, with docks and factories along its northern frontage, is an undistinguished-looking city, built on a low, lean spit of shore, whose only prominent attempt at architecture is an hotel. The impression architecturally is a deceptive one, for the great buildings of Bombay lie back from what was but a few years ago a muddy foreshore, but the sense of not being yet in the East is accentuated as one advances into the city. Bombay is proud, and with reason, of its streets, but the suggestion of the finest of them is anything but Asiatic. Early English, Norman Romanesque, French Decorated, Byzantine, Venetian, and Italian Gothic are the styles which dominate the business quarter. Some have been faintly, some cleverly Orientalised, but the changes have not been sufficient to steal from the stone-work its Northern air, or to make it seem significant of other than a white-skinned people.

Yet strange as the sun-blaze on arch and cusp and pillar, seen so often against drenching skies, the shadows that crouch out of reach of it above deep-set windows and along columned colonnades, approve the men who saw the virtues of Gothic for a tropical climate. Men, one says, but man it should be, since though many architects have had a share in modern Bombay, not one that built after him but was influenced by the genius of the late F. W. Stevens. He it was who designed the Victoria Station, completed less than twenty years ago, which cost over a third of a million, and is, perhaps, the most striking railway terminus in the world. He, too, who proved in the Municipal Buildings, five years later, how near his wedding of styles had brought him to the birth of another. Small wonder that with such models the designs of the men who followed him were moulded to that Indo-Saracenic mode which has produced in the great buildings about the Esplanade an impression of diversity of effort with unity of effect which could not be matched in modern Europe.

And thus, landing in Bombay, one might be pardoned at a first glance for finding the scene suggestively English.

A longer look, a shifting of the glance from the Gothic walls to the swarming white-clad people, and one is inclined rather to speculate where England comes into it.

Hindus, Arabs, Marathas, Persians, Afghans, Parsis, Gujarati, Somalimen, Zanzibaris, Baluchis, Malays, Chinese, Jews, Lascars, Tibetans, Rajpoots, Cingalese—the roadway teems with them; with faces painted with caste and creed, under turbans that make the street look from above like a tessellated pavement—scarlet, crimson, and pink, pale greens, lemon, amber and orange yellows, plum, lavender and azure blues, and white, plain, or braided with gold and silver, with here and there, dividing the moving whiteness, women like blue, green, and crimson flames. But always the dark face, black or copper or Eurasian grey, not the white one. The white is, indeed, to be seen on a horse, in a motor or a smart victoria, but too rarely to dilute the impression of prevailing shadow or even to suggest convincingly a ruling race. Nor can one fairly quarrel with its failure. Theoretically, no doubt, India is ours; but, as the reckoning works out, it is rather we who are India's.

We have the glory of an Imperial flag, and we have also most of the cost of keeping it flying. We speak of India as a splendid school for our adventurous youth. So it is. But what are the scholars but servants to the people whom they come to govern. Or rather—for this is the lustre of our rub in the East—they are servants to a high conception of responsibility, to a sense of duty to its dependencies which no other conquering race has known. Here in Bombay you may see, microcosmically, the results.

A Governor, an administrative staff, courts of justice and troops at the back of them, all the appearances of power, and externally all its realities. The Governor, with the gun behind him, could boast an ability in any part of his Presidency to say "Do this!" And to see it done. But this power of his is just what Bombay can best appreciate. To the Hindu, the Muhammadan, the Parsi, the Jain, and the Jew the Governor and all his functionaries are but a superior sort of police who ensure the carrying out of their directions. It is they, not he, who rule Bombay.

The Corporation only retains a British inclination owing to half of its members being Government nominees. The Town Council, which is the Corporation's executive committee, is, in spite of Government nomination, always controlled by the native element, and its operations have in consequence to be restricted by a Municipal Commissioner appointed by Government to supreme executive authority in municipal matters, but compelled not the less to exercise the subtlest tact in using it from a sense of the moral weakness of his position.

Thus the traveller's impression is seen to be not far astray. Bombay is a city built to a Western view of beauty, administered by Western ideas of citizenship, policed by a Western conception of courage, and inherited by the East. The East you may see in it all day long, lounging, loitering, in an unending stream through the streets and the bazaars. The West you see but for one hour only, the blessed hour of afternoon, when the shore wind freshens and a veil seems drawn over the melting brilliance of the sun. Then the white faces which have been toiling in warehouse and office and orderly room make their way for talk and a cup of tea to the green lawn of the yacht club, which looks across the harbour at the distant crests of the Ghats. There for that hour they play at being in England—the men, their sun armour laid aside, in straw hats and serges; the women in their most charming frocks. Outside, rigorously outside, along the sea front and the Apollo Bunder the wealth of the city drives behind servants in spotless liveries, Parsis in high, "fly-paper" hats, with gaily-dressed families, and Hindus in gorgeous turbans; while on the pavement moves all the colour and diversity that the bazaars can show, with British soldiers from Kolaba and a few sailors from the ships, drinking in the sea breezes and listening to the band, while from the Bunder steps, for all the world like Brighton trippers, boatloads of Hindus embark for a four-anna trip across the harbour in felucca-rigged craft, and the lateen-sailed fishing-boats skim on the light wind between the steamer anchorage and the shore.

The sun sinks, a flood of orange light stains for a few wonderful moments everything it touches, masts and sails, and the ships' sides and funnels, turning the sea from purple to pea green, and the distant hills from brick red to amber. Then a high white radiance tinged with rose rises above the sunset, and the scene strangely and swiftly becomes diaphanous and unreal. The yellow riding lights of the ships and the green and red eyes of the launchs come queerly into being in the clear twilight, the grey war ships and the great white troopers grow ghostly and frail, while like moths the sailing boats still flutter about them, catching here and there faintly the rose of the sky.

At the yacht club it is too dark already to distinguish faces; the groups about the tea tables break up and stroll about the lawn. Outside the syces light the carriage lamps, the crowd begins to move dispersedly. So brief and so lovely is the hour of illusion; its ending announced as the band on the lawn breaks into "God Save the King". Within the railings men rise to their feet with heads uncovered; without, in the crowd, the soldiers lolling against the sea wall stand to attention. So far the symbol reaches, and no further. To the others, the outnumbering others, it is but a signal for departure.

Well, if that be the irony of it, is it not the glory also?

Standard.—To one who has never been in Eastern Asia before, a great Indian city is a weird revelation. The Prince of Wales during his sojourn in Bombay was shown the docks, and the harbour and new street, and the cathedral, and, doubtless, his attention was directed to the Victoria Terminus, and the Clock Tower, the Town Hall, and the Courts of Justice. But these are not the things most worth seeing; and I should venture to doubt whether any of them interested His Royal Highness nearly so much as his drives through the native quarters.

For the thing to see in Bombay is Bombay itself. It has no sight to show, no spectacle to offer, at all equal to that presented by its own streets, seething with miscellaneous humanity, especially if one can examine them at leisure and on foot, mingling with the populace, and peering into the open houses. In the East people do not live in sealed compartments, and the front door, the shield of our own cherished domesticity, can hardly be said to exist. The climate and the local habits are opposed to it. Before the sun has risen, or after his setting, everybody seeks space and air and coolness out of doors; nor is there any jealous shrinking from observation, even in the daytime. People do all sorts of things in public, which to our thinking should be transacted in privacy, such as dressing, shaving, washing, and sleeping, and, in spite of the caste rules and religious restrictions, even a good deal of eating.

Going into one of the large sheds in the quarter of Bombay where the hand-loom weavers carry on their work, I saw two men crouching in the dust by the outside wall. They proved to be a barber and his client. The latter was naked to the waist; the barber, a respectable old gentleman in robe and turban, was sitting on the ground beside his victim, on whom he was operating in a very complete fashion, passing his razor not merely over the chin, but over the head, arms, and shoulders and performing the whole toilet in full view of passers-by and of various other persons engaged in minor manufacturing or domestic avocations at intervals of a few yards along the wall of the shed. So it is everywhere. As you pass along the streets of the bazaar you can look right into half the houses. The shops are simply boxes, set on end, with the lids off. You can, if you please, stand and watch the baker rolling his flat loaves, the tailor making a garment (probably over an American sewing machine), the coppersmith hammering at his bowls and dishes, the jeweller drawing out gold and silver wire over his little brazier. The Indian townsman does not mind being looked at. He is accustomed to it. He passes his life in the midst of a crowd.

And that, to go back to the point from which I started, is what strikes the new-comer from the West most keenly. After a time, I suppose, he ceases to notice it, as we cease to notice anything which is before us constantly. (It is not every married man of twenty years' standing who could tell you off-hand the colour of his wife's eyes.) But upon the novice this sense of crowded humanity presses like an obsession, a nightmare, as he walks through the native streets in the noonday furnace, or in the cool morning, or the restlessness of the closing night. The amazement which is his first feeling, the admiration for varied forms and bold colour that succeeds it, give way to a kind of horror, as he sees all this brown, common, unregarded swarm poured out upon the ground like locusts, crawling in and out of every chink and cranny like ants, filling every vacant space. You cannot cast your eye into any corner but you find a man there, if it is not a woman or a child.

If there is a spare decorative niche in the wall of a building, the odds are that you will find a man or boy huddled up there. In any little patch of vacant ground there are thick groups of squatters by day and sleepers by night. People roost for hours on the edges of the pavement or any fragment of sill or low wall, sitting motionless on their heels, with their hands stretched out over their knees, looking strangely like crows or vultures. The European will find the attitude so constrained and uncomfortable that he cannot endure it beyond a few minutes, if, indeed, he can get into it at all. The native, apparently, can maintain this posture all day. The Westerner, when he has work to do, likes to stand up to it. The native sits or lies or crouches down, whether he be sewing or using the hammer, file and chisel, or cleaning a vessel, or dusting a room, or mending a garment. The scribe sits down on the floor to write a letter. The mali, or gardener, grovels over the flower-beds to grub up weeds or plant his roses. It seems as if they could not get too close to the warm and teeming bosom of the elemental mother from whom they have sprung.

It is not the throng poured forth on some special occasion which moves one's wonder so much as the concourse that perpetually besets the streets and houses. The formal crowd assembled to witness a spectacle is not greater than can be seen elsewhere. There were vast hordes of people on the route through which the Prince of Wales drove in his public progresses, but not by any means enough to excite the astonishment of a Londoner by their numbers, though every window and cranny and chink in the house-fronts showed a turbaned head or a brilliant sari, and men clung like apes to every projecting timber and carved balustrade, and perched like sparrows on eaves and sloping roofs. An Indian crowd, it is true, is larger than it looks. There is no attempt to leave air-space or elbow-room between its constituent units; the natives are accustomed to get close together, and have no prejudices against intimate personal contact, as anybody can see who has watched them packing themselves into a railway carriage or a bullock cart. Between the desire to secure good place and the rough pressure of the police, the throng gets kneaded into a soft compact mass, knees, backs, and arms laced into one another, so that it occupies the minimum amount of space and standing room.

Making due allowances for these circumstances the Bombay hosts were not to be compared to those London turns out to witness a coronation or a Royal funeral or a Mafeking demonstration. But the Eastern crowd has no need to assemble. It is always mobilised and in marching order. Unending streams of people pass through the streets, by units or in couples, or small groups, or sit immovable, hour after hour. Sometimes there is a squabble, and voices are raised, and arms and fingers rustle and snap. But as a rule they do not talk much, they do not laugh, they seldom smile. They are a silent, rather sad-faced folk, anxious-looking and depressed, for whom life is hard and labour long, and food scanty, with whom existence is a round of slow, unending drudgery. It is not till you get to Asia that you realise how cheap the human animal can be, and how easily manpower, of a certain limited kind, is to be had. In this part of India one does not notice many elderly people. They age too fast to grow old; for the women of the labouring class are worked out at thirty-five or forty, the men under fifty, and I suppose they die before they can become grey-headed.

But perhaps the most marvellous thing about these people to the Western eye is the way they sleep. Something has been said of this already, but it is an unending source of wonder and awe, this capacity of the Indian native for slumber under all sorts of conditions. Sleep comes to him without any of the allurements and amenities with which it is wooed by us. The poorest of European day labourers needs a bed and bed-furniture, if not a bed-room. The Indian does contentedly without all three. He will throw himself down, like a dog, on the bare earth, and sleep the night through without a movement. We say that he has no nerves, which may or may not be the explanation. At any rate, the fact is indisputable. The poorer native, the man of the labouring or menial class, sleeps where he can, anywhere and everywhere. Your own servant, a well-paid "bearer"—a man of a certain standing, by no means in the depth of poverty—will sleep night after night with no better accommodation than the mat outside your bed-room door. He does not undress when he lies down; he apparently does not wash when he gets up; he carries all his belongings tied up in an exiguous bundle; yet he is always tidy to look upon, he is quite as clean in his person as most English servants, and if his white garments are not spotless you are entitled to revile him. In the hotel at which I stayed in Bombay, the floors of the passages were laid with porcelain tessellated tiles, hard as steel and shiny as glass; but all over them were men extended at length, sometimes upon a thin cotton sheet, more often with nothing under or over them. Outside the building, on the verandahs, the steps, the courtyard, the bare earth of the stables and offices, were other slumbering forms. At every dark corner protruded a brown leg and foot from under a white wrapper. If there is no other place for him, an Indian will sleep contentedly in the open street, or the channel of the pavement. At the Festival of the Diwali, when all the bazaars were blazing with lamps and alive with people, I saw men lying fast asleep on the bulkheads of shops and in open doorways. The noises, the lights, the passing crowds that brushed their garments, left them undisturbed. They slept as animals sleep, with the same indifference to comfort, and same dead immobility.

It is this carelessness of the amenities of the bed-chamber that somewhat qualifies one's view of the Indian slum-dwelling. Bombay, where plague is now endemic, and takes its victims in the cold season at the rate of a thousand a week, has its congested quarter, where people are packed more closely than in almost any place outside China and a few other Indian cities. The municipality, which is energetic and public-spirited, has made great efforts to clear the worst area. It has opened out the nests of courts and alleys, by running fine broad streets through them, and it has erected blocks of model chawls, or tenement dwellings, to provide accommodation, which is at least sanitary, for those who have been displaced. Under the guidance of an English resident, who has studied Bombay long and closely, a sanitary inspector, and an able young Hindu medical man in the service of the Corporation, I was taken to see some of the dwellings in the condemned and congested district. I confess I was less impressed than my friends perhaps expected, for I have seen slum areas and municipal clearances nearer home, and for pure filth, foulness, degradation, and outward misery, I am afraid that London has more painful sights to show than those offered to me in Bombay.

The houses I saw had been visited by the plague again and again; on many a doorpost was the red circle, with date within, which is the sign that the pestilence had done its work and claimed its victim. On some of the lintels there were as many as five or six of these marks of doom. The houses were rabbit-warrens, with a family or two families to every room. And these rooms themselves were mere oblong cavities, low, dark, cavernous, sometimes all but windowless. There was no chimney; the fireplace consisted of a few bricks or stones piled up in a corner; the floors were of hardened cow-dung, which is the kind of flooring that breeds the plague infection, and gives a resting-place to the rats which carry it. There was usually no bed and no bedding, and often no more furniture than a couple of wooden chests, and a cord on which clothes were suspended.

It sounds bad enough; and yet, as I have said, to those who have seen European slums it might have been worse. For, poor as it was, there was an absence of some of those preferences at civilisation which make urban poverty so much more horrible. You could go in and out of the rooms without being appalled by spectacles of degrading indecency. There were no broken, legless chairs, cracked crockery, fragments of carpet and wall-paper, begrimed with indescribable dirt. The cow-dung floors were usually clean, so were the wooden chests, and the brass pots and bowls shone like burnished gold. The very emptiness of the tenements, the scanty and elementary needs of the occupants, were in their favour. Sleeping largely out of doors, the people had no frowsy mattresses; tables they do not want, or chairs, for they sit on the floor and eat from it; religion and custom prescribe cleanliness for the person and for cooking utensils; the scanty drapery of a warm climate is easily washed. Poor as they were, the people seemed to retain a certain dignity, as if they still felt themselves members of a community, not mere outcasts from it. Poverty, I suppose, has become so habitual with the masses of the Eastern labouring population that they can accept it as the normal state of things. It does not seem to bring with it the hopeless degradation which it produces in societies where the requirements of all men are less simple and the general standard of comfort higher.

World.—The Prince of Wales, when the arrangements were being made for his Indian tour, expressed a wish that all regiments on the Indian establishment with which he is connected should depute officers to form part of his suite during his stay in the East. The officers thus employed will be returned as "additional aides-de-camp," and will be struck off regimental duty for the period of the tour. His Royal Highness's thoughtfulness in this matter has occasioned, a correspondent says, "the greatest satisfaction to the regiments concerned, as it is an honour and recognition which all ranks thoroughly appreciate." The officers chosen to do duty on His Royal Highness's staff are: Majors Roberts, 1st Lancers, Grimston, 6th Cavalry; Campbell, 11th Lancers; Watson, 2nd Gurkhas; Captains Cadogan, 10th Hussars; Ashburner, Royal Fusiliers; Hill, Royal Welsh Fusiliers; Makins, King's Royal Rifles; and Wigram, 18th Lancers—in addition, of course, to Major-General Beatson, who reported during the summer in London.

29TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Daily Chronicle.—From the sandy deserts of Bikanir to the ripening fields of the autumn harvest round Lahore is a pleasant change. The historic capital of Ranjit Singh is situated in the midst of a wide open plain on the banks of the Ravi, one of the five rivers of the Punjab, and though in the hot weather the fields are brown and parched enough, at this season of the year they yield a rich crop of wheat and millet, which turns the brown earth green.

The Lahore station is on the outskirts of the civil lines, close to the native city, which is a separate quarter in itself. Europeans and natives keep strictly apart. Nevertheless vast crowds were gathered round the station, and bore evidence to the prosperous condition of the population at the present time. The whole route from the station to Government House, a distance of about a mile, was lined with bunting and many triumphal arches decorated with loyal mottoes. Behind these densely-packed masses of people in the diverse costume of the Hindus, Sikhs and Punjabi Mahammadans saluted reverently while the Royal party passed by under the escort of the 12th Lancers, the Volunteer troopers of the Punjab Light Horse, and a detachment of native cavalry from Mian Mir, the cantonment which is maintained some four miles distant from this important city.

The most picturesque portion of the drive was that which lay through the camp of the Punjab Chiefs, many of whom rendered such good service to the British arms during the Mutiny. The great Sikh Chiefs of Patiala, Nabha, Jhind, and Kapurthala, and the rulers of Bahawalpur, Mundi, Faridkot, Maler Kotla and Chamba are all gathered here together to do honour to their King's son, and are located in adjoining camps.

To-night there is a dinner, and a Darbar reception at Government House, where the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab is entertaining the Prince. After the dinner 130 native gentlemen, who have the right of entry to the Darbar, will be presented, while the Punjab Chiefs will be received separately. To-morrow the Prince visits the Lahore Fort, which contains the tomb of Ranjit Singh, and has been made famous in literature as the original of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's Fort Amara. It was here that the "Soldiers Three" endured the torments of the City of Dreadful Night. Subsequently the Prince receives the formal visits of the Chiefs; while in the evening the Shalimar Gardens, on the outskirts of Lahore, will be illuminated, while the fountains that were wont to play before the Moghul Emperors will spout for a Christian Prince.

On the following day the Prince will return the visits of the Chiefs, and will also inspect Aitchison College, the Eton of Northern India, where the sons of the Ruling Chiefs are educated. In the evening there will be the Punjab ball at Montgomery Hall, which was also shaken during the recent earthquake, but which looks none the worse for its experience in the light blue and silver decorations of the Punjab Commission.

On the fourth day there will be a review of the Imperial Service Troops, a garden party in the grounds of Government House, at which the principal European residents of Lahore will be present, and in the evening the display of fireworks at the Chauburji, one of the most ancient native monuments on the outskirts of the civil station. After that the Prince and Princess depart from Rawalpindi, where they are to be the guests of Lord Kitchener during the spectacular series of manœuvres which have been prepared for them at the Aldershot of Northern India.

Englishman.—The Mehtar of Chitral and Khan of Dir will be present at Peshawar during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Englishman.—The graphic description of Bikanir which our special correspondent has given adds to the interest attaching to the festivities connected with the Royal visit to that State. There has always been something noble and inspiring about Bikanir and its Chiefs. It will be remembered that his visit to the State seven years ago stimulated the late G. W. Stevens to one of his most vivid efforts in the way of glowing description. There is also an unanimous consensus of admiration for the gallant young Chief who has last had the honour of entertaining Their Royal Highnesses. As a sportsman and a ruler he stands out a bright and efficient figure. Can it be doubted that as a soldier he would have added lustre to his name if he had been permitted to accompany his troops to the front. It seems to us that the Government of India might do a good deal worse than afford scope to these gallantly descended princes for their martial ardour. In how many cases might the prospect of such employment brace them up to continuous endeavour, and prevent them from becoming what they have too often sunk to in the past. It is regrettable that Their Royal Highnesses were prevented, for the first time since the commencement of the tour, from appearing at the banquet which the Prince of Bikanir had arranged in their honour. The speeches which were made on the occasion were, however, of more than common interest, and furnished incidentally a proof of the benefits that have resulted from the deputation of Indian princes to England to attend the Coronation of King Edward VII. It was that occasion which brought so many of them into contact with the Royal Family, an acquaintanceship which is thus being renewed during the present tour, and not a thing of yesterday.

Englishman.—We left Bikanir last night a blaze of light. The roads leading from the Lallgarh to the old palace were lined with myriads of butties and the walls of the old fort were ringed with tiny flames, whilst outside the main portal a giant bonfire roared and cracked. When daylight dawned we were at Bhatinda, the junction with the broad gauge, and under the shadow of tremendous walls formidable in these days and which must have been impregnable when they were built. Then from Bhatinda to Lahore the route lay over the dead level of the Punjab plain and astonishing contrast to the arid wastes of Western Rajputana. Though the land is flat it is pleasantly timbered and green with the promise of the rabi harvest. Past the typical parade ground of Mian Mir Cantonment and then into the scarlet hung station of Lahore.

Although the Punjab has been shorn of its frontier districts, and resents the loss, it still regards itself as the backbone of the defence of India, both because of its position as a bar to the advance of an invader, and as the producer of the finest fighting races in India. The loyalty of the Punjab has never waned, not even in the darkest days of the fifties, and proud of these circumstances the province determined to give Their Royal Highnesses a right stout welcome to its capital. And so it did. The long route from the railway station to Government house was lined with flags and bunting crossed by triumphal arches, bright with loyal mottoes, and close packed with a deeply interested mass of the strong reserved peoples of the north. Here, back in British India, we lose much of the brightness and colour of the fascinating cities of Rajputana. Instead of tortuous streets are broad straight roads, instead of houses of the east, eastern, the roomy bungalows, and handsome shops of a Provincial head-quarters. Yet with this loss is some gain in the splendid highways, the evidences of wealth and the avenues and gardens for which Lahore is famous. And yet again one could wish that the good citizens had not attempted to paint the lily and decorate stately groves, glorious in the setting sun, with strings of cheap buntings. The desire was patriotic, the effect tawdry in the extreme. On alighting from the train His Royal Highness, in his naval uniform, and wearing the ribbon of the Star of India, and the Princess of Wales in dainty muslin, were received by Sir Charles Rivaz, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, who first presented General Sir Bindon Blood. The usual presentation followed, the Lieutenant-Governor performing this office for the Civilians and Sir Bindon Blood of the Military Officers, including General Walter Kitchener with whom His Royal Highness entered into close conversation. The inspection of the guard of honour of the West Yorkshire Regiment afforded another opportunity for the Prince to comment on the incongruity of the Khaki helmet now worn with the British full dress, an incongruity even more marked with the British Cavalry escort, drawn up outside the station. We sometimes laugh at the combinations of colours affected by Indians but the most bizarre they can show is less offensive to the eye than this burden the military authorities have imposed upon the British troops.

Then, stepping into a carriage drawn by four spanking bays the Prince and Princess, with Sir Walter Lawrence, drove off, escorted by the 12th Lancers, a smart detachment of the Punjab Light Horse and a squadron of the 25th Cavalry.

The scenes which followed must have reminded Their Royal Highnesses of their splendid progress through the streets of Bombay, for not since they left the "Gateway of India" have they seen such closely packed crowds in the streets and on balconies, in every window and on every housetop. The people's greeting was marked by the reverence and the reserve which are associated with the hardy peoples of Upper India. Quite otherwise was it with the bands of school children marshalled along the route. By a happy thought these were assembled in bodies each marked with a distinctive colour. There were boys in red turbans, and boys in pale emerald green, in white and in blue, with expectant faces and comely features. As the Royal carriage passed they broke into joyous shouts of welcome, vigorously waving little paper flags of their own distinctive colour.

But by far the most interesting episode of the progress was the drive through the camp of the Punjab Chiefs, assembled in Lahore to receive the Royal visitors. Here are the Chiefs of Patiala and Bhawalpur, of Nabha, Jhind, Kapurthala, Mundi, Faridkote, Maler Kotla, Chamba and Sukate. The gathering of their retainers brought back memories of Udaipur, Jaipur and Bikanir. One seem to glide unconsciously from the India of the railway station, of these broad roads and modern buildings, into the India of at least a century ago.

For here we had wild frontiersmen, with hooked noses and eagle eye and unshorn locks tumbling over the shoulders, mounted on scraggy ponies, elephants in silver mail, bearing golden and silver howdahs, and dancing horses caparisoned in tinsel.

The smart Imperial Service Infantry stood guard over palanquins and palkies, and in line with the household troops with muzzle loaders and flint lock guns. In the midst of this motley array the forces of Kapurthala stood conspicuous. His Imperial Service Infantry were splendidly turned out in blue and white, most of the men wearing the frontier medal of 1897, and one at least bore two Sudan distinctions. His cavalry also in blue and white were well horsed and accoutered, the grooms in attendance on the gorgeous State carriage were similarly liveried and the household colours were even carried through the trappings of the splendid elephants.

As the Royal procession passed at a walking pace through the camp, the Chiefs who were seated in their carriages saluted, the Prince and Princess acknowledging every reverence. The scene presented as the Chiefs sat in their State vehicles, their armed retainers in every kind of uniform, in line with the elephants, the dancing horses, and the palkies, whilst on the opposite side of the road sat a few English residents and the rag-tag and bob-tail of the camp was the most truly Oriental patch in the progress.

Amidst marks of unabated interest Their Royal Highnesses drove through the gracefully shaded Mall to Government House receiving at the Anarkali gardens a loyal and dutiful address from the Municipality. In reply the Prince of Wales said:—

Gentlemen,—The Princess and myself thank you most sincerely for the frank and generous welcome that you have given us in this famous capital of the Punjab. Your allusion to the calamities which have befallen you is typical of a country of brave, strong men, and grieved as the Princess and I are that the Punjab should be afflicted by earthquakes and scarcity it is some consolation to think that these disasters do tend to bring the people and the official classes closer together. It interests me everywhere to realise the great changes which have taken place since my dear father visited India. Perhaps in no part of the Empire are these changes more marked than in the Punjab. Railways have greatly altered the conditions of your province, but you have justly selected irrigation as the most noteworthy of the agencies of change. Until quite recently I had no idea of the boldness and magnitude of the great schemes which are rapidly adding new districts to the Punjab. All honour to the engineers of the irrigation department who have devised these splendid works, but we may be thankful too that in this fine country the people are ready to move their homes to the new lands. I am glad that your town shares in the general prosperity of the province. I trust that it will continue and increase. We shall in a short time have an opportunity of seeing the men who have won for the Punjab the name "The Sword Hand of India." Lahore has reason to be proud of being the capital of such a nursery of devoted and loyal soldiers. We are both of us profoundly conscious of the importance of the concluding sentence of your address. The King-Emperor to whom it will be my pleasing duty to communicate your loyal assurances will rejoice to receive your testimony that the people are happy and contented and will be touched by your eloquent expressions of love and attachment to His Majesty and to the late Queen-Empress.

Their Royal Highnesses are staying at Government House, the staff being accommodated in a camp in the grounds. After dinner there was a reception durbār in the Montgomery Hall, when the Chiefs and a hundred and thirty Durbaris were received, but the hour was so late that details must await till to-morrow.

Madras Mail.—The Sind Gazette writing on the Royal Tour and the visit to Karachi says:—After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that the best way of signalling our pleasure at this unique visit will be to increase the hostel accommodation of the Dayaram Jethmal Arts College. The College is an institution which all classes of the community can join in supporting, and a separate building could be erected which could be named after the Prince and Princess of Wales. For the last two years the College Board has realised the utter insufficiency of the hostel accommodation, but has been unable to do anything for want of funds. From our own enquiries it would seem that there is not enough room for even half the students who receive their education in our College. If a sum of Rs. 50,000 were subscribed, it would not be difficult to obtain a corresponding sum from Government, and with a lakh it would be possible to provide room for all the students who are likely to attend the College during the next 50 years. To effect this object we would suggest the immediate formation of a strong Committee with the Commissioner in Sind as Chairman. The amount required would be readily realisable from the various Municipalities and District Local Boards, the Mīrs, Jagirdars, officials, rich merchants and the public bodies of Sind, and also from His Highness the Mir of Khairpur. We would draw the attention of the Collector to our suggestion and would request him to call a public meeting at an early date to decide upon the form to be taken by the memorial which is to serve as a reminder to the whole province, of an occasion such as is not likely to occur again in the lives of any of the present generation.

Pioneer.—On Saturday afternoon His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Maharaja, went out for an hour's sport and shot a chinkara. The Royal suite and visitors had an afternoon's pigsticking, and four boars were killed, one of which made a good fight, showing how game an animal a Rajputana pig is when close pressed. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales saw the pigsticking from a carriage.

Yesterday was spent by the Prince and Princess entirely as a day of rest in camp at Gujair. The Reverend Mr. Green from Ajmere conducted divine service. This morning the Royal camp there is being broken up and the party will motor back to Bikanir, arriving at the city gates about 5 p.m. As the Prince has been suffering from a slight indisposition the parade of troops has been cancelled. His Royal Highness will instead drive through the city with the Maharaja so that all the people may have another chance of seeing him. In order to be fully prepared for the heavy duties at Lahore during the next few days, the Prince will rest this evening, but the banquet will take place at the old palace according to programme and the Maharaja will propose the health of Their Royal Highnesses. The departure for Lahore via Bhatinda junction will be about 10-30 p.m.

The Royal party during their stay here have vividly realised that Bikanir is a city founded in a desert, for on every side stretches the even sandy waste that knows no roads and has but camel tracks for its uncertain thoroughfares. The horizon dips down without peak or range to break its level line, and the city alone, with its clean cut walls, its fort and its palaces, is the landmark to which the traveller turns his eye. It is a country of flocks and herds with the camel as the one indispensable adjunct for commerce and communication. Cultivation is of the scantiest, for the water lies from a hundred to three hundred feet below the surface and the sinking of a big well is almost an event in local history. But all the 22,000 odd square miles that go to make up the State of Bikanir have only to sustain a population of less than 600,000 so that the demands upon the cultivable areas, few and far between, are happily small. Oases there are, but even these are set in surroundings that mean a constant struggle with nature, and when the scanty rainfall of the desert tract is scantier than usual, there comes famine in its acutest form. Bikanir has had its trials of late years and has faced drought and the suffering that comes in its train with indomitable spirit, for the Rahtor is a sturdy son of the desert, self-reliant and self-respecting with a reserve of strength that is not easily exhausted. He has traditions to live up to, for he comes of that grand stock that had Jodha Rao of Jodhpur as its source of manhood. It was Bika, one of the many sons of Jodha, who gave Bikanir its name. From this land of Marwar have sprung the bankers and traders, whose name is known all over India, whose riches are to be counted by many crores and whose keen commercial instincts have made them an almost supreme power in the markets. They are no longer men of the desert, but merchants of the town, but they look to Bikanir as their home and to the Maharaja as head of the clan. Bikanir city lies sun-lapped in the desert peaceful and quiet, save when some Thakur with the old restless spirit within him defies the reign of order and gathers his retainers about him. Then there is stir and excitement and even some blood-letting away in the waste, but such interludes are becoming rarer and rarer. The civilising influence of the railway is asserting itself, and although the rails are laid for almost their entire length in scrub jungle or on the bare sand, the daily passage of the trains has its inevitable effect. Bikanir is no longer completely land-locked. It is in touch with the outer and greater world, and unruly Thakurs must go the way of the Pindari. But more than this, the march of events in India in the last twenty years has aroused the State from its lethargy. In that great scheme of Imperial defence which Lord Dufferin initiated, Bikanir has its share. There is no more efficient or more valuable unit in all the Imperial Service Troops than the Camel Corps which is maintained here. Five hundred picked Rahtors, well armed and trained, mounted on camels that cannot be beaten for speed and endurance, are the Maharaja's contribution to the subsidiary forces which various Native States have provided. His Highness as their Colonel, accompanied them to China, and later in Somaliland the corps won distinction in more ways than one. We have seen the men on duty here, many wearing their two medals and a single glance is sufficient to make us appreciate their qualities. They are hard, wiry soldiers, fit for service at a moment's notice. So, too, with the ordinary State troops, all are smart and well set up, carrying themselves with a very different air from that which one notices among the so-called sepoys of other States. There is order and military discipline in every arrangement where these troops figure and yet side by side with them lining the roads were the old levies in armour—a picturesque, if ineffective, display of the fighting men of the past. Bikanir is in a transition state and its progress is rapid. The motor flies past the camel cart on the few score miles of road that exist, and the electric light glows where the oil lamp once held its own. Just as there is military reorganisation proceeding, so in civic affairs a municipality controls the town, and while the old palace stands with its memories still clinging to its walls there has risen a new palace at Lal Bagh with all its luxurious modern interior framed within beautiful carved sandstone pillars and arches. There are hospitals and schools and a club which is hospitably open to all visitors.

Bikanir is not a show place, though in itself from its very position it has the interest that must attach to an isolated walled city with the desert as its surest protection. But in connection with the Royal visit it has sport to offer of a kind that cannot be equalled elsewhere. The sand grouse that come every autumn by thousands are strong on the wing, and put the best shots on their mettle. Big bags are made each year at Gujair, less than thirty miles away, and it was to this spot that the Prince betook himself on his arrival. A lake makes an oasis which is perfect in its own miniature way. On the bank is an eastern shooting-box with gardens and a small pavilion and the vegetation is very pleasant to the eye in the midst of the arid sand. Butts are so placed that the birds can be intersected in their flight and it needs quick shooting to keep pace with them once they are on the wing. The Prince and his host with members of the Royal suite and some visitors had excellent sport on the first day, and again this morning some eight hundred birds were shot up to 10 o'clock. There are pig, too, in the neighbourhood and the sport with these was excellent, for a true Rajputana boar can make a brave fight and he dies game as many a hard rider knows. The three days' stay at Gujair, with a peaceful Sunday's rest, will be a pleasant memory to the Royal visitors who are even now returning to Bikanir for a few hours' halt before yet another train journey begins. The Prince is to present Somaliland medals to the officers of the Camel Corps and they will value them all the more for having received them at his hands. The Maharaja's hospitality to the Royal party and visitors alike has been of the most sumptuous kind and both the camps at Bikanir and Gujair have been admirably managed.

Pioneer.—Very complete arrangements have been made for the public illumination of Calcutta during the Royal visit. The route that the Royal party will take on the night of the illuminations has now been settled. Starting from Government Place East, the party will proceed up the Red Road, down Outram Avenue, up Chowringhee, Esplanade East, up Government Place East, along Old Court House Street, Dalhousie Square East, Lallbazar, Lower Chitpur Road, Harrison Road, leading to the Strand; then via Fairlie Place, Dalhousie Square West, Hare Street, Strand, Auckland Road, Northbrook Avenue, Esplanade West, back to Government House. Among the notable buildings illuminated will be the new Corporation offices, Writers' Buildings, the Town Hall, and the Port Commissioners' warehouses and the shipping in the river.

The proposal to illuminate the surf during the Royal visit to Madras has fallen through, the conditions, permanent and seasonal, being unfavourable. The illumination of the surf which took place when His Majesty the present King visited Madras took place in the heavy surf that in those days used to break on the foreshore and was witnessed by the then Prince of Wales from the end of the pier. Now there is no surf in the harbour itself, and the sand accretions to the south of the harbour have moved the foreshore so far out that it is impossible to get any spectacular effect from any coign of vantage along the beach or marina. Further, in January there is very little surf along the coast. As a set off, however, it is proposed to illuminate Cooum and its bridges, etc, most effectively. The island and its surroundings can be illuminated very beautifully indeed, and when there is added to this beautiful and artistic arrangement reflected from the waters of the Cooum, the result ought to be very fine indeed.

Times.—For the first time since, leaving the Bombay Presidency, they entered the State of Indore Their Royal Highnesses are again in British territory. Englishmen at home hardly realise the extent or importance of the feudatory States of India, where the native rulers wield their inherited powers free from all interference, except in extreme cases of misrule or active disloyalty. Out of, roughly, 1,500 miles hitherto covered by the Royal tour, over 1,000 have been through such States, and Lahore is the first halt in a great centre of British provincial administration.

The great days of Lahore are gone when the Moghuls, those grandest of Imperial architects, beautified it with their palaces and mosques, or when Ranjit Singh made it the bulwark of a powerful Sikh confederacy, or when John Lawrence, Nicholson, and Edwardes made it a base for the overthrow of the Mutiny. The Punjab is no longer even a frontier province, and in view of the agitation for the partition of Bengal it is useful to remember how violent was the outcry when Lord Curzon separated the new frontier province from the Punjab. That outcry is now dead, and a great future seems to be opening up in a new direction. For the immense irrigation works now in progress are rapidly converting the Punjab into one of the chief wheat-producing centres of the world. The Punjab nevertheless remains the home of India's finest fighting races, and within its boundaries are the States of most of the ruling Sikh Chiefs.

Considering the deep earnest loyalty pervading the Punjab, the reception to-day was a characteristic one. It was fervent and whole-hearted. The long route circling the city was lined with thousands of people, Lahore sending forth its population to welcome the Royal visitors, and the five miles of roads were gaily decorated, loyal mottoes being constantly in evidence, while crowds salaamed and the native school children sang and cheered as the cortege passed. The principal Punjab Chiefs were encamped at the foot of the parade ground and made a fine military display, mainly of Imperial Service Troops with richly caparisoned elephants and horses, and each detachment played the National Anthem and presented arms, the whole being very effective. The Chiefs themselves, seated in their gorgeous State carriages, saluted the Prince, who cordially acknowledged their salutes. Many sepoys wore war medals, showing the part played in recent campaigns by the Imperial Service Corps. Their Royal Highnesses' reception throughout, indeed, was one of great and sustained enthusiasm.

30TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—All the approaches to the railway up to the time kept clear by the police were densely thronged with expectant crowds while in the vestibule of the station itself, which was elaborately decorated, was a double rank of chairs on either side for a few ladies to whom cards had been issued. Outside the building the guard consisted of the North Western Railway Volunteers and the guard of honour of the 1st West Yorkshires was drawn up on the platform.

Punctually to time the Royal train drawn by two gaily decorated engines drew up, the National Anthem was played and Their Royal Highnesses alighted at once. The Prince of Wales was then conducted by the Lieutenant-Governor along the short line of the abovenamed gentlemen gathered to receive him. They were introduced individually and the Prince shook hands with all. Sir William Clark performed the same office of introduction to the Princess of Wales who followed down the line and Her Royal Highness also shook hands with everyone. This brief ceremony over Their Royal Highnesses were conducted to their carriage and drove off to the Chiefs' camps followed by the escort and staff.

No spectacle along the Royal route in Lahore can have brought the visitors into a more truly Oriental atmosphere of old-world pomp than that afforded during the drive through the Chiefs' camp. On the great maidan now known as the Fort Parade-ground—in sterner times the northern glacis of Lahore's formidable defence-works—in a line so formed that its two extremities were hardly visible together, lay extended ten separate encampments representing the ten separate dominions of the Punjab's principal native rulers. Never in Lahore in modern recollection was more magnificence assembled in one place. A camp might well be but a white city of sheeted canvas: the ten leading Chiefs of the Punjab, when they moved hither into tents, carried the full glory of their palaces with them. Never did the battlemented walls of the fierce red fort frown down on such high coloured splendour. Never did the now superannuated cannon point their ridiculous muzzles at so brilliant an expanse of regal finery. The two hundred thousand astonished citizens of Lahore have to-day no other topic of conversation.

Two-fold was the significance of all this sparkling pageantry. To the Prince of Wales the scene had a deep, indeed a solemn, meaning. The extrinsic ornamentation typified to him the intrinsic dignity and worth of these ancient ruling houses. It bespoke their wealth and their power. It told of hereditary honour originating from times when the Majesty of Britain had no representative in the East other than a pack of petty traders. It proclaimed in short the ceremony and circumstance due to Chiefs whose status in their own territories is not less than royal. But much more, it conveyed and was loyally intended to convey to the illustrious visitor that all the wealth, all the power, all the resources of the Punjab Native States, thus focussed on a small screen within range of a single glance was laid at his feet. Nor could any other token of fealty have expressed more eloquently the oft-attested fact that the Punjab Princes are ready and even anxious on every occasion of possible need to place at the unreserved disposal of the Imperial Government the men, the means and the munitions which local capacity affords.

This then was the true denotation of the glitter and the gold. This was why each Ruling Chief arrayed himself in Solomonic glory, and, like the hospitable Emir of Genesis, stood at the door of his tent to hail the coming guests. This was why each Chief was supported by a noble retinue ablaze with honorific ornament. This was why the ten camps were fronted by flashing lines of native troops; some mounted, others dismounted; but all looking handsome and soldierly in their rich distinctive uniforms. This was why the State elephants, painted and bedizened to the highest point of elaboration, stood forth with their gorgeous trappings of silver and gold, with their magnificent howdahs of rarest silks and satins and plush velvets, like mountains of magnificence above the heads of the tallest lancers, to wave ponderous salaams with their trunks. This was why the camels, long, gaunt and silent, took up their quaint posts in line with caparisoned palfreys loaded with dazzling saddle-cloths. This was why each of the ten camps was a luxuriant garden, abounding in green lawns and gravel paths and flower beds and playing fountains, and walled in by floriated tapestry, with endless overhead lines of interlaced bunting fluttering the liveliest hues. This was why every camp was graced by its own peculiar triumphal arch or porchway. In short, this was why the drab maidan, usually foggy with dust and barren of wildest grass, was uplifted from its sullen service as the Fort parade-ground and transformed into the semblance of the "field of the cloth of gold."

A two-fold significance has been mentioned. What then was the other purpose or design of the Royal drive through the Chiefs' camp. It was to convey a corresponding message from the Prince of Wales to the Punjab Ruling Chiefs. It was considerably to afford them a first full view of the Royal cortège and its eminent central figure, with the comfort and convenience of spectators who look forth from their own palace windows. It was not merely to enable the Chiefs to pay homage to the Prince but to enable the Prince to salute the Chiefs. It was to communicate the Prince's deep interest in the native rulers, his profound respect for their proud position and ancient lineage, and his desire to exalt by gracious attention their personal prestige. It was to show that the spirit of allegiance which they offer through him to the King-Emperor he on behalf of His Imperial Majesty unreservedly accepts. Hence it was that while the Royal procession trotted smartly from the Railway Station through the Landa Bazar, past the Delhi Gate and the Yekki Gate, and along the Circular Road, it slowed down to a quiet walk on reaching the Chiefs' camp, and did not resume its former flashing gait until it had soberly perambulated the whole length of the long line of tents.

First in order of juniority, the Prince and Princess of Wales drove slowly past the camp of the Raja of Suket, His Highness Darsht Nikandan Sen, the proud representative of an old Rajput family of the famous Chandravansi race. His is a little hill state of about four hundred square miles with a population of perhaps fifty thousand. In the old fighting days Suket fell under Sikh supremacy, and it was not until the Sikh power had been broken that the state passed under British authority by the Treaty of Lahore of 1846. From his frosty Himalayan abode the Raja has come down to the warm plains to declare to the Prince of Wales that even in the remote mountains on the confines of the Empire loyalty is a living sentiment and carries both privileges and responsibilities.

Next in order, the Royal procession glided gently past the camp of the Raja of Chamba. A proud Rajput too is His Highness, claiming an unbroken and unsullied descent from the original antique Kshatriya or warrior caste of Vedic times. Chamba, like Suket, is a Himalayan kingdom, shut in on almost every side by lofty ranges, far away in the obscurities that lie at the back of the Kangra Valley. It has an area of something like three thousand square miles and a population of perhaps 130,000, and its many mixed races present a fascinating ethnological study. In Chamba resides a considerable Brahman community of primitive type, engaged in archaic methods of agriculture, who being strangers to the elaborate Hinduism of the plains are looked up to because of their supposed purity of race. The Chamba forests provide an important timber supply for the great Public Works Department of Northern India, and the Chamba hillsides graze not less than ten thousand buffaloes and kine and half a million sheep and goats. Here is one of the sportsman's paradises; and if the Prince of Wales could spend a season in Chamba, he would not soon forget the bear and the leopard, the ibex and the barking deer, the partridges and the pheasants.

A Sikh State next greeted the Royal arrivals—Faridkot. His Highness Barar Bans, Raja Balbir Singh Bahadur stands for a page in history. Ranjit Singh, the Alexander of the Punjab, in the height of his power, laid violent hands on Faridkot, but in 1808 the British Government compelled him to disgorge his unlawful booty. In the Sikh war of 1845 the Chief of Faridkot, Pahar Singh, exerted himself strongly on the English behalf, and in the second Sikh war of 1849 his son, Wazir Singh, followed suit. Again in the Mutiny of 1857 the Faridkot Raja distinguished himself by seizing mutineers, by guarding the Sutlej ferries and by attacking the notorious rebel, Sham Das. The Raja also stands for genealogical dignity. The founder of the family was a Burat jat by tribe who rose to prominence under the Emperor Baber. His Highness rules a territory of some six or seven hundred square miles with a population of a quarter of a million.

With Hindu and Sikh left behind, the Royal procession next came alongside a Muhammadan principality—Maler Kotla. The Nawab of this small State is a pure Afghan, whose ancestors came from Kabul at the rise of the Moghal Empire in India and held offices of importance under the famous Delhi Kings. When the Moghal dynasty sank into decay the Nawab of Maler Kotla made himself independent, and in 1788 after the terrible Mahrattas had become predominant in these parts, he with all his followers joined the British Army. When the subjugation of Holkar had been accomplished the English Government succeeded to the power of the Mahrattas in the Punjab, and the Nawab of Maler Kotla got his reward. Later Rujit Sing came blustering against the State and demanded a "ransom" of two lakhs of rupees, but the British Government interfered successfully, and ever since Maler Kotla has enjoyed security under the British power.

The camp of Mandi, which stood next in order along the route, represents the most important of those numerous hill states to which British influence extended in 1846 after the first Sikh war. Mandi lies on the lower ranges of the Himalayas between two famous valleys, Kangra and Kulu, and its well-wooded slopes, which rise to a maximum elevation of 7,000 feet, abound in game. With an area of about twelve hundred square miles and a population of nearly two hundred thousand, its importance is even physically apparent, while its roads and bridges, constructed in the face of heavy engineering difficulties at a large cost, proclaim its enterprise. Salt is the most important natural product of the State, and the salt mines are run by the British Government which pays royalties to the Raja. His Highness is a Rajput of old family, and Mandi is an offshoot from Suket. In days when the early Plantagenets ruled in England, Babu Sen, a younger brother of the Chief of Suket, quarrelled with his elder brother and left Suket to seek his fortune. Mandi became his fortune, and no hill prince could have wished for better. But the consequence was an endless warfare between the Mandi Chieftaincy and Suket. In 1840 Mandi was compelled to submit to the extortionate demands of the ever-rapacious Sikh authorities in Lahore, and the Raja thereafter learnt to look to the British for protection, with the result that after the decisive Sikh battle of Sobraon he formally tendered full allegiance.

From Mandi the Prince and Princess of Wales passed on to Kapurthala. His Highness Jagatjit Singh Bahadur, K.C.S.I., is lord of about six hundred square miles bearing between three and four hundred thousand inhabitants. More than once he has visited Europe—travel and especially Western travel is his passion; and he was present at the celebration of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee in London. His Imperial Service Infantry took a prominent part in the Tirah campaign of 1897 and is a corps that any Raja might well feel proud of. His Highness is a Sikh and as with all Sikhs his allegiance knows no hesitancy. In the great upheaval of 1857 the forces of his predecessor, Randbir Singh, never wavered in their loyalty and attachment to the British cause, and they enormously strengthened our hold over the Jullundur Doab.

Another Sikh State, Nabha, stood next in the order of the Royal inspection. When nothing would content the all-conquering Ranjit Singh but absolute supremacy over the whole of the Punjab, Nabha applied to the English for aid, and when Colonel Ochterlony was sent to the rescue the cordiality of Nabha knew no bounds. After the State had been formally taken under British protection the Raja became a faithful ally; and though his son, by an exception rare among his race lacked the old man's steadfastness, the convincing battle of Sobraon wrought so universal an impression of British irresistibility that the whole resources of Nabha were thereafter placed at the English Government's disposal. In the 1857 Mutiny Nabha distinguished itself by its determined loyalty. The present Raja, His Highness Sir Hira Singh Maledendar Bahadur, G.C.I.E., G.C.S.I., is an Honorary Colonel of the British Army and the most eminent living Sikh. He served personally in the last Afghan war, and his Imperial Service Troops rendered good service in the Tirah campaign.

From Nabha the natural transition was to the sister Sikh State of Jind. In the great Indian Mutiny the Raja of Jind was the very first to march out against the mutineers at Delhi. His troops actually acted as the vanguard of the British Army before Delhi and took part in the memorable final assault. But the Jind dynasty has ever been famous for its loyalty to the British power, and great too has been its reward. In the Tirah campaign the Jind Imperial Service Infantry specially distinguished itself. His Highness Raja-i-Rajgan-Raja Ramblhir Singh Bahadur belongs to the famous Phulkian family of Sidhu Jats, and, like their Highnesses of Patiala and Nabha, is descended from Phul—hence the term "Phulkian" applied to these three principalities. Jind measures some thirteen hundred square miles in extent, and has a population of about three hundred thousand.

The procession next paused before the premier Muhammadan State of the Punjab—Bahawalpur. Bahawalpur enjoys one distinction that is unique in the Punjab: its relations with the British Government are regulated by treaty, whereas the relations of all the other native States of the Punjab are prescribed by sansads or charters. At the end of the Eighteenth Century, after the collapse of the Kabul Kingdom in India, Bahawalpur broke away from Afghan dominance and in 1838 established a treaty with the British whereto it has since abided with invincible loyalty. The late Nawab doubled the revenue of the State, which is now 16 lakhs of rupees, by imitating British schemes of irrigation. Bahawalpur city, the capital of the State, is famous for its magnificent palace, with underground State apartments so wonderfully constructed that in the severest blaze of midsummer, when the normal temperature of the upper chambers exceeds 110°, the thermometer never rises above 70°. From the roof of this palace may be obtained an extensive view of that vast Bikanir desert from which the Prince of Wales has but lately arrived. Bahawalpur State stretches for some three hundred miles along the confines of the wilderness of Rajputana, but under a wise administration it promises to be a political as well as a physical oasis. The young Nawab, His Highness Muhammad Bahawal Khan Abhasil, springs from the Daudputra family of Sind, and had the honour of being invited to England to the King-Emperor's Coronation, though illness prevented his presence at that grand ceremony.

Lastly the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at the premier state of the Punjab—Patiala. The Raja, His Highness Bhupindra Singh, is but a boy of 14, but he has a noble future to contemplate. Patiala, with its six thousand square miles of territory and its two million population, is a domain of immense possibilities. Its present revenue of 70 lakhs should be an instrument of rare power in wise and benevolent hands, and of all the 36 native states of the Punjab there is none that can hope to attain to greater distinction. The late Maharaja, devoted as he was to riding and sport, personally took a battalion of his own Imperial Service Infantry and a field troop of his Imperial Service Lancers into the Tirah campaign, thereby repeating at the end of the nineteenth century the exploits of his forbears at the beginning and in the middle of the same eventful cycle. In the Nepal war of 1815 the Patiala Chief aided the British Government with troops against the terrible Gurkhas. When the Sikh Army invaded the cis-Sutlej in 1845 the Maharaja of Patiala cast in his lot with the British long before the British cause was obviously the winning cause. This was pure chivalry. Finally in the Mutiny the Maharaja Narendra Singh furnished a valuable force which proceeded to Delhi and kept open to the fateful Grand Trunk Road.

Such was the array of camps in front of which the Prince and Princess of Wales slowly and respectfully wended their admiring way.

The following address was presented by the Lahore Municipality:—

May it please Your Royal Highnesses:—As the representatives of the people of Lahore, we, the Members of the Municipal Committee, venture to approach Your Royal Highnesses to offer you our hearty welcome to our town. It is the capital of a province which may not rank with others in wealth and population, but bears the proud name of "The Sword hand of India," and is the nursery of the Indian Army, its people furnishing soldiers who in devotion and loyalty to the Throne are second to none in our world-wide Empire.

The Punjab has recently passed through great calamities, but with the help of our benign Government these have been tidied over and have only tended to draw closer the bonds which already unite the rulers and the ruled.

At this the capital city of the Punjab we have had the great good fortune in the past to tender a welcome to Your Royal Highness' august father, our present beloved Sovereign. In the 30 years that have elapsed since that memorable visit, vast arid tracts have been reclaimed and deserts converted into oases by a gigantic system of irrigation which is perhaps unequalled in the history of the Empire, and there has been corresponding progress and prosperity in other directions also. Lahore has fully shared in all these benefits, and its population and size are almost double what they were 30 years ago. To-day Providence fills our heart with pride and gratitude that we should be permitted to tender our fealty to Your Royal Highness as the Heir-Apparent and to Your Royal Highness' Gracious Consort. We earnestly hope that Your Royal Highnesses will enjoy your visit to India. We are proudly conscious that you will everywhere receive evidence that the same love and attachment is felt by the people for our Gracious Sovereign King Edward VII as was and still is felt for our Empress-Mother Victoria the Good, and it is our respectful prayer that Your Royal Highness will be pleased to convey to His Majesty our assurance that we are happy and contented and that our prayer to Almighty God is that our beloved Emperor may live long to rule over us.

The State banquet at Government House in the evening was limited to the Judges, the Bishop and a few high officials, besides the personal staffs. No ladies were present nor were there any toasts except "the King-Emperor" and "Their Royal Highnesses" proposed by the Lieutenant-Governor. After dinner His Royal Highness drove across to the Lawrence Hall where the Provincial Durbars were presented and then a procession being formed the Prince of Wales proceeded through the connecting corridor to the large Montgomery Hall where the Punjab Chiefs and a large gathering of European and native gentlemen were assembled. With a fanfare of trumpets from the gallery His Royal Highness was escorted to a dais where seated in a chair of state he received the seven Ruling Chiefs present as they were one by one formally introduced by the Lieutenant-Governor. As each Chief retired he was ushered to a seat to the right or left of the Prince and the dais soon presented a splendid appearance of rich dress, flashing jewels and bright uniforms. After His Royal Highness had shaken hands and exchanged a brief greeting with all the Chiefs present, the native officers on duty at Mian Mir were brought up and introduced, saluting, and the Prince touched their swords. He then, after bowing to the Chiefs, walked down from the dais and through the body of the Hall, stopping and saying some kindly words as the Lieutenant-Governor or Sir Walter Lawrence briefly introduced a few gentlemen. In a short time His Royal Highness took his departure and the Durbar broke up.

Daily Express.—The Prince and Princess of Wales have experienced another of the strange surprises of India.

They arrived at Lahore last night from the Bikanir desert. It was like travelling by express train from the middle ages to the twentieth century; from a land of feudal nobles to one of town councils and improved drainage systems; from a country where half-naked swordsmen pitch their tents in the desert to a city where the clothes look as if they were bought in Bond-street or St. James'.

But it was India all the same. The native princes of the Punjab were gathered in a camp of welcome. Elephants, gay with silver trappings and crimson howdahs, guarded the portals.

The Chiefs were true Princes of the East. The Maharaja of Patiala, a slim, dignified youth, nearly six feet high, wore a rich velvet costume of pale blue, and precious stones glinted in his puggaree and the hilt of his sword. His attendants, in green and yellow as bright as the colours of a cockatoo, made a brave show. The bright blue of the Kapurthala retainers shamed the Indian sky, and their hawk-like noses and splendid black beards justified their claim to be in the picture.

While the Prince was engaged in ceremonies of state the Princess, according to her habit, went driving to see the wonders of the city. She was especially interested in the museum, where Mr. Rudyard Kipling's father left so enduring a record of his taste and learning.

The Maharaja of Bikanir, says a Reuter special telegram, will build a town hall, and add half a regiment of infantry to the Imperial Service Troops, in commemoration of the Prince's visit.

The City of Victory (Jaipur) is less than two hundred years old. Five miles away, among the mountains to the north, Amber, the old city, waits, patient and half-ruined for the day to come when the long delayed tide of desert sand shall sweep round into the recess where Jaipur hides, and the dainty gardens and wide pink-washed streets of balconied and latticed houses shall at last become part and parcel of the great Indian desert. Even now the long levels stretch interminably, dry and arid, choked with drifted heaps of grit where a fold in the ground or a scorched boulder has arrested the running skein of wind-blown sand and seamed with the thirsty nullahs where no plant blows. Only a few babel thorns find beside the road a scanty catchment of water in the hollows dug out to provide the embankment of the fiery rails, and the loose-petalled wild cassia alternates a yellow with the faint lilac and grey-green of the inevitable oak plant. Inside a sheltered nook in the mountains, where the bare spurs of the Amber ridge thrust out huge sand groynes into the wilderness, Jai Singh built him a new home and set it about with wide and metalled roads and orderly squares, and all the gallantry of gardens. From a distance Jaipur lies hidden amid its own foliage. Only here and there the high bastions of the city gates, the dainty finials and cupolas of the palace, or of Jacob's Museum, or a flame-like temple tower, rise high over the sea of banyan and neem and straggling acacia. But up from the south-west creeps, nearer year by year, the vanguard of the desert waves unto the very mouth of this haven of refuge, which lies unprotected and assailable from just that one quarter from which the danger comes. Already the heavy powdering lies in year-long beds beside the streets and garden hedges; already the very palace courts are scenes of miniature cyclones, and the sills of the wayside temple gates are banked up flush with a ramp of white dust. Yet Jaipur flourishes, and may have many a long year before it before the court and the commons retreat again to the dry fastnesses which Jai Singh abandoned, as many have done before him, to enjoy the easy accessibility and riot of greenery that were offered by the plain which lay out beneath his feet.

Amber still resists the subtle teeth of age and neglect. Indeed, were a palace all that is needed the Maharaja of Jaipur might transfer himself to his old capital with as little delay as attends the flitting of the Viceroy from Calcutta to Simla year by year. All is here still—the courts of audience and the gardens of repose, the women's apartments and the long galleries for the men and beasts. Even to this day the temple is served as diligently as ever, and the early visitor to Amber may still see the morning sacrifice to Kali hustled into the sacred domain—a goat, dyed blue upon its head and neck, and vaguely resisting the efforts of the priest's acolytes to shepherd him in these unwonted paths. Excepting always the Imperial palaces of India, there is not in the peninsula a more exquisite structure of marble inlaid with precious and semi-precious stones, of sandalwood inlaid with ebony and ivory, than this deserted home of long dead and forgotten chieftains. Indeed, the story goes that Jehangir himself, the pettiest of soul of all the Mogul Emperors, sent peremptory orders that his vassal's beautiful home should be pulled down, as being more beautiful than his own. His emissary arrived at Amber only to find the exquisite carvings of pillar and corbel and bracket plastered and overlaid with an inch-thick coat of rough cement and whitewash, and he could only report with amazement to his Imperial master that rumour had strangely exaggerated the beauties of Mirzo Raja's new palace and retinue. Amber city needs far more concern. At a distance its streets and walls seem almost as sound as ever, but a hundred and eighty years of neglect have worked far more havoc in poorer homes of sun-dried brick and loose stone than in the marble and sandstone palace. Everywhere the indefatigable acacia has rooted itself, and the long, lithe trails of convolvulus and karela help, in their lesser way, the work of disintegration.

Still, there the city is, and unless something more efficacious than the faint-hearted irrigation of the plain at the mouth of this haven of refuge be not soon adopted to stay the westward migration of the Great Indian Desert, Jaipur will be driven again from her fancied haven on the plain below. Of all cities of India Jaipur may claim the pride of place for sheer colour. Burma alone can in this matter hold its own with Jaipur, and it needs the crowded slopes of the Shiv Dagon to afford this single parallel that the world has to offer to the sight of the main street of Jaipur. With, and in spite of, every modern improvement of paving and lighting, the city remains rebellious; Eastern it is, and Eastern it must remain, in spite of the flood of Occidental inventions and visitors which have been frankly accepted by the Maharaja himself, one of the staunchest of the old guard of Rajput Chiefs. The little fires at which the men and women of Jaipur cook their evening meals burn up white and clear as the day and the sunset sink together. These tiny fires they light along the kerb of the wide pavement, and in their strong and flickering light the small circle round them and the moving crowd of pleasure-making citizens are thrown into high relief. With the daylight all that is European vanishes. There are two cities in Jaipur. One is almost a model of management and instruction. Museums and health regulations, drainage, gas-lamps, police, all are here from sunrise to sunset. The well-watered roads and kindly tended gardens and schools, the notices innumerable dealing with every kind of municipal and sanitary duty, all these things are of the new régime.

New, too, are the many industries of the place—the very enamel work which is associated with her name is perhaps the newest of them all—new the inspectors and officials who seem to interfere with every prejudice of India; but the old spirit is there, there and very near the surface. At night Jaipur returns to its old beautiful and unregenerate self. Nay, even in the daytime you have not far to look if you will but leave the city's centre to its orderly prosperity. Four miles beyond the Palace gates you still may see a cheetah hunt. Now and again, in the noonday heat, you may have seen a leopard crouching along beside its master—querulous, uncertain, half-timid, heavily hooded with blue silk, and finding the trimmed stone of the pavement maddeningly hot beneath its silent pads. But it is a different animal when at last, after a tedious stalk of a herd of black buck, the leopard is unhooded from the whining bullock-cart and left to his own work. In all the world there is little left so savage and so beautiful as this steel-springed cat when he scents his quarry. In a flash he has dropped to the plain, belly-flat upon the hot stones, while he works his way to a 10-inch patch of a sage brush, all elbows, and seemingly but four inches above the ground. You may see the trail of him as he goes. From one bush he makes for another or a fold of ground. One watches him with a touch of his own silence, though the little caravan of bullock carts must still be kept moving lest their stopping should alarm the buck. So it goes on, this yellow devil edging himself nearer and nearer to his chosen prey, till while fifty yards away yet the buck raises his head. Whether he temporises his danger at once or not, there is no chance of stalking him a yard further, and the cheetah makes his dash. There is not a sound on either side. Two of the fastest animals on earth—the cheetah is beyond all question the swiftest—engage in a life-and-death race. It is soon over, for if the cheetah does not bring his prey down in 250 yards he throws up the chase and returns ignominiously to his master. If he catches the buck there is an ugly finale of jetting life-blood and convulsed limbs and glazing eyes, interfered with by the cheetah's master, who brings a huge wooden spoon filled with blood and entrails which he forcibly substitutes for the buck itself under the still sucking muzzle of the sated leopard. But whether he catch it or not, the cheetah's flight over the ground for 200 yards is a thing that it is worth going to Jaipur to see.

Other barbaric sports still hold their own here. All one afternoon there will be animal fighting in the Maharaja's arena. Every male beast, and not a few birds also, is here pitted against his own kind; stags, goats, buffaloes, rams, bears, everything that has the power to fight, is here brought into the lists, and anyone who has once heard the sound of the meeting of two fresh and keen rams will remember it, with a headache, to this day. Little harm is actually done; most of these duels terminate by the exhaustion of both sides, while the quails, cocks and partridges seem to enjoy an occasional set-to in public. Nearer home still, the alligators may be fed with lumps of raw meat in the huge rectangular tank. At first you will hardly believe that there are any of the brutes there at all, but the high call of their keeper at a little ghat on one side of the reservoir will, after a time, cause little whirlpools on the surface of the water, and a horny head will rise for a moment and reappear a few yards nearer. When once they have emerged from the tank and lie at the water's edge, the food is thrown, and half a-dozen "muggers" snap at the gory morsels. You might think that an alligator was an unhealthy brute until one of them rushes the ramp of the ghat for a good twelve feet and snaps its jaws together, a few feet away from your trousers ends upon some carelessly dropped lump of red meat. After all, it is a poor substitute for an erring wife.

Yes, one has only to scratch Jaipur to realise that the modern commercialism and dull municipal excellence of the city is hardly more than a veneer. The Nagas represent the true spirit of Jaipur more than the Parsi merchant or the true cheened police men at the palace gates. The Naga is a more-than-semi-naked devotee, who carries a scabbardless sword, and is sworn to give up his life in the first rush upon the battlements of an enemy. He parades the streets of Jaipur on ceremonial occasions, and will be there in hundreds and tens of hundreds to do honour to the Shalzada. The good people of Jaipur are almost as much strangers to him as the Englishmen, and he goes about in lonely fashion, brandishing a flame-like sword, strangely coiffured and strangely painted. But we English must not forget that it was owing to these painted fanatics of Jaipur that the flank of the Nicholson's march on Delhi was clear; we owe much to the City of Victory.

Englishman.—The Durbar reception at the Montgomery Hall last night was one of those well designed semi-State ceremonies which affords His Royal Highness a better opportunity of coming into close contact with the Chiefs, than is afforded by solemn Durbars of rigid State visits. The handsome hall, erected in memory of a former Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, was gracefully decorated with handsome foliage, plants, and rich carpets and there were gathered all the notabilities of the Punjab, British and Indian. Amidst a throng conspicuous by the brilliance of the costumes and uniforms, the young Maharaja of Patiala was conspicuous by the splendour of his jewels, his turban being ringed and ringed with pearls and diamonds. The fine presence of that good sportsman, the Kour Sahib, was scarcely less noteworthy. But the palm for picturesqueness was easily borne off by the Baluch Chiefs. Garbed in flowing white with their oiled ringlets hanging over their shoulders and untamed eyes, they were perfect specimens of the wild border races.

In the outer hall His Royal Highness received the principal Durbars of the Punjab, some hundred and thirty in number, and then a stately procession was formed and to the blare of trumpets, preceded by his staff in full uniform, the Prince entered the reception chamber and seated himself in the Chair of State. The Prince was looking and, according to informed authority was feeling particularly well, having quite recovered from the fatigue of his heavy days at Bikanir, and wore the familiar scarlet of a British General, crossed with the ribbon of the Star of India.

Then the Chiefs were led in order of precedence to the foot of the dais where Sir Charles Rivaz presented them, the heads of houses sitting on His Royal Highness's right hand and on his left and the cadets being grouped in rear. Afterwards the native officers on duty at Mian Mir were presented, His Royal Highness touching the hilts of the swords presented in token of fealty. The more formal ceremonies were now over, and descending from the dais the Prince had half an hour's more intimate conversation with the Chiefs. It is on these occasions that the rare qualities of Sir Walter Lawrence as Chief of Staff are displayed. There does not seem to be a Native Chief in India whom Sir Walter does not know, and his catholic knowledge, tact, charm of manner, and familiarity with the vernaculars speedily efface the timidity and reserve natural on such occasions. One missed with regret the grand old Chief of Nabha, who was too unwell to attend.

According to the programme, His Royal Highness was to have visited this morning the spacious Fort of Lahore, the extensive walled enclosure which the great Akbar adorned with specimens of mixed Hindu and Saracenic architecture, largely defaced by later alterations, and now over-bespangled with British whitewash. The Fort was spotlessly swept and garnished, and the guard and artillery were in waiting to receive the Prince, but in view of the pressure of engagements this item was wisely omitted from the day's engagements. The first great ceremony was therefore the visits of the Punjab Chiefs to His Royal Highness at Government House. The Chieftains of the Land of the Five Rivers stand high in the roll of India's Native Princes. They are scions of the finest fighting stock in Hindustan. It is men of their race who have won for the Punjab the proud title of "the sword-hand of India," and their stout loyalty in times of the darkest depression has gained for them a place in the affections of Englishmen which must never be diminished. "Lord, keep my memory green," was the prayer of the man to whom forgetfulness brought the loss of all the softening influences of life. May our memory in these days of fast-succeeding generations be kept green with the recollections of the deeds of those houses who were true to the Raj when every good sword was of priceless value!

The Punjab Chiefs are encamped on the Fort parade ground, the maidan which in sterner times was the glacis of Lahore's formidable defences. From here a broad shady road leads to Government House, and from an early hour this was thronged with sightseers, many being English, anxious to see the Chiefs in their full feudal splendour. They were amply rewarded. First came the Raja of Patiala, a boy of fourteen, lord of the premier State of the Punjab and heir to a great name and noble traditions. That name has been somewhat tarnished by a fatal misconception of what good sportsmanship means, and never stood a boy on the threshold of greater opportunities. Followed the leading Mahomedan Chief, the Nawab of Bahawalpur, whose fathers broke away from Afghan dominance in 1838 and whose house has since been invincibly true to their Treaty engagements. Next the Sikh Raja of Jhind, of a State whose troops were the first to march against the Mutineers at Delhi and whose Imperial Service Infantry especially distinguished themselves in the Tirah campaign. Then came the most eminent Sikh living, the grand old Rajah of Nabha, representative of a fine school that is fast passing away and whose name is a synonym for loyalty and honesty throughout India. Succeeded the Raja of Kapurthala, greatly given to Western travel, escorted by the blue and white lancers in the faultless turn out which distinguishes all the Kapurthala retainers.

Now came the first of the hill Chieftains, the Raja of Mandi, a Rajput of the Suket family, and ruler of the Lower Himalaya Ranges lying between the beautiful valleys of Kangra and Kulus. The Regent of Maler Kotla paid the devoirs of this little principality, carved out by one of the adventurers who followed in the train of the Moghul invaders, and his well-turned-out escort was conspicuous by its nodding yellow plumes. Faridkot, the Sikh, was unfortunately detained in camp by fever, so Maler Kotla was followed by Chamba, a proud Rajput whose Himalayan kingdom is tucked away at the back of the Kangra Valley. And lastly, the Raja of Suket, a Rajput of the Rajputs and ruler of some four hundred square miles of mountainous territory. So they passed into the presence of the Heir-Apparent, there cheerfully to render the Eastern tributes of homage and fealty. Sikh and Rajput and Afghan, they were symbols of the successive waves of invasion, which made Hindustan the cockpit of Asia for centuries until the spread of the Pax Britannica brought rest to the tired land. But widely differing in race and ideals they had this great bond in common, unswerving loyalty to their treaty obligation, and deep devotion to the Imperial throne. Could any equally large assemblage of neighbouring Chiefs be brought together in India with such an unsullied history?

Apart from these State visits the day was spent as quietly as possible. Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales visited the museum, but the Prince did not drive to the Dufferin Hospital, which was provided in the programme; instead he went riding with General Beatson in the late afternoon, and the Prince and Princess dined quietly at the Government House. The beautiful Shalimar Gardens were illuminated in the evening, but Their Royal Highnesses were not present.

Indian Daily News.—The visits of the Chiefs to the Prince this forenoon aroused considerable interest in Lahore, numbers of people lining the route from the Chiefs' camps to Government House to witness the passage of each procession. Each of the Chiefs came in brilliant equipages and attended by a retinue of State officials. The first to reach Government House was the Maharaja of Patiala, wearing the magnificent jewels which excite continuous interest. The venerable Raja of Nabha, who was unable to be present at the reception last night, was carried to the gates of Government House in a palanquin and entered his State carriage to be driven through the grounds to the door of Government House. The usual ceremonies were observed between the Prince and Chiefs, to whom His Royal Highness presented attar and pan. The programme at Lahore includes visits to institutions and illuminations to-night; return visits to the Chiefs to-morrow, with a purdah party to be attended by the Princess. The Punjab Ball in honour of Their Royal Highnesses takes place to-morrow night, and on Friday there will be a parade of the Imperial Service Troops, and a garden party, Their Royal Highnesses leaving for Peshawar the same night. The arrangements at Lahore are by no means elaborate, the chief interest being centred in the meeting between the Prince and Chiefs.

Last night a smoking tent in the visitors' camp, which adjoins the Royal camp, was destroyed by fire. The tent was unoccupied at the time of the outbreak.

THE MAIDAN ENTERTAINMENT.

The following supplementary note regarding the arrangements proposed for the entertainment on the Maidan on the 2nd January was published yesterday morning:—The Red Road will be decorated by Government for the State procession on the 29th December, and these decorations will remain during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta.

From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance to the place of entertainment on the Grass Ride, the route will be decorated in the following manner:—

Across the Casuarina Avenue, from the Dufferin Statue southwards, there will be a succession of triumphal arches in the form of "tapestry" suspended from high masts. Between these masts, at frequent intervals, will be smaller poles bearing suitable devices.

These pieces of "tapestry," which are to be of Oriental design, are being painted by hand under the immediate supervision of Signor Ghilardi.

At the junction of Kidderpore Road with the Casuarina Avenue, the procession will pass through a handsome pavilion with open sides. A similar pavilion will be erected on the Grass Ride at the spot where Their Royal Highnesses will alight from the carriage.

From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance pavilion the road will be lined by 1,000 retainers lent by various Indian noblemen. These retainers will carry maces, silver sticks, spears, etc., and on the return journey will light the road for Their Royal Highnesses with 1,000 torches.

The pavilion will be gaily decorated with flags and bunting, and the Royal dais will be covered with a rich canopy of red, embroidered in gold, the front fringe of which will have the Prince of Wales's feathers and motto in white silk in the centre, with the Star of India and the Order of the Indian Empire on either side.

In each corner will be a peacock picked out in jewels. This canopy will be supported by four silver pillars.

The pavilion will be illuminated without and within by electric light and will have the Royal Arms brilliantly lit at the highest point.

The pavilion will be divided into blocks, and behind each block will be a shamiana for refreshments.

Both tanks will be outlined with coloured chirags, and the western bank of the Serpentine Tank, and the surface of the tank itself, will be brilliantly illuminated by men brought down from Murshidabad for the purpose.

The whole of that portion of the Maidan which is bounded by the Outram Avenue on the North, by Chowringhee and the Cathedral Road on the East, by the Casuarina Avenue on the West, and by the Grass Ride on the South, will be hung with thousands of lamps; and it is believed that the Bengal Club, the Army and Navy Stores and other buildings in that portion of Chowringhee will also be illuminated on that evening.

The bands of the 15th Hussars, the King's Own and the Town Band have already been engaged. The Town Band will support the choir of 500 children who will sing "God Bless the Prince of Wales" under the direction of Mr. Slater, the Cathedral Organist.

The other two bands will play during the entertainment.

Lady.—The Prince and Princess of Wales continue their tour through India, where each succeeding stage of their progress seems to eclipse in splendour those that have preceded it. At Jaipur—famous for being the centre of learning in India, an Oriental Oxford, with this difference, that its colleges, halls and observatories, palaces, and houses alike of rich and poor are all built of a peculiar pink-tinted stone, giving the whole city a wonderfully beautiful and altogether unique appearance—Their Royal Highnesses were received by the Maharaja with gorgeous state and ceremony. With the ruler of this State, who has the distinction of belonging to a race of Princes who claim to trace their lineage from fabulous times, the Prince went out shooting, and showed his renowned skill as a marksman by successfully "bagging" his first tiger.

Mysore Herald.—Writing from Bombay, Mr. Sidney Low, as special correspondent of the Standard, sends a graphic account of the preparations which are everywhere being made for the welcome of the Princess of Wales. From Mr. Low's description in the Standard we quote the following:

Several Rajahs are occupying bungalows hired at high rents, and these temporary dwellings are profusely decorated. There is, indeed, a great gathering of ruling Princes who have come to Bombay to welcome India's future Emperor. Nearly all the chiefs with whom the Bombay Government on the political side is directly related are here. First among them is His Highness Sir Shahu Chhatrapati Maharaja, Maharaja of Kolhapur, who represents the younger branch of the family of the great Sivaji, founder of the Marhatta Empire, the Kolhapur dynasty having been established by Sivaji's grandson, whose mother, Tara Bai, is the heroine of Marhatta history. The present Maharaja is well known in England, having been present at the King's Coronation.

The Rao of Cutch is descended from a family of Gureja Rajputs, who after founding a principality in Sind, invaded Cutch in the middle of the fifteenth century. The gallant Maharaja of Idar, better known as Sir Pertab Singh of Jodhpur, the Rajput State of which he was regent during his nephew's minority, joins the Prince of Wales's staff as aide-de-camp. He is an aide-de-camp to the King, Honorary Commandant of the Imperial Cadet Corps, has won distinction as a soldier and sportsman, and is the beau ideal of Rajput chivalry. The Mahomedan Nawab of Junagadh is the ruler of an out-of-the-way but prosperous State in Kathiawar, in which is situated the famous shrine of Somnath, the gates of which were taken away by Mahamad of Ghazni, and recovered, Lord Ellenborough believed, by our army in Afghanistan. The Nawab also owns the Gir Forest, the last haunt of the Indian lion. He traces his descent to a Pathan soldier of fortune, who, a couple of centuries ago, set himself up as a ruler in Kathiawar, after expelling the great Moghul's deputy governor.

The Thakur Sahib of Bhavanagar, the Rana Sahib of Porbandar, and the Thakur Sahib of Gondal, other States in Kathiawar, are Rajputs. The Porbandar chief belongs to a tribe which claims descent from Hanuman, the monkey god. Sir Bhagvatsinhji of Gondal took a medical degree at Edinburgh. The Mahomedan Nawab of Janjira is descended from Abyssinian admirals who served under Aurungzeb. The Chief of Miraj, a Brahmin, boasts of ancestors who were thanked for their services by the Duke of Wellington, then General

Wellesley, during his campaigns in the Deccan. The Mahomedan Nawab of Cambay, a Shiah Moghul, is descended from a man who was viceroy of Ahmedabad under the Kings of Delhi. All of them are here, looking forward with eager expectation, which no amount of Oriental solidity can conceal, to making their loyal salams to His Royal Highness the Shahzada.

Mysore Herald.—In its ancient origin and traditions Udaipur stands first among the Rajput States; and its rulers have been fully alive to and proud of its unique character in this respect. From the Delhi Durbar the Maharana of Udaipur was absent for the reason, it has been said, that he could not reconcile himself to the idea of taking a second place to that of any other Native Prince in India. He is naturally proud of his ancestry, of his Rajput blood, and of the hoary traditions of his house; and as a matter of history and tradition he is entitled to the proud pre-eminence of ancient lineage which he claims among the Princes of India. There is a peculiar fitness in the heir-apparent of the King-Emperor visiting such a State and making the acquaintances of such a ruler. The satisfaction derived from the Royal visit is reciprocal. The Maharana on his part feels honoured by it, and His Royal Highness should deem it a matter of special satisfaction that he has had the opportunity of coming in contact with one of the finest races in India, and of seeing with his own eyes a State still governed on ancient Hindu models. Udaipur is perhaps the only State in India which still retains, in the essentials of its administration, the Hindu ideal of kingly rule. From the modern point of view, its administration may be antiquated; but it has in it excellences of such enduring character that the British rulers in India, in spite of their anxiety to bring every State in India into line with the territories under British rule, have allowed its ancient system of rule to be conducted on its own lines. The result of this has by no means been unhappy. Udaipur has seldom given ground for complaint that its administration is unsuited to the conditions of the country or the people, or that it does not take into account the interests of all classes of people subject to its rule. Even the language in use in the conduct of the administration is that of the country. The Maharana and his officers are not acquainted with English. The State is thus an interesting relic of the past; and so long as it is suited to the requirements of the people, and can ensure their contentment, happiness and well-being, it will be well to preserve its ancient characteristics and its ancient glory.

His Royal Highness has seen these sights new to his eyes. He has been charmed by the aspect and scenery of the country and been interested in the ruler and his people. Such an experience as he has had in Udaipur, he may not enjoy anywhere else. He can hardly come across elsewhere a Prince who makes an after-dinner speech in his own tongue, and who requires the medium of an interpreter to converse with the Royal visitor. In many other States he will find rulers who have taken to cricket and polo, who keep no company but that of Englishmen, who keep no furniture except that made in England, and who make themselves conspicuous on the race-course and the polo-ground. But few he will find who have not departed from their old ways, who have not modified their ancient customs to suit modern requirements. There are those who have been thoroughly Anglicised as well as those who, without giving up their ancient observances and customs, have adopted English ideals. Without being Anglicised in externals, they have become Anglicised in thought and feeling. There are, for example, such rulers as the Gaekwar of Baroda who combines in himself the best culture of the East and the West and who represents in himself the ideals of both. His Royal Highness will, in his tour, come in contact with all these, though it may not be possible for him to visit all their States. He will thus gain varied experience of the effects of English rule and English education on the native rulers of India, and he will be able to establish friendly relations with some of these, which may, in time, develop into mutual appreciation and attachment. In all these ways, his visit to India will have enduring results of the most beneficial character in the furtherance of Imperial interests.

The Princes of India are allied to the British Throne and British dominion; they are attached to them by ties of obligation and interest. They cannot evade the one or overlook the other. The Royal visit is intended for, and will result in, the strengthening of those Imperial ties which hold together the diverse elements and forces that are dominated by the Imperial will and policy. No Native State can have a policy which is inconsistent with the Imperial dominion of Britain; all are subordinate to that mighty entity, and all have to derive their authority and power from that central source. All the scattered atoms are attracted towards that centre of gravity, and those that drop away can have no place in the great Imperial organisation. In the popular conception of India the King constitutes this great centre, and the British constitution also assigns that high place to his Imperial Majesty. Hence the reverence and homage paid to the King's son are the reverence and homage paid to the person and throne of the King himself, and are prompted alike by the sense of obligation and by the sense of loyalty. His Royal Highness, by his personal qualities, has already succeeded in strengthening this sense of obligation and loyalty into personal affection and attachment. Words such as he uttered at Udaipur are bound to deeply impress those in respect of whom they were uttered. They are words of appreciation and sympathy; and coming as they do from His Royal Highness, they have a value and significance which the proud Rajputs will not fail to correctly estimate. They are a testimony to their ancient virtues of chivalry, bravery and courtesy, and a tribute to the noble traditions of Udaipur, and to the personal virtues of the Maharana. He himself and his subjects will highly value this testimony and this tribute; they will cherish them as a sincere acknowledgment emanating from Royal grace and sympathy.

Madras Mail.—There was a special meeting of the Executive Committee of the Royal Reception this morning, at which sundry details with regard to the decorations were discussed and settled. It was originally intended to spend only about Rs. 1,500 upon triumphal arches etc., but it has now been resolved to expend some Rs. 2,500 in this manner, and the triumphal arches will be erected at intervals all round the maidan, a distance of over three miles. I understand that the arches will be approximately as follows:—Opposite the Essex Barracks, the Regiment will erect their own and will also decorate the Barracks generally. The 2nd (Q. O.) Sappers and Miners' arch will probably be near the Kirk. Mr. Hafee Ismail Sait promises one in the vicinity of Messrs. Abraham and Co.'s establishment, and Messrs. Arnot Narain swamy Moodelliar near the Bangalore Agency. Mr. Annaswamy Moodelliar's decorations will be opposite Messrs. Foster and Co.'s, the Carabiniers' near the Wesleyan South Parade Church, and the Freemasons of Bangalore will also erect an arch.

Other arrangements have been already referred to. Mr. Maigundadeva Moodelliar proposes to arrange a Hindu entertainment, and Mr. Abdul Rahman, the Second Magistrate, will arrange a similar entertainment amongst the Mahomedans. The proceeds of these, as of the People's Fair, will go to help the Reception Fund.

Pioneer.—Lahore has welcomed the Prince and Princess of Wales with a warmth of enthusiasm which nobly embodies the traditional loyalty of the Punjab. It has turned out in its thousands and tens of thousands to-day to line the roads, which were gay with flags, decorations and mottoes; and from end to end of the long route taken from the railway station to Government House, more than five miles in all, the people's welcome has been full and sustained. They swarmed from within the city walls—men of the varied races well known in the Punjab and others from beyond the Frontier, for Lahore is cosmopolitan to some extent and its serais contain many travellers. At some points they stood in dense groups, at others the line thinned out, and then again came yet other crowds where thoroughfares joined or where good views could be obtained. There were no city streets passed through, but the walls were skirted by the Royal procession, and from its numerous gates Lahore sent forth its populace in streams that swelled as they took their course to the main channel, itself already teeming with life. It was not, as in Bombay, a Royal progress through streets with splendid buildings and every surrounding that marks a vast city, but one along shady roads with leaf and foliage on either hand broken by short stretches of business quarters and here and there the typical Eastern bazar. Public buildings there were, of course, to be seen and historical edifices were near at hand, notably the Fort, the Jama Masjid and Ranjit Singh's tomb; but Their Royal Highnesses were really circling about Lahore City as a whole and its interior still remains for them to explore. They saw incidentally what to them is still quite new, a civil station of Upper India with its residences and gardens, its courts and public offices and all the environment of European life at the head-quarters of a Provincial Government. Much and much more than this they also saw as will presently appear, but from this brief sketch some idea may be formed of the general picture spread out before them.

To give events their due sequence, one must take the official procedure followed in connection with the reception at the railway station. The Royal party were halting in British territory for the first time since they had left Bombay, although they had passed out of Rajputana in their morning's journey by train and had thus come within the boundaries of the Punjab. Full honours accordingly awaited them and on the platform were assembled Sir Charles Rivaz, the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Bindon Blood, Lieutenant-General of the Punjab Command, the Chief Judge of the Chief Court, the Lord Bishop of Lahore and those other leading officials and officers who form part of the administrative machinery in the Province. All were in full dress and there was a select group to give Their Royal Highnesses a welcome to Lahore. Introductions and presentations, salutes by guards of honour and that more distant salute of 31 guns, which carried its message to the thousands outside, were the preliminaries to the formation of the Royal procession which was presently to appear in full view of the eager crowds that had been patiently waiting for hours. Yet a little pause while the Prince inspected the guard of honour furnished by the West Yorkshire Regiment and the North-West Railway Volunteers, and then Their Royal Highnesses entered their carriages and the cortège moved on its way, the Lieutenant-Governor proceeding direct to Government House. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, were in the first carriage, and the Suite followed in six others. The escort was furnished by the 12th Lancers, and the Punjab Light Horse also shared in this honourable duty. The cavalcade started at an easy trot and took the route through the Landa Bazar and Circular Road to the Fort parade ground, where the Punjab Chiefs are in camp. This may be described as the first section of the route and as probably the most interesting one.

The crowd was very dense in the neighbourhood of the Railway station, and at once gave the heartiest welcome as the Prince and Princess appeared. There were demonstrations of earnest loyalty in the salaaming lines of people, and an impulsive eagerness to press forward and gaze at the occupants of the Royal carriage. The people of Northern India are impressive in character, though of strong natures and passionate feelings when their blood is stirred. To-day their intentness of purpose was clear and emphatic. They were all elated and joyous too, filled with pleasant anticipations and plainly gratified when their expectations had been realised as they were realised. The deep resonant murmur that rose and fell was as eloquent as any cheering, and the excited speech, as admiration and appreciation swayed them, when the procession had swept by was full of meaning. Young Lahore, too, had its part in the proceedings, and the groups of school children, in amber, yellow, light green or red clothing, with tiny flags in their hands, brightened many a yard of the roadway. They cheered with frantic joy and waved their flags, giving an enthusiastic greeting that was delightful to hear. Overhead were mottoes such as "Work and Worship," "Love, Labour and Loyalty," while hundreds of others conveyed the wishes of long life and happiness to the King, Prince and Princess. Flags, bannerets, and streamers of every colour danced in the sunlight or flickered in the shade, and beneath them in a never-ending line stretched the long crowds. In such manner the Delhi Gate was passed and the Circular Road gained. Past the Yakki Gate, the Punjab Chiefs' camps, ranged side by side on the parade ground below the Fort, soon came in view, and here the trot of the cortège was slowed down to a walk, for there was the ceremonial of receiving and acknowledging the welcome of these most loyal feudatories. Each had a detachment drawn up mostly of Imperial Service Troops, and a Royal salute was given in turn as the Royal carriage passed, the National Anthem being at the same time played. Suket, Chamba, Faridkot, Maler Kotla, Mandi, Kapurthala, Nabha, Jhind, Bahawalpur and Patiala were represented, though two of the Chiefs themselves were absent owing to illness. It was in this order that they were seen. The Patiala Lancers, in green with orange and green pendants, made a striking show. Very noticeable, too, was the Bahawalpur Camel Corps in khaki and green with the Bodyguard resplendent in scarlet and gold. The green and gold of Jhind, the scarlet and orange of Nabha, the blue and white of Kapurthala, the green with red facings of Mandi, these and yet more colours on the left of the line made a brilliant whole, and the variety of uniform was in itself a distinctive and pleasing feature. Elephants and led horses, splendidly caparisoned, were there, and in front of each of the eight camp gates sat a Chief in his carriage of State, adding still more glitter and brightness to the scene. It was a spectacle that lacked nothing to make it effective, and as the Prince returned the salutes of the Chiefs it was evident how instantly interested His Royal Highness was in this his first sight of the fighting races of the Punjab. He could see the medals worn by many of those who stood in the ranks showing how they had done good service in the field. Thousands of spectators had gathered at this point of the route, where certainly most was to be seen putting aside the purely decorative effect secured elsewhere.

The camps left behind, the procession broke once more into a trot, passed the Taksali Gate and so came to the Anakali Gardens, the second stage of the route. Here was a guard of the 1st Punjab Rifle Volunteers who paid the usual honours as the cortège drove up and came to a halt. Their Royal Highnesses left their carriages and the Municipal Address of welcome was presented to them. A stand for the general public and another for purdah ladies had been erected, and this civic function was successful in every detail.

A presentation of garlands by the Punjab Association rounded off this agreeable interlude in the procession and then the cortège once more moved forward, taking the route by the Upper Mall to Government House. Those who have not seen the Lahore Mall lately would scarcely recognise it now with its borders of grass and neat footpaths. It has been almost magically transformed and the result to-day was delightful. It was decorated throughout its length, and here again the crowds became dense and continuous, Europeans and natives watching and applauding the Royal progress. At the Club Lahore society had gathered in strength to view the procession, the members being "At Home," and from nowhere was it better seen or was there hearty cheering. By the time that the Royal party reached Government House, a distance of between five and six miles had been covered, and it is impossible to calculate even by tens of thousands how many people had had their desire fulfilled of seeing the Prince and Princess. Their Royal Highnesses had had a Punjab welcome, wanting nothing to make it memorable to them, and the evening saw the crowds streaming back into the City with the joyous consciousness of having given full expression to the loyalty that had carried them beyond its gates long hours before.

To-night there was a State Banquet given by the Lieutenant-Governor at Government House and later the Prince held a reception at the Montgomery Hall. This was preceded by a ceremony at the Lawrence Hall, where the Prince's arrival was announced by a fanfare sounded by trumpeters of the 12th (Prince of Wales) Royal Lancers, a guard of honour being also in attendance. The provincial durbars were presented to His Royal Highness, their nazars of one gold mohur being touched and remitted. They passed onwards, one by one, into the Montgomery Hall, and when all had been presented a Royal procession was formed to that Hall. This was a State ceremony full of dignity, the National Anthem being played as the Prince, accompanied by the Lieutenant-Governor with their Staffs, proceeded to the dais. A most distinguished company had assembled and the Hall was ablaze with military and civil uniforms, while the magnificent dresses and jewels of the seven Chiefs presented added lustre to the gathering. There has probably never been a more striking scene in the Montgomery Hall and the presentation of the Chiefs completed its effectiveness. The young Maharaja of Patiala, the Rajas of Jhind, Kapurthala, Mandi, Chamba and Suket, the Kunwar Sir Ranbir Singh of Patiala, Sahibzada Jafir Ali Khan of Maler Kotla, and the members of the Council of Regency of Patiala were all presented in turn, the Ruling Chiefs remaining on the dais placed to the right and left of the Prince. In this way after the last presentation had been made a brilliant group, of which the Prince was the central figure, had been formed on the dais, only however to be broken up a few minutes later when His Royal Highness rose to make the circuit of the Hall, conversing with various members of the assembly and not overlooking the claims of the durbars to a few moments' kindly talk. Shortly before 11 o'clock the Prince left for Government House.

Supplementary arrangements have been proposed in connection with the Royal visit (Calcutta) for the entertainment on the Maidan on the 2nd January. The Red Road will be decorated by Government for the State procession on 29th December and the decorations will remain during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta. From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance to the place of entertainment on the Grass Ride the route will be decorated in the following manner:—Across Casuarina Avenue a succession of triumphal arches in the form of tapestry suspended from high masts, and between these masts, at frequent intervals, smaller poles bearing suitable devices; these pieces of tapestry to be of Oriental design and painted by hand under the supervision of Signor Ghilardi. At the junction of the Kidderpore Road with Casuarina Avenue the procession will pass through a handsome pavilion with open sides. A similar pavilion will be erected on the Grass Ride at the spot where Their Royal Highnesses will alight from the carriage. From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance of the pavilion the road will be lined by 1,000 retainers lent by various Indian noblemen. These will carry maces, silver sticks, spears, etc., and on the return journey will light the road for Their Highnesses with 1,000 torches.

The pavilion will be gaily decorated with flags and bunting. The Royal dais will be covered with a rich canopy of red embroidered in gold. The front fringe will have the Prince of Wales's feathers and motto in white silk in the centre with the Star of India and the Order of the Indian Empire on either side. In each corner will be a peacock picked out in jewels. This canopy will be supported by four silver pillars. The pavilion will be illuminated without and within by electric light and will have the Royal Arms brilliantly lit at the highest point. The pavilion will be divided into blocks. Behind each block will be a shamiana for refreshments. Both tanks will be outlined with chirags. The surface of the Serpentine Tank will be brilliantly illuminated by men brought down from Murshidabad for the purpose. The whole of that portion of the maidan bounded by Outram Avenue on the north, Chowringhee and the Cathedral Road on the east, the Casuarina Avenue on the west, and the Grass Ride on the south will be hung with thousands of lamps. It is expected that the Bengal Club, Army and Navy Stores, and other buildings on that portion of Chowringhee will also be illuminated that evening. The Bands of the 15th Hussars and King's Own and the Town Band have already been engaged. The Town Band will support a choir of 500 children, who will sing "God bless the Prince of Wales" under the direction of the Cathedral organist.

30TH NOVEMBER 1905.

Pioneer.—The Prince at Jaipur.—A Jaipur correspondent wires:—On the eve of his departure from Jaipur the Prince expressed satisfaction at the arrangements made for his reception and graciously handed souvenirs to Colonel Herbert the Resident, Colonel Sir Swinton Jacob, Colonel Pank and Mr. Stothard, and some native officials of the State, detailed for duties in the Royal camp, were the recipients of gifts at the Prince's hands. His Royal Highness also awarded medals respectively to Rai Bahadur Dhanpatrai, Superintendent of the Transport Corps, and Thakur Bahadur Singh, Superintendent of the Thaggi and Dacoity, and the M. V. O. decoration to Rao Bahadur Sansar Chandra Sen, Member of Council.

Standard.—With their arrival at Lahore yesterday afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales came again to one of the great cities of British India, and it was the first they entered since the time of their leaving Bombay. The intervening period has been spent in territory which, though subject to the Imperial Crown, has remained under native Government. Their tour through Rajputana had taken the Royal visitors into a world apart; a land scattered with quaint vestiges and picturesque survivals of a romantic past, inhabited by a people who to this day have retained the habits and ideas of their ancestors, little changed in the march of centuries. To emerge from this wonderland from Bikanir, a noble desert stronghold of Rajput feudalism, on to the bustling and thriving city of Lahore is like passing at a bound from the Middle Ages to modern times.

The reception of Their Royal Highnesses at the railway station yesterday was a striking illustration of the transition. Here, instead of an array of barbaric retainers, equipped with archaic arms and accoutrements, some wearing chain armour cap à pic, others half-naked warriors brandishing big swords, such as met them at Jaipur or Udaipur, they found a smart escort of British Indian cavalry, and the guards of honour mounted at the station wore the scarlet uniform of the Regular Army. Instead, again, of a bevy of Chiefs gorgeously attired in brocaded silks and resplendent with jewels, there appeared frock-coated gentlemen, ladies in fashionable costumes, and fresh English faces.

All this was not, perhaps, a wholly unwelcome sight after the surfeit of Oriental tints during the past few weeks. Still, the Eastern colouring was not absent when the Prince and Princess drove through the outskirts of the city, and passed through the camp pitched for the Punjab Princes assembled there to meet them. Some of the Chiefs have brought a fine assortment of gorgeous retainers. The handsome blue liveries of the Raja of Kapurthala's men were much admired. The elephants with silver trappings and howdahs of the young Maharaja of Patiala, and his men in yellow and green, also made a brave show.

To-day the Prince of Wales has been receiving and returning the visits of Rajas and Nawabs, and Lahore has been witnessing the spectacle, now familiar to those who have accompanied the Royal tour thus far, of landaus dashing about to and from Government House filled with portly figures in dazzling raiment, each followed by a small escort of armed horsemen. The Princess of Wales has been driving about the city, and examining its many points of interest.

Lahore, formerly a centre of Mahomedan culture and of Sikh dominion, now exhibits the results of British power and progress. In its most interesting museum, unequalled in India, and handsome public buildings, some of which bear the impress of the taste of Mr. Lockwood Kipling, Rudyard Kipling's accomplished father, and in the houses of the English officials, with their leafy suburban gardens, is evidence of the ordered prosperity now established. But the great Emperors of the Moghul dynasty in its prime have also left their splendid mark upon Lahore, in mosque, tomb, and palace. It is a city of heavy towers and tall, flat-roofed houses, cutting the sky into fantastic shapes and angles, above narrow streets overhung by corbels and balconies in stone tanned by time into a deep brown or dusky grey. The rich, sombre monotony is broken by white domes rising like inverted stone lilies above the mosques, or by walls set with mosaic tiles of lucent blue and burnished yellow. In such a town, special decorations are out of place and unneeded. Those which Lahore is displaying to-day are particularly poor, consisting of miserable cheap flags strung from paltry poles, and paper posters like the contents bill of a newspaper bearing loyal but monotonous inscriptions—"God save the King," "God bless the Prince of Wales," and so forth. Municipal authorities in the Punjab should either leave their fine cities undecorated or adorn them in a dignified and suitable fashion.

The reception held by the Prince and Princess of Wales last evening was a brilliant affair. The Durbars awaited the arrival of the Prince and Princess in the Lawrence Hall, where they were presented in order of precedence by the Chief Secretary to the Government, each submitting a nazar of one gold mohur which the Prince touched and remitted. They then passed to the adjoining Montgomery Hall, where a general reception was held.

The Maharaja of Patiala, who, though still in his teens is nearly six feet in height, wore a gorgeous pale blue velvet dress, an ivory-hilted richly jewelled sword, pearl necklaces, and a puggree scintillating with emeralds, diamonds, and rubies. The other Chiefs were almost equally resplendent, and looked eminently picturesque, with their long black hair hanging in ringlets, their bushy black beards, and their keen aquiline profiles.

The Maharaja of Bikanir has announced that in commemoration of the Royal visit he will build a town hall, to be named after the Prince, and add half a regiment of infantry to his contribution to the Imperial Service Troops.—Reuter's Special Service.

Civil and Military Gazette.—According to the programme His Royal Highness was to have visited on Wednesday morning the Fort of Lahore—the spacious walled enclosure which the great Akbar adorned with specimens of mixed Hindu and Saracenic architecture largely defaced by later alterations and now over-bespashed with British whitewash. The Fort was spotlessly swept and garnished, and the guard and artillery were in waiting to receive the Prince, but, in view of the pressure of engagements, this item had unfortunately to be omitted from the day's engagements. Unfortunately because archaeological conservation has wrought a marvellous transformation in the internal beauties of the Fort during the last few years. Under the eagle eye of the late Viceroy the gems of ornament have been rescued, one might almost say disinterred, from obscurity and squalor and restored to something like their pristine glory. Lord Curzon used to say—and it was due to his own zeal for conservation that it could be said—that the Lahore Fort contained some of the finest specimens of the Moghul decorative art anywhere extant. The Moti Masjid His Excellency was worth to describe as a veritable "Pearl Mosque."

The first great ceremonies of the day were therefore the visits of the Punjab Chiefs to His Royal Highness at Government House. The chieftains of The Land of the Five Rivers stand high in the roll of Indian Native Princes. They are scions of the finest fighting stock in Hindustan. It is men of their race who have won for the Punjab the proud title of "the sword hand of India," and their stout loyalty in times of the darkest depression gained for them a place in the affections of Englishmen which can never be diminished. "Lord, keep my memory green" was the prayer of the man to whom forgetfulness brought the loss of all the softening influences of life. May our memory in these days of fast-succeeding generations be kept green with the recollections of the deeds of those houses who were true to the Raj when every good sword was of priceless value.

The Punjab Chiefs as already described are encamped on the Fort Parade ground. From here a broad shady road leads to Government House, and from an early hour this was thronged with sightseers, including hundreds of Europeans all anxious to see the Chiefs in their full feudal splendour. They were amply rewarded. First came the Raja of Patiala, a boy of fourteen, lord of the premier State of the Punjab and heir to a great name and noble traditions. Never stood a boy on the threshold of greater opportunities. Then followed the leading Muhammadan Chief, the Nawab of Bahawalpur, whose father broke away from Afghan dominance in 1838, and whose house has since been invincibly true to its Treaty engagements. Next the Sikh Raja of Jhind, a state whose troops were the first to march against the mutineers at Delhi and whose Imperial Service Infantry especially distinguished themselves in the Tirah campaign. Then came the most eminent Sikh living, the grand old Raja of Nabha, representative of a school that is fast passing away, whose name is a synonym for loyalty and honesty throughout India. Succeeded the Raja of Kapurthala, greatly given to Western travel, escorted by the blue and white lancers in the faultless turn-out which distinguishes all Kapurthala's retainers. Now came the first of the hill Chieftains, the Raja of Mandi, a Rajput of the Suket family and ruler of the lower Himalaya ranges lying between the beautiful valleys of Kangra and Kulu. The Regent of Maler Kotla paid the devoirs of this little principality, carved out by one of the adventurers who followed in the train of the Moghul invaders, and his well-turned-out escort was conspicuous by its nodding yellow plumes. Faridkot, the Sikh, was unfortunately detained in camp by fever, so Maler Kotla was followed by Chamba, a proud Rajput, whose Himalayan kingdom is tucked away at the back of Kangra Valley. Lastly came the Raja of Suket, a Rajput of the Rajputs, and ruler of some four hundred square miles of mountain territory. So they passed in turn into the presence of the Heir-Apparent, there cheerfully to render the Eastern tributes of homage and fealty. Sikh and Rajput and Afghan, they were symbols of the successive waves of invasion which made Hindustan the cockpit of Asia for centuries until the spread of the Pax Britannica brought rest to the tired land. But widely differing in race and ideals, they had this great bond in common, unswerving loyalty to their Treaty obligations and deep devotion to the Imperial Throne. Could any equally large assemblage of neighbouring chiefs be brought together in India outside Rajputana with such an unsullied history?

On Wednesday morning Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, accompanied by His Honour Sir Charles Rivaz and some members of the Royal Staff, visited the Mayo School of Art and the Museum. The party were received by the joint Principal of the School and Curator of the Museum, Mr. Percy Brown, whose few years' tenure of the double office has effected a transformation, of which he and all Lahore may feel proud. The School was empty, for the reason that the students, on whom the most difficult burdens of the public decorations had fallen at short notice, had up to the very day of the Royal arrival been toiling cheerfully day and night without cessation, and had in consequence been granted a well-deserved holiday. Nevertheless the Princess, whose interest in all things Indian is surprisingly keen, would not be denied an inspection of the empty schoolrooms, and listened with the liveliest attention while Mr. Brown expounded at length the elaborate system which he has perfected of art-training from the crudest beginnings of clumsy clay-modelling to the richest and most finished productions of ornate art. In the Museum, likewise, which Mr. Brown has gradually raised up into one of the treasure houses, not merely of the Punjab but of India, the Princess displayed the same restlessly inquiring spirit. Her Royal Highness is not merely a profound admirer, she is a diligent student of Indian art, and is bent on understanding all its wonderfully complex principles. In London she has spent many an earnest hour over the art collections in the South Kensington Museum, and it is her delight now to trace the association or dissociation of ideas as between the Western and the Eastern senses of high ornament. The most illustrious visitor who has ever honoured the Lahore Museum, the Princess was also the most gracious and the most intelligent, and the Curator must have been charmed at being able to exhibit the results of his labours to so appreciative a listener. The arts which are peculiar to the Punjab engaged the special attention of the Princess, and for a full hour a methodical examination of the whole contents of the Museum was in progress.

It was in the famous suburban gardens of Shalimar and along the miles of roadway leading thither that Lahore displayed on Wednesday night the full possibilities of its talent for illumination. Perhaps nowhere in the world is the art of lamp-decoration better understood than in India. The unit of material—the common chirag, a crude little saucer of baked clay, containing a few spoonfuls of unrefined oil and an improvised wick—would seem to an unknowing stranger about as hopeless a foundation as could easily be thought of. It is multiplication that works the miracle. A single chirag, however it be regarded, is always and everywhere a thing of ugliness. A hundred thousand chirags, ranged and ordered upon patterns such as only Indian brains can weave, make a vision of loveliness that no artist's dream ever transcended. Optically speaking reflection is but a two-fold effect: water-reflection, managed by Indian illuminators is a hundred-fold effect. So was it at beautiful Shalimar with the artificial ponds and ducts and fountains.

To start at the starting-point of the fête, one must bestow a word upon the route. Throughout a length of fully four miles the roadway was brightly lit with acetylene lamps and hanging lanterns. Herealong the main idea was not poetic beauty but sheer lustre—a parade of joyful light-jets to turn night into day upon the Royal path. The gardens being at last reached, after a sharply cold drive through an endless seeming avenue of plain luminosity, the main porch was seen to be decorated with chirags arranged in various ornamental conceits surrounding the single word of fire "Welcome." This was a gay enough preface, but once the porchway was passed and the garden entered, the vast blaze of light falling upon the eye from every quarter, with shimmering reflection from the rippled ponds, brought every corner to a momentary standstill, spell-bound by very delight. Whichever way one turned one's gaze some new design, some different shape, some original triumph of light, encountered it and held it ravished. And yet it was only the humble chirag multiplied upon itself unto incalculable myriads. Every pathway was thus picked out. Every separate structure was thus outlined. Every wall, every doorway, in short every point, feature, place or part that could be converted into a carrier of light was impressed into the dazzling service and loaded to its full bearing capacity. Long serpentine scrolls of light transformed the canals into fairy rivulets and put a like blaze of fascination upon the summer-houses and the baradaris. Stars, mottoes, emblems reached up into the very sky.

As one approached the central pavilion, which was elegantly furnished for the reception of the Royal party, the blaze of light became more intense, until, reaching the edge of the upper terrace and over-looking the two lower ones, the whole effect, although intricate and bewildering, could soon be comprehended. The edge of every tank, the border of every path and the side of every canal was doubly and in places trebly outlined in chirags. Every edge, cornice, moulding and parapet of every building was traced in lines of light of all colours. Everywhere this was repeated by the reflection in the waters which were kept gently rippling by the playing of the fountains. The mango trees also, in place of fruit, bore also their burden of painted light, for every branch carried a quaint little glow-worm of a light, either dull red, blue or green, which added greatly to the mystery of the effect. Right facing the Royal pavilion, and far beyond even the reach of the lights, framed by an intense darkness, was a bold transparency of a huge Union Jack surmounted and flanked by great Prince of Wales's feathers. Apparently hanging only on to the blackness of the night beyond but connected to the earth by its reflection in the canal, it formed a fitting finish to the central avenue of light. But in the large tank immediately below the Royal pavilion was the finest set-piece of all. Floating in some mysterious manner on the surface of the water, and repeated again and again in the thousands of gentle ripples, was a representation of the Prince of Wales's feathers, outlined in light of all colours. It was flanked by two six-pointed stars, and the size of the design can be roughly gauged by the fact that it reached from side to side of this huge tank.

Just before 10 o'clock a coloured light, burned by Mr. Hallifax on the upper terrace, signalled to those below to commence the fireworks, and instantly a flight of rockets leapt into the sky, the reflections shooting down into the water and adding to the effect. This was followed by a magniificent display of fireworks of all kinds, some of weird native design, which were novel and interesting. A number of coloured balloons were also started in quick succession, and rapidly rising above the trees raced one another across the sky dropping tails of coloured fire as they went along. Blazing mottoes of all kinds suddenly lit themselves among the trees, spluttering forth loyal wishes which were seen and appreciated by all. A fusillade of bombs which echoed among the mango trees and old baradaris, and a coloured set-piece setting up a prayer for the welfare of Their Royal Highnesses, terminated the display. Long after the last visitor had departed the lakhs of chirags burned brightly in the darkness of the deserted garden, as if the whole effect awaited anxiously a visit from one of its old builders or founders to prove that in spite of its age and the vicissitudes it has undergone, the grand old Moghul garden has given the finest display of illumination that has ever been achieved during the whole of its varied and chequered history.

The following are the arrangements which have been made in connection with the Parade of Imperial Service Troops which will take place before Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at 10 A.M. on Friday, the 1st December next.

The Parade will be held on the General Parade Ground at Mian Mir. Facing the troops will be three enclosures, that in the centre being reserved for the carriages of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Northern Command, and that on the right for those of the Ruling Chiefs. The enclosure on the left will be ramped so as to afford standing room for a large number of spectators, and admission to it will be by ticket, for which, as already intimated, application should be made to Mr. A. W. J. Talbot, C.S., Civil Secretariat, Lahore.

The road leading to the parade ground via the Aitchison College will be reserved for Their Royal Highnesses, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Northern Command, and the Ruling Chiefs; and all other spectators will be required to arrive via the Jail and Mian Mir West Railway Station.

Ticket-holders will leave their carriages at a point which will be indicated by the police, and will proceed to the enclosure on foot. Their carriages will be parked in rear of the enclosure.

Ticket-holders will be required to be in their places by 9-30 A.M., after which hour no carriages will be permitted to approach the ground.

On the conclusion of the parade, Their Royal Highnesses will depart with their suites followed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Northern Command and their respective staffs. The Ruling Chiefs will then leave the ground in order of precedence, and ticket-holders are requested to remain in their enclosure until the last of these, His Highness the Raja of Suket, has departed, before which time no private carriages will be permitted to leave the park.

The necessary haste with which Lahore has decorated itself in honour of this almost unique occasion has prevented the workers from doing full justice to their resources or to their sentiments. Everyone feels that there is a thinness about the spectacle which is far from representing the true spirit of the public. But in one notable respect nothing lacks. The numerous triumphal arches are indeed triumphs of architecture and of ornament. Nothing finer will be seen anywhere throughout the Royal tour. They are not mere formless structures thrown across the roadway, whose barrenness of outline is concealed by lavish embellishment. They are edifices of true artistic design, each bearing the impress of a graceful conceit.

That these arches form a brilliant exception to the otherwisepoverty of the public decorations is due to the fact that the work was entrusted to the now highly reputed Mayo School of Art. They are the products of the brains and hands of the Principal, Mr. Percy Brown, the Vice-Principal, Bhai Ram Singh, and the students, all proud to display before the eyes of Royalty the capabilities of this sole educational centre of decadent Punjab art industries. The Prince and Princess of Wales have freely expressed their immense admiration of these highway trophies, and indeed, even if the arches stood alone, they would redeem the capital of the Punjab from reproach at this festive moment.

The first triumphal arch along the Royal route is at the entrance to the railway station. This, by exception, is the work of the School of Art: it has been constructed by the railway authorities. It is bold and massive alike in design and execution—in keeping with the severe style of the fortress-like building to which it forms the approach.

At the end of the Landa Bazaar, facing the Delhi Gate of the old city, stands a large triple arch of trellis work, clothed luxuriantly in green foliage—a manner of decoration in which the expert Punjabi excels. The structure is gay with coloured bunting, and bears a handsome motto of flowers. Framed by the centre aperture, a characteristic view of the old-fashioned Delhi Gate is here obtainable.

A little further along the route, near the Ekki Gate of the city, where the Circular Road comes into view, rises an arch of a richly decorative character, particularly striking both in design and in colour. A close view will reveal a well concealed secret: it will show that this prodigious effect is obtained by curiously simple means. Two uprights, draped in coloured cloths and surmounted by finials in the shape of Royal crowns of gold, support a panel extending the full breadth of the roadway. This panel bears in splendid letters of gold "Welcome to Lahore," and on the reverse "God Bless Their Royal Highnesses." The whole is surmounted by the Royal Arms flanked by flags; while, highest of all, waves with life and white realism the Prince of Wales's emblem, the triple feather. Flags and strings of bunting attach themselves to the sides, and, on the uprights, shields bear the Royal Arms with life and ostrich feathers. The tout ensemble constitutes a brilliant study in colour against the sombre natural hues of this part of the route.

Continuing along the Circular Road, the route leads up to another green arch near the Sheranwala Gate, similar to the arch already described in the Landa Bazaar. It bears appropriate inscriptions and, like the other, flutters strings of coloured bunting.

A little distance off the Circular Road and near the Municipal Water-works there bursts into view a splendid white edifice in the Oriental style, marking with appropriate stateliness and grace the main approach to the great encampment of the Punjab Chiefs. It is a triple arch of two storeys, surmounted by mosque-like minarets. The whole is vividly bedecked with flags and with brilliant mouldings of the Royal Arms in gold. Lines of highly coloured banners flank the arch on either side, supported on poles which demarcate the outer confines of this vast enclosure. Viewed from the Circular Road in full sunlight, with the white tents of the Chiefs glistening in the background, the arch with its accompaniments is perhaps the most striking object along the whole route.

As the new road through the Chiefs' Camp—levelled and metalled specially for the purpose—rejoins the Circular Road, another decorative arch raises itself aloft to demarcate the western bounds of the great enclosure. It resembles the arch outside the Ekki Gate, already described, yet is sufficiently unlike it to be distinctive and to have an individuality. Its resplendent colours contrast impressively with the melancholy trees which shade the neighbourhood, and speak a gladness that would otherwise be wholly wanting.

Near the Taxali Gate is a green arch of the same general type as those which adorn the neighbourhood of the Delhi and Sheranwala Gates.

At the approach to the Anarkali Gardens, between the Government College and the Cutchery, is another decorative arch similar to the one near the Ekki Gate, yet so far dissimilar as to be well worth an independent view. The amateur and professional photographers have been busy here, and indeed they might go far in search of a better subject for a picture.

In the Anarkali Gardens, and forming a background to the scene of Tuesday's municipal ceremony, is a green arch which—let it be specially mentioned—owes its existence to the loyal enthusiasm of the Punjab Association.

Finally, at the entrance to the Mall—Lahore's aspiring but sadly imperfect boulevard—stands a majestic structure, noble in architecture and gorgeous in decoration. It is a triple arch with a centre span of 20 feet, and with three stories, surmounted by graceful baradaris topped by domes. Above the main arch stretch in dazzling gold letters the one eloquent word "Welcome," apart from which the principal decoration is a lunette containing in coloured relief the Punjab Arms with the proper heraldic supporters and the motto Crescat a Fluvio. From this radiate Union Jacks and Royal Standards and above all wave the Prince of Wales's feathers. Capping each of the side arches, gold and gay with colour, rest the Royal Arms, while banners and bunting surround and surmount these and all other points of vantage.

Everyone has been according praise to the smart turnout of the Punjab Light Horse while on escort duty to the Prince and Princess of Wales. Occupying the place of honour in the Royal procession on the day of arrival, immediately preceding the Royal equipage, this finely drilled volunteer corps, with their handsome blue uniforms and white helmets formed the most conspicuous military feature in the pageant. The regular cavalry, though splendidly accoutred, had their appearance marred by the Wolsley helmet, an unspeakable thing in khaki which ought to be thrown, together with the atrocious "Brodrick" cap, on the Empire's rubbish-heap. The Prince of Wales, whose sharp eyes miss very little around him and whose naval sense of smartness in dress is intolerant of the least ugliness, has freely condemned this barbarous Wolsley helmet, and the whole army and lay public think with him. There is talk of re-equipping the Punjab Light Horse with this unpardonable head-gear, but happily time has not permitted the change to be completed and meanwhile the flashing white helmets of the corps, shapely and soldierly, impressed all the spectators by contrast with the mishattened regulars. Captain Powell was in command of the corps on Tuesday, and when the escort duty was over the Prince of Wales cordially shook hands with him at Government House and congratulated him on the appearance of his men.

The following telegrams, which were exchanged while the Prince and Princess of Wales were en route to Lahore from Rajputana, will be read with interest as indicating the feelings with which both sides have entered into the spirit of the present happy occasion:—

From the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab to Sir Walter Lawrence, Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales:—"The Punjab begs to offer a loyal and dutiful greeting to Their Royal Highnesses on entering this province."

From Sir Walter Lawrence to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab:—"Their Royal Highnesses direct me to send their best thanks for the kind greetings of the Punjab. They both look forward with pleasure and interest to their visit to your province."

Daily Telegraph.—It is almost a pity that the Prince is to see Udaipur at the very outset of his travels, for there is nothing else of its kind in this country, nothing else, indeed, in the world. Elsewhere in India there is magnificence, nought of human construction, vast fortresses, and jewelled suites of women's apartments, the pomp of tower and audience chamber, the ostentatious piety of marble mosque and gilt-roofed temple, or the works of that grim and austere faith which was content to burrow out dark Cyclopean halls in the living rock, and worship three hundred feet below the grasses wilting in the sun on the mountain side. But alone at Udaipur is there in its perfection the fairy palace of one's childhood, just such a long cataract of marble terraces and halls falling into the waters of a mountain-encircled lake, as the illustrator of an Andrew Lang fairy book delights to draw. And Udaipur is this, and yet this is not all. The lord of all this white marble, blue water, and attendant hills has no equal in India. It is true that the State of Mewar, over which he rules, is neither the largest nor the richest even among his kith and kin of Rajputana. Strategically Udaipur is a backwater; moreover, it contains no such holy spots as half a dozen other principalities may claim; it is only within the last ten years that a railway has enabled a traveller to visit it in comparative comfort; the Government of India has never been caused a pang of anxiety by anything that has ever taken place within the borders of the State. Yet Udaipur stands alone and unrivalled in India by virtue of India's most characteristic and iron-bound law. Were free election to be made to-morrow among the native competitors for the kingship of India, no one except, perhaps, the Nizam, would dare stand against the Maharana of Udaipur. For he is the two hundred and fortieth descendant in right line from the Sun, primate and pontifex secular among all who hold the Hindu faith. From a hundred walls looks down the Rana's emblem—gules, the Sun in his splendour, or. Timidly do even the haughtiest claim kinship with him. Once upon a time the great Jang Bahadur sent down 27,000 maunds to the relief of his famine-stricken "cousins" in Rajputana. The word "cousin" is vague enough in Hindostan, and the gift was accepted. Had the Maharana known that Nepal was using his celestial insignia it would have been rejected, for even the difference between the sun and the moon is not as great as that between suraj and chandar in this genealogy.

But Udaipur would remain princess among the cities of India were it a bunnia or a sweeper caste which reigned beside the Pichola lake. Walls, indeed, and a grim bastioned gateway or two, a vast and blood-stained record of gallantry, and a warlike tradition—that still finds its echo in the tulwar which every man carries in his hand to this day, even though he doubles it up with an umbrella—all these are here, plain to see, and yet Udaipur remains dainty and feminine, as is no other city in hither or farther India. She is approached wearily. Even now the train from Chitorgarh labours along the bare, rising plains of Rajputana, with a heat and a dust and a tardiness which are no unfit substitutes for those brambles and spines which have of old always beset the palace of a sleeping princess. Few there are to turn aside from the beaten track of India's indicated sights to visit Udaipur—yet Udaipur is worth many another tourist resort. She lies remote and unhackneyed, hedged about with plains upon plains, in which the only colour is that of a jay's wing or a blue convolvulus draping a dead thorn bush; all else is grey, dun, rusty, and clogged. The cactus hedges stand up between plot and plot too straight and smooth to catch the trailing dust as deeply as the other vegetation. But at last the railway station, respectfully distant from the city walls, is reached, and after a couple of miles along the road the dāk bungalow beside the walls also.

There are many things that are worth a visit in Udaipur, but the lake is the first and final attraction. It is almost a pity to go over the palace. Nothing could ever come up to the exquisite suggestion of its outside, and that, because its landward side is choked with mean houses, is to be seen only from the island-dotted waters of Pichola. Of these islands Jag Mandar and Jag Nwas are the most important. Both are almost entirely covered with white marble summer palaces, over which a few tall palms and vivid bananas lift themselves from the cloistered gardens inside. From both there is to be had a view of the Sun-child's palace which explains the attention and lavish expense which they have enjoyed at the hands of the children of the sun. There is a terrace on Jag Mandar—just above the steps upon which the clear water dances transparently and the alligators sometimes come—from which the huge building is seen at its best. Tier above tier the snowy walls and terraces rise from the very ripples of the lake, where under the wind their reflection makes a matted tangle of white. Here and there the whiteness of the half-translucent architecture is relieved by a touch of green where a banyan or a group of acacias rises from a walled-in garden-plot, but the same quick white, of half a hundred shades and values, argent in the sun and veiled-blue in the shadows, spreads along the palace wall or points itself into the dome and pinnacle of the roof, till the upper line cuts the blue of the air, white from end to end of the thousand feet of the palace sky-line, save and except just where, at one end, an audacious and flaring bougainvillea leans in lambent magenta and olive-green over the topmost and most secluded court of all—white, white, and, from end to end, white.

You will be rowed along the river frontage, and your cicerone—whom you must have with you, as the privilege of roving about on Pichola is subject to a special permit and to this disability—will try and make you land at Jag Nwas, the second of these islet palaces. But you will be wise to refuse. Let your boatmen rather row you past Nao and Lal bathing ghats that lie northward to the dam. Here, in irregular echelons—broken by gravelled slopes, like Arjankura, down which the patient oxen come all day with the bhistics to have their leather water-skins filled; by the uncompromising square pepal-overhung terrace of a temple, from which an everlasting drum bangs, and the threshold is spotted with orange marigolds; by the blank wall of some Royal prince's residence—the marble steps which the bathers and the washers use, stretch out and stretch on for half a mile. Close under the King's Palace is the first of them, Pipli, hard by the moorings of the triple-storeyed State barges. The men bathe stolidly and alone, each one absorbed in attention to ritual. It is a religious duty with them, a matter to be carried out with exactitude and scruple, and a man will not notice you as you come near upon the water. The women chatter much in groups and wash clothes betimes; what with the clothes they have cast off and those that lie a-drying on the upper steps, they make up a rich picture in, the morning shade beneath the Temple walls. The children alone enjoy themselves and spatter and squeal and choke in the shallows. Across the way, by Hanuman's ghat, a cormorant sits expectant on a half-submerged post, and at its feet a heavy tortoise of a hundred and fifty pounds slowly turns over at water-level.

Life is good enough on the water. Nothing on the land is quite worth the trouble of going to see. Not a room in the main Palace or in the water pavilions in the lake is worth it. Within this exquisite dream of fresh white marble are rooms that must be seen to be believed. I have no hesitation in saying that one room is without rival on earth for the appalling taste displayed. It is about 40ft. by 20ft. and from the walls project low pillars and rough-edged plaster arches. The whole of the walls and arches is mustard yellow distemper. There is a deep frieze of atrocious German "della Robbia" plaques. The pillars are of the same material, each one a tublike achievement of the Fatherland. From the centre of the ceiling descends a chandelier of strange form, vast and clumsy. All the glass thereon is petunia coloured and engraved with scenes. The furniture of a pre-Victorian gilt description is upholstered in frayed magenta silk brocade. But the springs are coming through, and it will be necessary to re-cover at least the settee soon—one wonders what colour will be selected. It is a good rule never to visit the modernised rooms of an Oriental palace, but Udaipur—Udaipur, "last, loneliest, loveliest, exquisite, apart"—is perhaps the very worst example that can be found.

One turns in towards the Pipli Ghat again, and as one passes idly beneath the pepal that overhangs the bank, a flight of seven pigeons dashes out across the surface of the water to the sunset, piercing the thick leaves like a salvo of round shot, and my lord the elephant, under his crazy thatch of long grasses, takes off and eats the turban of matted fodder that has served him all day as a sun-bonnet. The walls of the palace change colour from lemon-yellow through orange to a faint rose, and thence through amethyst to a dull dead-leaden white, as the last hues die out of the sky. One has to find one's way home through the royally luxurious Darbar gardens, past the open-air wheelwright's establishment, past the tortuous and crowded lanes of gallantly-painted houses and crazy shops, till we make the great gateway, and emerge into the cold, clear evening air, and see the massive bastions and battlements of Sasnisargarh beyond the scanty lights of the dāk bungalow.

Englishman.—Again this morning the people of Lahore clustered in goodly numbers along the fine roads, which lead from the Government House to the glacis of the old Fort whereon the Punjab Chiefs are encamped. His Royal Highness was to pay return visits to those Chiefs entitled to them, and this was done with all the pomp and ceremony. Many of the Chiefs have housed themselves on a lordly scale for this great festival, and laid out their camps at much expense and in great details. Patiala, the premier State in the province, for instance, has quite a spacious enclosure with trim paths, groves of broken glass and avenues of cheap chandeliers, such as would have rejoiced the heart of the immortal Wemmick. But let these little incongruities pass. The Chiefs were determined that their temporary abodes should be in festal array, and although their designs were sometimes queer the intentions were the very best.

The rumbling of guns announced the departure of the Royal cortège from the Government House, the flashing of the lance points of the 12th Lancers, the actual approach of the Royal carriage. Outside the Patiala camp His Royal Highness, who wore full dress naval uniform, was saluted by the elephants with drummers with silver mail and with tinsel tiaras and smart lancers. Passing on to the Nawab of Bhawalpur, ablaze with Mahomedan green, by camely, whose loose breeched sowars had the impress of the desert stamped in their bearing and in feature. Jhind's camp was modestly arrayed and guarded by stalwart Sikhs in scarlet. Nabha's Lancers in eau de nil and scarlet and His Imperial Service Infantry in scarlet and yellow. Kapurthala's retainers were in the familiar blue and white and the Mandis unostentatiously paraded. All these scenes, however, have been witnessed again and again on the Royal tour, and will be repeated almost without end during the next few months. Much more interesting was it to turn from the glittering camps to the opposite side of the road close packed and smiling with the crowd, waiting in all loyal desire to see the Emperor's son. There the thin-cheeked student jostled the portly clerk. These northern people run to length and the town bred at any rate are as pale of visage as the most retired Brahmin. And the shrillness of exclamation when twenty inches of stolid British back were interposed between them and the prospective procession equalled the vehemence of hawkers quarrelling over a pice. The masters of the situation were the splendid peasants, who had left their rarely-quitted villages to gaze upon the Shazada. Burnt a deep walnut by the sun, hardened by toil, they sat in stolid silence in the front row, places gained by hours of patient waiting and wrapped in their coarse country garments and orange blankets refused to be disturbed. It will be an evil day for the Punjab if anything is allowed to check the progress of the measures designed to prevent the conversion of the peasant into a hind.

In the afternoon His Highness visited the Aitchison College, where the cadets of the ruling houses are educated and was there received in quite an informal manner. The students, numbering 68, were drawn up in the hall, and His Royal Highness spoke to many of them and inspected the rooms. The Princess of Wales meantime held a pardah party, and in the evening Their Royal Highnesses were present at the Punjab Ball at the Montgomery Hall, of which everyone in the province has been talking for weeks past.

Indian Daily News.—To-day the Prince returned the visit of seven of the Punjab Chiefs encamped near the Fort. His Royal Highness left Government House about eleven o'clock, attended by an escort of the 12th Lancers, and occupied until close upon one o'clock in paying the ceremonious visits to each of the Chiefs in accordance with the order of precedence. The Prince wore a General's undress uniform, and the usual ceremonies were observed at the reception of the Prince by the Chiefs. The camps are most elaborately laid out, but the palm for splendour and lavish display must be conceded to the camp of the Maharaja of Patiala, to whom the first visit was paid. The interior of the Durbar tent was a blaze of the brightest silks and cloth of gold. Two golden thrones, richly encrusted with jewels, were placed upon a dais of cloth of gold, and covered by gold embroidered umbrellas, and gold and silver chairs were ranged on each side of the tent for Durbaris and the Royal suite. Bronze busts of the Prince and Princess were placed on small tables beside the thrones, and portraits of the King and Queen, the Maharaja and his ancestors were hung about the tent. Gold and silver howdahs and huge chandeliers adorned the entrance to the outer pavilion. The site of the camp was laid out as an ornamental garden, with numerous devices of welcome, and fountains playing, the bright decorations and numbers of coloured lamps for illuminations completed a very brilliant picture. On the road opposite to the camp, were transparencies showing the devices picked out, in lamps of "The premier Sikh State salutes the Emperor's son: God bless the Emperor of India, the father of his people," and "A loyal and hearty welcome." State elephants, camels, horses, and equipages lined the roads in front of each camp along with the troops of each Chief, and large numbers of people viewed the arrival and departure of His Royal Highness. At the conclusion of the visits, the Prince drove through the city en route to Government House, the road being thickly lined by natives.

There is much of a striking and remarkable character in the camps of the Chiefs whom the Prince visited to-day. Though on a smaller scale, the arrangement and display recalled the splendours of the camp of the Native Rulers at the Delhi Coronation Durbar. Many of the features then seen were here again, as for instance the Raja of Nabha's elephant with his tusks decorated with candelabra and wax candles, and the same Chief's hawks, hawkers and hounds. Amid the magnificence of the Maharaja of Patiala's camp with its well laid out pleasures, fountains and summer house of solid silver, and the display of jewels of gold and silver by the Maharaja and his Court, the figure of a dwarf attracted attention. Unlike most human freaks of this type, though only about three feet high he was proportioned accordingly and looked like a very small boy, though he was said to be about fifty years of age. He has been recently taken into the retinue of the Maharaja, having been picked up in the street. The display of elephants with gold and silver howdahs, jhools heavily embroidered with gold, and chains and frontlets of precious metals, of camels and chargers in the richest trappings, of state carriages of gold and silver, and the contingents of the Imperial Service Troops, was most imposing, and the brilliant array of decorated animals and men in front of the camp where each Chief had raised his banner made a complete picture of animated colour difficult to describe. On his return to Government House quietly the Prince remained until half-past one when he drove out and paid an informal visit to the Aitchison Chiefs' College. He was received by the Principal and staff and conducted through the institution. Many old students of the college were present in honour of the occasion.

To-night the Punjab Ball is being held at Montgomery Hall.

Madras Mail.—It has been pointed out to me that one of the things, which is said to have pleased the Princess of Wales most in Bombay, was her reception by the native ladies. We are only humble folks in Bangalore, but could not something in the way of bouquet presentation by young Hindu girls be worked into the arrangements? It will not be our feeble efforts in the way of decoration which will please Their Royal Highnesses (although these are highly desirable from a point of view mentioned the other day), but the genuine, spontaneous appreciation which is shown by the Hindu community of the honour done to all the country by the Royal Visit. It is the affection of the people they would wish to gain.

His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore has ordered a special medal to be struck to commemorate the Royal Visit, and this will be annually awarded to the person sending the best collection of flower plants to the Horticultural Shows.

The weather is growing sensibly colder at night, although not equalling the cold wave which passed over us about a month ago. In the day, too, the sun has considerably less power.

Pioneer.—To-day certain set official functions had to be discharged by the Prince. These were the reception of visits from the Ruling Chiefs now here. The Raja of Faridkot has been unable to come to Lahore and hence His Royal Highness received nine instead of ten Chiefs. Two hours were spent in this pleasant duty, each visit lasting a quarter of an hour. The public were fully aware of the morning's programme and there was a great gathering of spectators at Charing Cross, where the Chiefs and their Sardars or attendants, with escorts of cavalry, fourteen strong in the case of the Maharaja of Patiala and Nawab of Bahawalpur and nine with each other Chief, could be seen to the best advantage as they passed on their way. They made a brave show, but it seems unnecessary to dwell yet again on the gorgeous dresses and richly-bedizened State carriages, so often have these been referred to in the course of the tour. The spectators had their fill of gazing at the equipages and their owners, but the native crowd was not large, though some sightseers had come out of the City. The Mall and other roads were still gay in all their decorations, as indeed they will remain until the Royal party leaves on Friday, and thus a holiday air was given to the proceedings, quite in keeping with their general surroundings. From 11 to 1 o'clock there was quite a lively passage of small corteges, one succeeding another every fifteen minutes, and salutes marked the arrival of each Chief at Government House, 115 rounds in all having to be fired by the artillery.

The Chiefs who paid visits were the Maharaja of Patiala, Nawab of Bahawalpur, Rajas of Jhind, Nabha, Kapurthala, and Mandi, the Regent of Maler Kotla, and the Rajas of Chamba and Suket. The ceremonial in each instance was the same. The Guard-of-Honour at Government House presented arms as a Chief, with his Sardars, arrived. The Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government conducted him to the Prince's presence and His Royal Highness advanced half way from the customary dais and conducted him to a seat thereon placing him on his right hand. Then followed the seating of the Sardars and officers as were present, the presentation of a nazar, touched and remitted in the usual way, a short conversation and the presentation of the Sardars. Every point of etiquette was most scrupulously observed, and when the interview came to an end the Prince himself presented itr and pan to the Chief, while members of the Royal Staff followed a similar course with the Sardars. A band played selections of music during the ceremonial. The young Maharaja of Patiala, with his uncle, the Kunwar Sahib and Council of Regency, was the first visitor as the premier Chief in the Punjab. The Nawab of Bahawalpur came second and the venerable Raja of Nabha, a distinctive figure, was third. The remainder were as in the order given above. The Prince thus made the personal acquaintance of the Chiefs, whom he saw for a few moments only seated in carriages outside their camps, and he can perhaps understand the types that thus came under his notice. They represent the Sikh, Mahomedan and Hindu races, the Phulkian States bulking largest of course in this representation. They range in age from the fourteen years of the Maharaja of Patiala to the sixty-two of the Raja of Nabha. The Nawab of Bahawalpur and the Raja of Mandi are only twenty-two years old, the Regent of Maler Kotla is but twenty-four, and the Raja of Jhind twenty-six. The majority are therefore young men on the threshold of life and their careers are only beginning. One can only wish that they may attain the ripe age and wisdom of the Raja of Nabha.

With the exception of the above ceremonial the day has been a restful one, and the Prince seems to have shaken off the slight indisposition which affected him in Bikanir. His Royal Highness is not, however, attending the illuminations at the Shalimar Gardens as the nights here are very cold. The Princess this afternoon visited the Lady Aitchison Hospital, which does such excellent work here in connection with the Lady Dufferin Association.

The illuminations at Shalimar last night attracted enormous crowds. The whole road from Government House was lighted up and thus for four miles there was a luminous avenue which terminated in a brilliant display at Shalimar, where the gardens and ornamental water were beautifully illuminated. Shalimar has never been seen so admirably and artistically picked out in light, and the spectators thoroughly enjoyed the splendid scene presented to them.

Times of India.—A sum of over seven lakhs has been subscribed to the Medical College scheme to commemorate the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to the United Provinces. The project has met with liberal support from all classes and it is hoped to obtain the remaining three lakhs required in time to enable Sir James LaTouche to ask the Prince to lay the foundation-stone with the financial position of the College already assured.

The site selected for the building is an elevated one near the heart of the city.

Civil and Military Gazette, 2ND DECEMBER 1905.—An immense gratification was afforded to the native inhabitants of the crowded old city of Lahore on Thursday morning when the Prince of Wales drove right through the very heart of the ancient labyrinthine bazaars. This remarkable expedition was arranged to follow His Royal Highness's return visits to the principal native Chiefs and was dovetailed into the long drive back to Government House. Mr. A. H. Diack, Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, whose knowledge of old Lahore leaves little to be added, was with the Prince, and in the capacity of guide was able to enhance the exceeding interest of the outing. First the Royal party—a procession of five carriages—drove to the Fort and examined its many archaeological delights. Entering the Shish Mahal they were able to admire from aloft the far-spreading landscape of garden and forest, road and river, field and plain, palace and tenement which constitutes the panoramic charm sought by every visitor. In the foreground on one side stood out in bold relief the huge pile of the Jumma Masjid and the exquisite mausoleum of Ranjit Singh, while beneath the bird's-eye gaze of the visitors in the other direction extended the mazy, crazy streets of the wonderful old city. The subsequent drive through the city was past the Sonari Mosque and Wazir Khan's famous mosque and through the Landa Bazaar to the Empress Road. Packed to their last limits with delighted women and children were the flat roofs of all the city dwellings. Thronged to almost impassability by enthusiastic men were the streets and the doorways and the shop fronts and the balconies. There was no mistaking the sentiments of the masses. The Prince encountered such greetings as only the sincerest warmth of feeling could have inspired. His Royal Highness made no attempt to conceal the pleasure which the overwhelming cordiality of the multitude afforded to him, and it would have been difficult at that glad moment to decide who looked the happier—the Prince or the people.

The long-anticipated Punjab Ball—when the guests were to have the honour of meeting Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales—took place on Thursday night in Montgomery Hall. The great hall had been beautifully decorated for the occasion. At the staircase end, between the two flights which lead to the gallery, a pale-blue canopy was placed, beneath which stood chairs for the use of the Royal party. Shields and other trophies hung on the walls, and in a variety of ways the spacious dancing-room, which even in its every-day garb is an imposing chamber, was made to look bright and gay as well.

The hall was well-filled at the hour of Their Royal Highnesses's entrance. Both sides of the staircase were packed with visitors anxious to get a good view of the State Lancers, the galleries were also thronged. The Prince and Princess, the former wearing the Ribbon of the Garter and the latter a diamond tiara in her hair, dressed in pale mauve—entered from the doors facing the staircase and passed first between a guard of honour of Sergeants of the 12th Lancers and then on up the centre of the room between a double line of visitors to the canopy.

As usual on such occasions, the programme opened with the State Lancers. The Prince danced with Lady Blood, while the Princess had for her partner the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Charles Rivaz. Others in the set were Sir William and Lady Clark, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Reid, Mr. Justice Robertson, the Countess of Shaftesbury, Lady Grizel Hamilton and Major-General Walter Kitchener. The State Lancers over, dancing became general not only in Montgomery Hall, but in the adjacent Lawrence Hall, and was kept up till a late hour. At 11-30 the Prince and Princess and a small party adjourned to the supper-room.

How many were present it is difficult to estimate. The Railway Company's arrangements for special trains to and from Rawalpindi seem to have given entire satisfaction, and a large number availed themselves of the opportunity thus offered.

Daily Telegraph.—The Prince of Wales terminates his visit to the capital of the Punjab to-night, and by dawn to-morrow will be within sight of the blue, distant Himalayas, along whose crests the famous North-West Frontier runs.

To-day's most picturesque event was the review of 2,500 Imperial Service troops. The turn-out of all ranks was satisfactory, but the two events evoking most interest were the sight of the young Patiala Raja leading his men past the Prince, and that of the Venerable Maharaja of Nabha, with flowing white beard, certainly one of the most popular figures in India.

Except that the proposed programme for Their Royal Highnesses was far too long, and had to be somewhat curtailed, and except that the decorations of Lahore seemed in many places designed to conceal rather than to set off the natural beauties of the city, native and European alike, the visit of the Prince and Princess has given the greatest satisfaction to the vast population of this most important old capital and modern commercial centre of the Punjab.

Englishman.—Although it is only the beginning of December these Northern India mornings break raw and cold, consequently it was not until ten o'clock when the air was pleasantly warmed by the sun that the Prince of Wales arrived on the parade ground at Mian Mir to inspect the Punjab Imperial Service Troops. But for a full two hours before then the long dusty road which leads to the great cantonment was alive with all sorts and conditions of men and women hastening to witness the military display. As the hour for the arrival of His Royal Highness approached gangs of bhisties sprinkled the dusty highway, but the innumerable particles which clogged the nostrils and bit the throat were a foretaste of what is in for everyone at Pindi when forty thousand horse and foot are marshalled before the Heir-Apparent and Lord Kitchener of Khartoum a few days hence.

The spectacle at Mian Mir would, however, have repaid twice the trouble of going there. The parade ground is not exactly lovely but so entirely a bit of British India that one would not have it changed even to beautify it. There were the yellow dusty maidan, the big trees beyond the cloudless sky disfigured only by the smoke which hung over Lahore like a pall, the splash of scarlet where the West Yorkshires lined the route, the straight roads and the cluster of brilliant uniforms and summer frocks near the saluting point. All this has a sense of familiarity to the Anglo-Indian which brings home a realisation of the strength of his position and which he would not barter for things far more æsthetically attractive. Then the centre of the maidan was streaked with the serried array of these valorous troops the Punjab Chiefs have delighted to perfectly equip and organise, so that they may worthily take their place with the regular soldiers of the King-Emperor when the hour of trial arises.

On the right of the line, in pride of place, stood the Patiala Rajinder Lancers, a splendid body of men, five hundred strong, and splendidly mounted. The oldest of the regiments present, they are entitled to place Delhi on their colours and fought with Lord Roberts in Afghanistan. Next the Camel Corps of the Nawab of Bahawalpur on their straggling beasts, meet their comrades of the camelry which His Royal Highness saw much of during his stay at Bikanir. More modest but certainly not less useful stood the company of the Sirmur Sappers from Nahan Esma hill, the Rajputs, Ghurkhas and Mohamedans, distinguished by their gallant services on the Punjab Frontier. The Maler Kotla Sappers can already show Punjab Frontier and Tirah on their colours, although they were raised only twelve years ago, and can point to good service under each one of these heads. The Faridkot Sappers raised only five years ago, and composed of Sikhs, stood between Maler Kotla and the first and second Patiala Rajinder Sikh Infantry. Two regiments, each 500 strong, almost entirely composed of Sikhs, these yielded the palm to none on the ground, and it must have made young Patiala's bosom swell with pride as he gazed upon the five-hundred Lances and thousand trusty bayonets which he holds at the service of the Raj.

Now came the five hundred Jhind Infantry all Sikhs, with the exception of one company of Mussalmans, who fought with distinction in the Frontier War of 1897, five hundred of the fine old Maharajah of Nabha's foot and the five hundred Kapurthala foot, who served so well in the same year. Who does not remember the story of the Kapurthala picquet, a memorable episode, even in that campaign of brave deeds. How thirty-five of these gallant Sikhs, under Subadar Dewa Singh, mistaking their road found themselves in a ravine with only one exit which the tribesmen had carefully blocked. Then assailed in the cold of the November dawn by a shower of bullets they fought stubbornly till only six were left alive. Down came the Chamkhanis hoping to capture the scanty remnant, but standing shoulder to shoulder they refused to surrender and all were slain. The troops paraded this morning represented a contribution to the Empire's fighting force of nearly four thousand officers and men.

Punctually at the hour appointed, Her Royal Highness drove to the saluting point accompanied by Sir Charles Rivaz and a few minutes later the Prince in the undress uniform of a British General and bestriding a fine bay, galloped on to the ground followed by his staff, halting for a moment to receive the salute, he rode slowly along the long line, Her Royal Highness following in the State carriage, and the inspection over both the Prince and Princess took up their positions at the saluting point. And a goodly sight it was, first came the gallant Lancers in green and yellow, with gleaming lance points and dancing pennons. Then the Bahawalpur Camelry in the drab uniform, which is scarcely distinguishable from the colour of the camel of the plain, keeping an excellent line considering the stupidity of their mounts. Swinging along with easy stride followed the Sappers with the mule trains, carrying their tools and implements, the Sirmur and Maler Kotla in scarlet and the Faridkot in khaki. A couple of hundred yards from the saluting point each Chief rode out to lead past his troops, Patiala, a born horseman in mufti and Maler Kotla in uniform. Patiala now returned to the head of his footmen, grand stern strong men in green and yellow, their shining quoits flashing in the sun. Jhind also rode out to his regiment, wearing the scarlet and white of the State forces and the grand old Maharajah of Nabha, a simple dignified figure, in white with a splash of scarlet, riding a superb dark bay. The fine Kapurthala Infantry led by the Maharajah in uniform and faultlessly equipped in blue and white, brought up the rear. A gallant sight indeed, but marred by one circumstance, the awful dust which despite careful watering, rolled up in clouds enveloping everything in a tawny haze.

Out rushed a swarm of bhisties deftly besprinkling the dust and then the Infantry swung back in quarter column, bayonets flashing and the Patiala Sikhs shouting their guttural war cry as they passed. The dust fiend was scotched, but a moment later he rose in his wrath and conquered the whole situation. For now the Infantry were marched off to form in line and await the advance in review order, whilst the camelry and horse went by at the trot. The camelry in excellent order raised dust enough, but when two thousand hoofs bit into the earth, it rolled away in gigantic clouds enveloping horse and rider in a murky haze and powdering both thickly with yellow. One great climax was in store. The camelry bobbed away and Patiala's horse rushed up at a gallop. A shrill whistle and the gallop broke into the charge. Hell for leather swept past these splendid horsemen till the air was filled with the thud of twice a thousand hoofs. Through the thickening haze, you could dimly discern the lances and the pennons, the straining horses and the stern set faces of this warrior race in splendid line, until in a few seconds all were swallowed up in a fog as thick as a "London particular." An involuntary bravo or shabdash broke from every throat, a fit tribute to men who rode like disciplined centaurs with the lust of battle in their eyes. There remained but the advance in review order, which was led by Colonel Drummond, Inspector-General of the Imperial Service Troops, and the Royal salute.

Their Royal Highnesses drove away, the troops marched to the camp, the spectators dispersed. What was it we had witnessed? Fine fighting men of India's warrior races, well equipped, well disciplined, well led, pass in ordered array before the Heir to the Imperial Throne. Yes, but that could be paralleled at a few hours' notice in every big military station in India. What we really saw were the representatives of the twenty-thousand fighting men, horse and foot, camelry, and Sappers and Transport train, which the great feudatories hold at the disposal of the Raj, for the defence of their common fatherland. And if we would understand what that means, let us cast our memories back to those days in the early eighties, when war across the Northern Frontier appeared inevitable. In their loyalty to the Imperial Throne India's Chiefs placed all their reservists at the disposal of the Raj, but what had they to offer? Men in motely ill-kept, ill-drilled, ill-led, ill-conditioned, not even food for cannon, mere encumbrances on the face of the earth. When we contrast such splendid fighting men as were arrayed to-day with the ragtag and bobtail, which still cumber many native courts, let us not forget the great Viceroy Lord Dufferin, who inspired the Chiefs with the desire seriously to co-operate with the Raj in the defence of Hindustan, the loyalty of the Chiefs, who as a free gift, have added nearly an army corps to the fighting force of the Empire, or the men like General Stuart Beaton and Sir Howard Mellis, who made the Imperial Service Troops the fine fighting force they are to-day. Nor let us ever forget that this is a free gift not a levy, and that if in an impatient desire for uniformity the constitution of the force is altered and thereby susceptibilities which have every claim to be considered are offended, the least mischief caused will be to check the growth of a movement which will ultimately bring all the armed forces of the native states up to the Imperial Service standard.

In the afternoon there was a delightful garden party in the grounds of Government House, where Lady Rivaz was "At Home," and after a quiet dinner Their Royal Highnesses departed for Peshawar. The great social event of the visit, the Punjab Ball, however, deserves more than the scant mention made yesterday, for it was a triumph of careful organisation. The fine Montgomery Hall, which has recently been artistically re-decorated, was hung with festoons of scarlet pompoms, pendant from two graceful coronets and gay with grouped lances. The colour scheme for the supper marquee was the daring one of dark-red with strings of pompoms and was entirely successful. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at ten o'clock, danced the State Lancers and remained until after supper. The Prince wore evening dress with the ribbon of the Star of India, and the Princess, a stately figure indeed, in a splendid gown of rose colour velvet and a magnificent collar and tiara of diamonds. Amongst those who joined in the State Lancers were the Prince and Lady Bindon Blood, the Princess and Sir Charles Rivaz, Sir Bindon Blood and Lady Clark, the Honourable Mr. Justice Robertson and Lady Violet Crawley, Sir Charles Tupper and Lady Grizel Hamilton, Sir W. Clark and the Honourable Mrs. Eastwood, Mr. Reid and Lady Shaftesbury, General Walter Kitchener and Mrs. Reid. The general company numbered over eight hundred, and the ball room was the gayest of scenes, with the varied uniforms and smart frocks. Whilst there were many helpers the success of the ball was mainly due to Captain and Mrs. Irwin.

The Royal tour is yet young, and perhaps a little plain speaking now may save waste of energy and disappointment hereafter. And this is a convenient opportunity for saying it, because Lahore is a conspicuous example of those mistakes which other towns will do well to avoid. Is it necessary to say that with the traditional desire of their house scrupulously to observe their State duties, Their Royal Highnesses have but human endurance after all. The Lahore programme was drawn up with an extraordinary disregard of this circumstance. Arriving after a fatiguing journey from Bikanir, the Prince of Wales had three important engagements on the first day. On the second day the Prince's programme opened at 8 A.M., and was continued throughout the day till after dinner. It was obviously impossible that such a programme could be literally adhered to. Again, in the matter of street decoration most of the towns hitherto visited have been examples of what to avoid, but Lahore must be awarded the palm. In its ordinary garb it is a fine handsome city. To hang feeble strings of grubby bunting and newspaper contents bills along the splendid mall was an outrage only equalled by the perpetration of a like offence in the picturesque streets of the native town, and it is a blunt fact that the principal effect of the street decorations was to disfigure the natural beauties of the city. From which example other towns may profit.

Illustrated London News.—"The Prince's programme for the past week included a tiger-shoot in Jaipur, where His Royal Highness bagged his first tiger on November 22nd. On the following day he went out again, but failed to get any sport; and in the evening he left for Bikanir, where he arrived on the following morning. The Prince and Princess were received by the Maharaja, and were escorted to the New Palace along a route that was guarded in part by the Bikanir Camel Corps, which distinguished itself in Somaliland. The Bikanir visit was largely devoted to sport, and after the ceremonial visit the Royal party went into camp at Gujner, about twenty-five miles out of the town. There the Prince had some excellent grouse-shooting, and on the first day his bag numbered 207 birds, the Maharaja making the next best bag with 109. On the evening of the 27th Their Royal Highnesses left for Lahore.

In 1849 the city of Lahore, which had been a Royal or imperial capital for two thousand years, became the seat of our Government in the Punjab, and it continues to hold that position. Although it has greatly increased in population and material prosperity, Lahore is no longer the picturesque city that it was in the time of the Sikh rule, which immediately preceded our own. It was the centre of their civil power while Amritsar was their religious capital, and opinions differed as to which was the more picturesque. Surrounded by the ruined monuments and tombs of its earlier kings of the Lodi and later Mogul and Afghan kings, with fortifications that were regarded as formidable before the introduction of heavy artillery, and above whose lofty crenellated walls appeared the pinnacles of loftier columns and minarets, Lahore never failed to attract the admiration of the foreigner who saw it for the first time. In the days of the Sikhs the picturesqueness of the city was enhanced by the striking and varied displays of military power in which their rulers loved to indulge. The effect of barbaric splendour, martial ardour, and the employment of appurtenances of warfare that dated from the Crusades, left an enduring impression of magnificence and chivalry on the mind that time did not efface, and which Massenet has turned to good purpose in his Roi de Lahore. Our material civilisation can offer no equivalent to the processions of Ranjit and Lal Singhs. Khaki-clad soldiers will not compare in effect with knights in chain-armour; the modern field-battery is not as striking to the crowd as the famous Zamzama gun, which was supposed to command victory. Lahore was the capital of Ranjit Singh, "the lion of the Punjab," and his beautiful tomb, with its domes and minarets, is the principal and best preserved monument in the city.

Bikanir, in the desert that forms the north-west region of Rajputana, is a very prosperous State considering the character of the soil, which is chiefly sand, and its remoteness from the main lines of communication in India. Much of this prosperity is due to the close attention to his duties and to the great personal energy of the Maharaja, who is one of the youngest and most promising of all the ruling Princes of India. He has only occupied his throne for seven years, and he was very young at the time of his installation, but he has succeeded in accomplishing much excellent work during that period. During the famine of 1900 it was due to his organisation and unremitting efforts that the suffering in Bikanir was reduced to a minimum. The Maharaja is in spirit as well as by profession—for he holds the rank of Major in the British Army—a soldier. The Indian Government has not been backward in showing its appreciation of a Prince who is a model to his peers in every State of the peninsula. For his work in the famine he received the Kaisar-i-Hind Medal of the first class, for his services in China he was made a Knight of the Indian Empire Order, and in token of gratitude for the services of his corps—which he wished to lead personally—in Somaliland, he was created a Knight Commander of the Star of India. He was one of the two chiefs selected to represent Rajputana at the King's Coronation, and during his visit here he received the appointment of Aide-de-Camp to the Prince of Wales. These military appointments are well deserved, for he is "every inch a soldier." But he is also a politician and a practical economist of singular ability, as is proved by the prosperity of his subjects. These numbered at the census of 1891 over fifty-six thousand persons. The Maharaja is a wonderful combination of the finest qualities of West and East.

Indian Daily News.—In conformity with a resolution passed at their meeting of Thursday last, the Marwari Association will celebrate the auspicious visit of Their Royal Highnesses The Prince and Princess of Wales to Calcutta by suitably illuminating their premises in Harrison Road (Calcutta) on the night of the 3rd January next. Every endeavour will also be made that the houses belonging to Marwaris in Bara Bazar and specially those in Harrison Road, from Chitpur Road junction to the Strand, along which the Royal procession will pass that night, will be beautifully illuminated. A procession of the members of the Association and other Marwari gentlemen will start from the Association house and proceed to the temple of Satyanarainji to offer prayers for the long life and prosperity of the Royal visitors. The arrangements have been left in the hands of a Committee formed for the purpose.

Lady's Pictorial.—The Prince and Princess of Wales are travelling much in India in the luxurious but inevitably wearying way inseparable from such extended journeys in any country. Their Royal Highnesses are said to be immensely interested in everything. The Prince, having been in India before, points out salient points in the character of the country to the Princess. He has had some shooting and won great admiration from the native attendants by the accuracy of his aim with the rifle and by his sportsmanlike keenness. The Princess finds everything novel and absorbing. Her Royal Highness is delighted with India; the symbolism of the East appeals to her imagination. Her Royal Highness has always been a great reader, and appreciates keenly poetic imagery such as she is now steeped in. The nature of each ceremony is carefully explained to her and always quickly appreciated. Her dignified but gracious bearing is much admired by the Indian ladies and princesses. Our Princess is quiet, and thinks much, but never acts on impulse. The Eastern ladies like this, as they are themselves very quiet. The Princess has what they lack, however, determination and plenty of power. They describe her as firm as iron, gentle as dew, and bright as a sunbeam. Very bright and interested has she shown herself since landing in the Eastern Empire.

Pioneer.—The Prince of Wales was driven to the Fort, close at hand, where he examined the historical buildings with great interest and was particularly observant of the armoury. The Sish Mahal, which Shah Jehan and Aurangzeb built, was an object of much admiration. The view which was shown to the Prince from a commanding height is one of the most impressive kind and the architecture and grouping of the various fine structures did not fail to win his full appreciation. Thereafter His Royal Highness drove through the City and was given a most enthusiastic reception by the people who acclaimed him all along the route. The streets were crowded, while housetops, windows and balconies showed thousands of spectators of whom very many were women. This visit to the City was not in the original programme, and it was a most happy idea to have arranged it later at the Lieutenant-Governor's suggestion. Lahore swarms with life, its old-fashioned streets are very picturesque, and to-day the whole population seemed bent on giving the Prince an even more demonstrative welcome than when they greeted him on his passage outside the walls last Tuesday. His Royal Highness was immensely pleased with his drive and of the glimpses of the City and its life which were afforded him.

In the afternoon the Prince, attended by some members of his suite, paid an informal visit to the Aitchison Chiefs' College. This was not a public function.

The Princess of Wales, accompanied by Sir Charles Rivaz and some members of the suite visited the Mayo School of Art and the Museum yesterday. Mr. Percy Brown, Principal and Curator, showed the party over the two institutions and briefly explained everything of interest. Her Royal Highness was deeply interested in everything relating to the Arts of the Punjab, for she has that cultivated artistic taste which can understand and appreciate the finest qualities of work and methods which lead up to its production. The contents of the Museum were closely examined and the Princess greatly enjoyed her visit.

In the afternoon Lady Rivaz gave a purdah party at Government House, between forty and fifty native ladies of position having the honour of being presented to the Princess of Wales. It was a pleasant and successful gathering.

Saturday Review.—The Prince's progress in India has brought him from Rajputana into the Punjab. No more striking instance of the political importance of the Prince's visit can be found than in the announcement that it will bring the Tashi Lama of Tibet down to India to meet the Her-Apparent. For this event no precedent can be found and its significance can scarcely be over-estimated in spiritual authority the Tashi Lama of Shigatsi stood even above the Dalai Lama of Lhasa, since whose slight his pre-eminence is unquestioned and his influence as the recognised head of the Buddhist Church becomes paramount. His attitude towards the British Government has always been friendly. It must be strengthened by an experience which will disclose to him the richness and power of India, a fabulous vision to one who has spent his life on the bleak and sterile plateau of Tibet, with its poor and sparse population.

The Prince's visit to Jaipur gives particular interest to an addition just made to the Calcutta Art Gallery. The state entry thirty years ago into Jaipur of the King as Prince of Wales was painted by Verestehagin, the Russian artist who went down with Admiral Makaroff's flagship at Port Arthur. Verestehagin was much impressed by the scene in Jaipur and reproduced it in an immense painting which was exhibited in Europe, and then taken to the United States, where it was purchased by an American. The Maharaja of Jaipur subsequently purchased it and it was presented by him to the Queen Victoria Memorial at Calcutta, where it will be placed after the great building has been opened by the Prince of Wales.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL, FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 2ND DECEMBER 1905.

Hindu Ranjika.—The Hindu Ranjika (Calcutta) of the 22nd November publishes a poem in which the writer says that on the occasion of the Prince and Princess of Wales's visit to Bengal, a sight of both joy and sorrow should be presented to Their Royal Highnesses's view—joy for their visit and sorrow for the partition of Bengal. Houses should be partly illuminated and partly left dark. Flags should be hoisted, painted red on one side and black on the other. Bad men will try to convince the Prince that the Bengalis are disloyal, but it is hoped that the superior intelligence of His Royal Highness will prevent him from believing any such thing. Let the Prince see with his own eyes the miserable condition to which the Indian people have been reduced by official oppression and illegalities. One word from the Prince's mouth can undo all the works of a hundred Curzons.

Hitavarta.—The Hitavarta (Calcutta) of the 26th November is glad to hear that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has ordered the discharge of the Bhisti (water-carrier) who was arrested by the police for obstructing the Royal passage at Bombay.

Sandhya.—Referring to the proposal that the Princess of Wales should be received at Belvedere by pardanashin Bengali ladies the Sandhya (Calcutta) says that so long as the Commission of Burdwan will remain intact and the high officials under Sir Andrew Fraser will remain in office and so long as the country will have fibru (?) Rajas, there will be no lack of pardanashin Bengali ladies to show the highest form of loyalty at Belvedere.

PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 2ND DECEMBER 1905.

Kesari, 28TH NOVEMBER 1905.—The Prince and Princess of Wales, after having visited Udaipur and Jaipur, went to Bikaner, and after having enjoyed grouse shooting there for some days proceeded to Lahore. In the capitals of the three States named above there were brilliant processions, durbars, banquets and other gaieties in honour of the Royal guests, and the Anglo-Indian dailies are publishing vivid descriptions of the scenes and pageants witnessed there. These descriptions will no doubt be read with pleasure by the loyal population of India, but can hardly be expected to allay the pangs of hunger felt by the starving poor. Forty millions of people among us go to bed on empty stomachs each day of their lives, while 70 millions know not what it is to have a full meal from year's end to year's end. These figures are taken from the statistics published by Government. The number of the poor and unemployed in London does not exceed a million and a-half at the most. Yet the Prime Minister feels keen sympathy for them and receives a deputation of their wives and speaks words of comfort to them. Nay, the King-Emperor and other members of the Royal family subscribe liberally to the Mansion House Fund raised for their relief. Why, even the Prince of Wales sends a thousand guineas as his contribution to the fund! Why should the distress of the much larger number of the Indian poor, who are known to pass their lives in a state of semi-starvation, go absolutely unheeded by the ruling class? In Rajputana itself, where the Prince is touring at present, and the surrounding tracts, as many as thirty thousand persons are on relief works; and it is a mere mockery to suppose that grand descriptions of gorgeous durbars and pageants will satisfy the starving population. The Maharaja of Jaipur has come forward with a munificent offer to assist the needy in their distress, and the Prince commended his charity in appropriate terms. The Maharaja has no doubt helped forward "the great national work of mercy," but the fact that there should be need for such a work at all after a century of civilised rule must give rise to feelings of shame and sorrow in the minds of our rulers.

Batmidar.—The Batmidar (Yeotmal), of November 25th, contains a few verses in which the author expresses his good wishes to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, but states that the illuminations and other pyrotechnic displays held in his honour and the presentation of addresses by certain persons (who hope to secure titles thereby) will all tend to impress His Royal Highness with the fact that the country is in a flourishing condition, whereas in reality such is not the case. The wealth of the country has already gone and the show is only superficial. He, therefore, prays that the Prince will kindly observe minutely the real state of the country and grant the people some boons.

Desabhimani (Bezawada and Guntur).—The Desabhimani, of the 25th November, states about the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, that it is regularly publishing in its columns all that takes place wherever they go, but that everywhere it is only pageants and fire-works, processions, and hunting excursions that are noticeable. There is no place where Their Royal Highnesses are made acquainted with the poverty of the Indians. Whatever may be the case in the Native States it is necessary, it adds, to acquaint His Royal Highness with the real condition of the subjects in the British Dominions.

UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 2ND DEC-EMBER 1905.

Hindusthan.—The English Hindosthan (Kalakankar), of the 27th November, says:—All the Rajput world will be gratified to learn the fitting tribute of admiration which the Prince of Wales has paid them in his speech at Udaipur. The terms in which this unsolicited tribute is couched are so sincere, so spontaneous, and so gracious that they cannot fail to produce a deep, touching, grateful and pleasant impression upon the responsive Rajput mind. The time and place chosen for the expression of these kindly sentiments do a great credit to the Royal tact and insight. We can assure His Royal Highness that the Rajputs, who are second to none in their loyal devotion to the Throne, will gratefully appreciate his gracious compliment, and will reciprocate his generous sentiments of regard for their "chivalry" and "freedom" by an unflinching loyalty and ever-increasing love to his Royal father and himself.

The Prince seems to have been extremely gratified by his reception and other pleasant experiences at Udaipur. Says His Royal Highness:—"From the moment we arrived in your State this morning to this hour one charming impression has been quickly followed by another. We have heard much of the Rajputs, and have had the pleasure of meeting these clans in England, but to realize the splendid traditions of chivalry, freedom and courtesy which are the proud possessions of the Rajput, one must see him in his own home." Let us say that the Royal Prince has seen the Rajput in his own home. Mewar is his own home. It is the cradle where the foster-nurse has fondled him, pouring forth wild passionate melodies of the Sakhas (sic) into his infant ears: it is the nursery where the anxious mother has brought him up amusing his boyish curiosity by pathetic stories of the johurs (sic); it is the fatherland where the singing minstrels have called forth a flood of tears from his eyes by their touching ballads; and above all, it is the seat of those Indian Thermopylas which have won immortal fame and never-dying reputation for the house of the Ramas.

The Prince says further on that "great traditions grandly maintained form what we see here in our host." This touching reference to the traditions of Mewar could not have failed to move the Maharana, who inherits the proud dignity of his illustrious forefathers. We are also aware of the heroic manner in which they have been preserved, and need not dilate upon that subject here. But we must say in passing that the Rajputs are a glorious remnant of fallen greatness, and the house of Mewar is, socially at any rate, the head of the Rajputs. The origin of this dynasty merges into a hoary mist of antiquity, and there is something sacred, something solemn, something romantic about its greatness and reputation which makes it so pre-eminently respected among all the princely families of India, and which appeals irresistibly to one's imagination and elicits admiration. The Prince of Wales was no exception to this magic influence and gave utterance to it by his fine sentiments contained in his speech at Udaipur, which will immensely endear him to all the Rajputs.

Oudh Akhtar.—One Habib-ur-Rahman, a Bombay school-master, writing in the Oudh Akhtar (Lucknow), of the 27th November, says that though very many memorials are being and will be established in honour of the Prince of Wales' visit to India, none of them can endure but for a definite time. The writer, on the other hand, has to suggest the establishment of a very superior kind of memorial the benefits of which will be far-reaching both to the Government and the people, and add undying lustre and glory to the fair name of His Royal Highness for ever and ever. Let the paternal and benevolent British Government abolish cow-slaughter throughout India, in honour of the Prince of Wales' visit, and it will perpetuate His Royal Highness' name to eternity; while earning the everlasting gratitude of Hindus, and making the supply of bullocks for agricultural purposes, and the production of ghi and milk much larger and cheaper. As regards the Muhammadans, they cannot resent the prohibition of cow-slaughter, inasmuch as it is not necessary for them to eat beef, it being simply declared to be one of the lawful foods by their religion. There are some leading Maulvis living also at the present time, who have collected much matter in support of the abolition of cow-killing in India, and the writer earnestly prays Government to have the slaughtering of kine abolished once for all in honour of the Prince's visit.

3RD DECEMBER 1905.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—A feature of the decorations at Lahore for the Royal visit has been the series of triumphal arches erected along the route from the railway station to the Mall. These are the work of Mr. Percy Brown, the Principal of the Mayo School of Art, and his assistants. One of the most striking objects along the whole route is a triple arch of two storeys, surmounted by mosque-like minarets, which is at the main approach to the camp of the Punjab Chiefs. The arch is bedecked with flags and with the Royal Arms in gold, and is flanked with lines of flags supported on poles. At the entrance to the Mall itself is a triple arch with a centre span of twenty feet, and with three storeys, surmounted by graceful baradaris, topped by domes. Above the main arch the one word "Welcome" appears in letters of gold. There is also the Punjab arms and motto, from which radiate flags and banners and surmounting all the Prince of Wales's feathers. The Royal Arms are displayed on each of the side arches, which are gay with flags. Earlier in the route another picturesque effect is secured by simpler means. Two uprights draped in coloured cloths and surmounted by decorations in the shape of royal crowns of gold, support a panel extending across the road, and bearing on one side the inscription in letters of gold "Welcome to Lahore," and on the reverse "God bless Their Royal Highnesses." The whole is surmounted by the Royal Arms flanked by flags, and above all waves the Prince of Wales's feathers. The decoration is completed by flags and strings of coloured bunting.

The effect thus secured in Lahore is to be repeated in Calcutta on what will be a more elaborate scale, the Executive Committee of the Royal Reception Committee there having appointed Chevalier Ghilardi, of the School of Art, to carry out the details of the decorations. The Red Road will be decorated by Government for the state procession on the 29th December, and these decorations will remain during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta. The decorations from the Dufferin statue to the entrance to the place of entertainment on the grass ride will be in charge of Chevalier Ghilardi, who has been engaged for the past three months on the work. Across the Casuarina Avenue, from the Dufferin statue southwards, there will be a succession of triumphal arches in the form of tapestry suspended from high masts. Between these masts, at frequent intervals, will be smaller poles bearing suitable devices. These pieces of tapestry, which are to be of Oriental design, are being painted by hand under the immediate supervision of Signor Ghilardi. At the junction of Kidderpore Road with the Casuarina Avenue, the procession will pass through a handsome pavilion with open sides. A similar pavilion will be erected on the grass ride at the spot where Their Royal Highnesses will alight from their carriage. From the Dufferin statue to the entrance pavilion, the road will be lined by 1,000 retainers lent by various Indian noblemen. These retainers will carry maces, silver sticks, spears, etc., and on the return journey will light the road for Their Royal Highnesses with 1,000 torches. The pavilion will be gaily decorated with flags and bunting, and the Royal dais will be covered with a rich canopy of red, embroidered in gold, the front fringe of which will have the Prince of Wales's feathers and motto in white silk in the centre, with the Star of India and the Order of the Indian Empire on either side. In each corner will be a peacock picked out in jewels. This canopy will be supported by four silver pillars. The pavilion will be illuminated without and within by electric light, and will have the Royal Arms brilliantly lit at the highest point.

Pioneer.—At the conclusion of the review of the Imperial Service Troops of the Punjab at Laore the Prince, accompanied by his Staff and the five Chiefs present, rode over to the troops, and the Prince spoke as follows:—

“Colonel Drummond,—I shall be glad if you will convey to the British officers associated with the Imperial Service Troops, to the Commandants, officers, and men of those corps my great appreciation of what I have seen to-day. The soldierly bearing of the men and the condition and turn-out of the horses were excellent, and the parade manoeuvres were carried out with admirable precision and the gallop past was exceptionally good, and I congratulate the regiment on its riding.”

His Royal Highness then turned to the Chiefs of Patiala, Nabha, Jind, Kapurthala and Maler Kotla, who, having led their troops past His Royal Highness, had remained in attendance upon him and said:

“I was indeed gratified to see you at the head of your Imperial Service Troops, and it will afford me the greatest pleasure on my return to England to inform His Majesty how you have led your fine regiments past me to-day, and of the very efficient condition of the troops maintained by you as a valuable auxiliary to our Native Army, whenever His Majesty may call for their service.”

The Officers' call was then sounded, and the Commandants rode up. Colonel Drummond interpreted His Royal Highness's speech to them, and then addressing the Prince said:—“I thank Your Royal Highness in the name of the Commandants, officers, and men of the Punjab Imperial Service Troops. They will ever remember this day with feelings of the deepest gratitude and pride.”

4TH DECEMBER 1905.

Daily Chronicle.—We left Lahore on Friday afternoon, and passing through Rawalpindi, where Lord Kitchener is marshalling his troops, we crossed the Kabul river at Attock which has seen every invasion of India from the time of Alexander the Great down to the present day, and so into the plain of Peshawar, with its horseshoe ring of encircling hills, an emerald in an iron setting. Peshawar is famous as the city that guards the mouth of the Khyber Pass, the northern gate of India, and also as the city in which more Englishmen have died by the knife of the Ghazi than any other in the Indian Empire.

This double reputation was echoed in the Prince's reception here on Saturday morning. Though outwardly Peshawar looked as placid a city as Bombay or Madras, its streets decorated with cheap bunting and schoolboy mottoes, and lined with a salaaming crowd of respectful Hindu traders, while a fat official read the municipal address of welcome in excellent English; yet evidences of the volcano simmering beneath this peaceful exterior were present in the dense masses of troops that lined the streets, ready to keep the fanatical population in check if need be. The fighting Gordons, the Black Watch, and the 38th Dogras lined the route while an escort of the 21st Lancers hemmed the Prince's carriage closely around. In the crowd, besides peaceful traders from the plains of India and the mountains of Kabul, were to be seen hook-nosed Pathans with great black turbans and greasy ringlets, who trod the city streets with the independent stride of the mountaineer, and openly wore the long Khyber knife in their waistbands.

Amongst those who were presented to the Prince in Durbar were all the Chiefs, who have been most conspicuous in the troubled frontier history of this “bloody border.” There was the young Mehtar of Chitral, who succeeded his murdered brother after the Chitral expedition of 1895, and whom it took a British Army to place upon his throne; there was the Khan of Dir, who succeeded his father only last year, and is still guarded from the attacks of his brother by a British movable column; and there was the Nawab of Nawagai, who has been raised in rank for his loyalty to the British arms. Viceroy's visiting these turbulent frontier nobles bring memories of unpopular policies and punitive expeditions; but the Prince is above the Government, and so political discontent was swallowed up in personal loyalty. The Chiefs forgot their differences with each other and with the British authorities, sat side by side, and joyously presented their tokens of homage with every evidence of real feeling at the presence of their Emperor's son.

To-day being Sunday, the Prince has spent in rest, like every Sunday throughout the tour; and to-morrow he takes train to Jamrud, the fort which lies nine miles away in the jaws of the Kyber Pass. Thence he drives to Ali Masjid, the famous citadel which stands midway through the pass, and on to Landi Kotal, the extreme limit of the British Empire, whence a wide view can be obtained of the plains of Afghanistan. There he receives the maliks of the Khyber Rifles, who still guard the road in spite of the Afridi outbreak of 1897; but since that date they have been greatly strengthened. The Prince arrives at Rawalpindi on Tuesday, where Lord Kitchener has assembled 40,000 troops for four days' manoeuvres.

Englishman.—Their Royal Highnesses's reception at Peshawar was full of superficial incongruities. At this dull cantonment station they were welcomed with the usual stiff official ceremony. Thence they drove through the streets, decked with cheap bunting and schoolboy mottoes, lined with a salaaming crowd, to the Gorkhatri, where a stout local magnate, in excellent English, read the flowery municipal address. In the afternoon there was a garden party, bright with uniforms and the gayest frocks and pretty women with beautiful complexions who made the trim croquet law so suggestive of home. And to-day the Prince and the Princess attended Divine Service in the truly British station church, and drove quietly through the cantonment. A formal reception, a municipal address, a garden party and those beautifully shaded roads—why we might be in some snug cantonment of Bombay or Madras instead of this strange wild frontier city of Peshawar!

This intensely fascinating sentinel town, which was the first link which knit the early Mogul sovereigns with their central Asian fatherland, developed into the outpost which guarded the passes against the Sikhs, and now stands watch and ward over that troubled mountain line which may be summed up in the single word “Khyber.”

What an absorbing study is this bazar of Peshawar. Peshawar is a city of dirty yellow, of bricks set in wooden frames coated with mud and of flat-roofed houses. But in the great bazaar the frames are painted a crude blue, the bricks a glistening white, whilst in honour of the Royal visit they were spanned with arches and criss-crossed with bunting which everyone could well have done without. The Afridi wax cloths and bright embroideries and a few of the more tasteful displays were worth all the other decorations tenfold. Half a mile of deserted cantonment road and the Royal route, passing through the Edwardes gate, so-called after the splendid frontier officer and Christian gentleman who held Peshawar in the Mutiny, plunged into a sea of every race and clan of the tribes on our frontier. Here were none of the emerald greens and orange yellows and garish red beloved of the peoples of Rajputana and Central India and Bombay and which harmonise so well with their environments, but quiet blacks and whites and embroidered poshteens which better matched the greyish winter sky. It was not the clothes which attracted, however, but the men, the hook-nosed, hard-featured Yusufs and Alis, who make frontier history, who sat silent, stern and self-contained, waiting for the Emperor's son to pass. Cruel, wild, and uncertain they may be, but are real live men to whom much may be forgiven for the masculinity that is in them.

Up the main street and under the arched entrance to the old Avatibles headquarters rattled the Royal cortege, the Prince and Princess dismounting at the scarlet way which led to the shamiana wherein the Frontier Chiefs were assembled. First came the municipal address and His Royal Highness's reply thereto. The address, read in fluent English, proclaimed that the North-West Frontier Province and the Peshawar Municipal Committee yielded to none in their constant loyalty and devotion to the Throne. Peshawar had stood sentinel for many years over the Khyber through which kings and conquerors had advanced, but not under the benevolent protection of the King Emperor. Danger from without and disturbance from within had given place to security and order, tranquillity and rest. In response, His Royal Highness said:—

"Gentlemen, I thank you on behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself for the sincere and frank words with which you welcome us to the North-West Frontier Province. I shall communicate your loyal and grateful assurances to my dear father, the King-Emperor. It was one of the regrets of his Indian visit that he was unable to see Peshawar, but thirty years ago there was no railway to your interesting and important city. There have been many other changes in the country across the Indus since my father visited India, and I am rejoiced to learn that these changes have tended towards your happiness and prosperity. Security and order are blessings for which we may all be thankful and I have little fear that in this free hardy country 'tranquillity and rest' will impair the manly qualities of the Pathan. The Princess and I fervently pray that the peace which you now enjoy may be long continued. You are the wardens of the passes and from far across the seas the British people watch you with sympathy and confidence."

This was but the prelude to the serious business of the day, the presentation of the Frontier Chiefs from the east and the west and the north, who had come to offer homage to the Emperor's son. First the young Mehtar of Chitral who ascended a thorny throne in 1895 and was a refugee in the fort during the stubborn siege that followed. A gentle kindly youth, he passed and offered the tribute which was touched and remitted. Then followed the Khan of Dir. A fine spirited figure whose duty it is to keep open the road to Chitral and the bridge over the Swat. Then the Nawab of Nawagai, Dir's recent foe with whom he has still unsettled feud for the possession of Jhandol, one of the many troublesome legacies that that stormy petrel Umra Khan left on the Frontier. The lesser Chiefs were presented in order of precedence and as their sonorous titles were rolled out and they reverentially approached the Prince and Princess with Oriental tokens of fealty it was impossible to withhold a meed of respect from these grand chieftains. These were the masters of the men we had seen grouped in the bazaar. Tall of stature, full of dignity, respectful without a trace of servility, with fierce keen faces, they looked what they are—the descendants of generations of free, brave fighting men. Seeing them thus it was easy to understand the bond of union which springs up between them and the real men amongst our frontier officers.

And yet behind these superficial evidences of placidity there were scores of sidelights hinting at those peculiar, unenviable characteristics which still mark Peshawar amongst the cities of India. The officer who stepped forward to greet His Royal Highness, who was wearing a General's uniform, as he alighted from the train, was the Hon'ble Colonel Deane, Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province, who is beloved along the border line for his knowledge and ready sympathy, and General Sir Edmond Barrow. The officers bore the honourable marks of arduous service in frontier warfare. The soldiery who lined the streets so closely in the great bazaar were of fine fighting regiments, the gallant Gordons, the famous Black Watch, the 38th Dogras, and the escort was furnished by a soldierly body of the 21st Cavalry. The taciturn men who crowded on the house fronts were not the fat bunnias or Marwaris of Bombay and Calcutta, but real fighting men, keen traders, to-day pot shooting over the borders at some ancient enemy, to-morrow perhaps wild beasts of Ghazis, or out against the Raj before the sun is much older. Who knows? The Gorkhatri where the Chiefs were received was the residence of the Avatible, who held Peshawar in his iron grip in the forties. The Chiefs gathered here embraced every name conspicuous in the stormy life of the frontier for a quarter of a century. Even the scarlet-robed messengers calmly assisting at the garden party were armed against possible assault.

With this appreciation of the qualities of those received by the Prince came the recognition also of the inner meaning of the dignified ceremony. What had induced these warring Chieftains temporarily to bury the hatchet and sit side by side in the Durbar? Dir is to forget his feud with Nawagai and a dozen lesser Chiefs to lay aside their interminable feuds. It was not the mere emblems of authority. The Viceroy and the Chief Commissioner come to the tribesmen as representatives of the Government whose orders they frequently dislike, though they have to be obeyed. The eldest son of the King-Emperor is above the Government. He is the son of the ruler they trust, and grandson of the great Queen whose memory they revere. He is the symbol of the personal rule they all understand and all value. The Pathan knows nothing of constitutional subtleties. The officers he meets are the servants of his Emperor. The Prince of Wales is the very heir to the Emperor himself. Therefore it was that they for once forgot their feuds and with all reverence, but with pride and joy paid homage to the Heir-Apparent. Nothing could have been more striking than the evidences, not only of loyalty but of cheerful loyalty, which stamped the hard and worn faces of the warrior Chieftains as they offered nazar or the hilts of their swords to the Prince. In this tour we have had many evidences of the immense influence exercised by the royal house in welding the great feudatories to the British Raj, but none more striking than the marks of deep devotion with which men whose names are synonyms for trouble bowed before Their Royal Highnesses at this first royal reception at Peshawar. Many viewed the visit to the frontier city with misgiving, but the actual circumstances confirmed the prescience of those who ordered it.

The garden party at the Government House on Saturday afternoon, and the drive through the cantonments this evening introduced Their Royal Highnesses to another phase of Peshawar life—the phase because of whose existency, peace and order now reign on the border. There was little to suggest the frontier in the beautifully kept lawns and neat walks of Government House in the handsome uniforms, and graceful frocks, the music of the pipes in the still wintry air, and the bright shamiana. Yet what a mighty influence is exercised by these gentlemen in scarlet and the blue of the political over the wild country which lies amongst the purple peaks on the horizon. The representatives of the border peoples were here too—Chitral, Dir and Nawagai and a score or so of lesser dignitaries. Prominent amongst these throng were men who have caused us more trouble, especially on the Waziri frontier, in the days gone by, vulture-like old ruffians, but intensely picturesque and likeable after all the potholes they have occasioned. Nor less notable was a small band of the fast-disappearing veterans of the Mutiny with medals from Delhi onwards, stout old fellows, who displayed these distinctions with an entirely pardonable pride.

Englishman.—To view the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales at Prinsep's Ghat, on the afternoon of Friday the 29th December, and the presentation of the Municipal address and jewel, a pavilion will be erected by Government which will accommodate about 2,200 people. To facilitate the allotment of seats, it is notified that applications should be submitted to Mr. C. B. Bayley, Secretary, Royal Arrangements Committee, at an early date.

Each application should state clearly how many tickets are required.

Pioneer.—Mr. Ross Scott, Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, presided at a meeting of the Lucknow City and District Committee held at Kaiserbagh yesterday for the purpose of collecting subscriptions towards the Medical College Memorial. The Chairman announced that he had been asked by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor to inform the meeting in Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan's own words that "in token of expression of his unflinching loyalty and of his deep gratification at the fact that it is the first occasion that a Royal Princess of the British House is about to honour us with a visit to our capital, he subscribed a sum of Rs. 40,000 towards instituting a branch of the college for women to commemorate the visit of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales." This sum is in addition to Rs. 15,000 already given by the Raja who has thus credit for having initiated both the colleges for men and for women. A letter was also read from the Rani of the Tiloi District, Rac Bareli, to His Honour expressing her inability to subscribe owing to the position of her estates, but asking His Honour to grant a suitable amount towards the fund from the Tiloi estate, which is under the Court of Wards. In the event of it not being possible for the Court of Wards to subscribe, the Rani said she would give the proceeds of certain charitable work she was undertaking. Both these announcements were received with applause, as was also the proposal that the funds should be added to for the purpose of placing within the walls of the college a statue of Sir James LaTouche.

A sum of Rs. 73,000 was subscribed which, with Rs. 13,000 collected at the previous meeting, brings the Lucknow total contribution up to Rs. 86,000.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Peshawar on Saturday morning, and were welcomed by vast picturesquely attired crowds from both sides of the border. The Prince and Princess drove from the station to the Ghor Khatri, where an address of welcome was presented, and the Royal party received a most loyal greeting from the Provincial Durbaris and others, including the Mehtar of Chitral, the Nawab of Dir and the Khan of Nawagai. Afterwards the Prince and Princess drove to Government House, where a garden party was held in the afternoon attended by all Peshawar society. To-day Their Royal Highnesses pay a visit to the Khyber.

Standard.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here at ten o'clock yesterday morning, and, after the usual official reception at the station, drove through the prettily decked streets, which were densely thronged by the populace. Highland and native regiments kept the route, while the 21st Cavalry furnished an escort.

A great durbar was held, at which a loyal address was presented by the Chiefs of the North-West Frontier Province and a municipal committee of Peshawar. The Prince, in reply to the address, promised to convey to the King and Emperor the grateful assurances from the Wardens of the Passes, whom the British people watched with sympathy and confidence. A garden party was held in the afternoon.

In the evening a State banquet was given in honour of the Prince of Wales. This morning Their Royal Highnesses attended Divine Service, and in the afternoon they drove through the cantonments.—Reuter.

Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan, the originator of the scheme for the foundation of a medical college here, to commemorate the Royal visit to the United Provinces of Agra and Lucknow, has subscribed a further sum for the establishment of a branch college for women in honour of the Princess of Wales.

Many other tokens of loyalty are forthcoming from people of all classes. The Rani of Tiloi, who is in receipt of a small allowance from the Court of Wards, has expressed her willingness to make over the proceeds of the charitable work in which she is engaged. The success of the medical college scheme is now ensured. A site has been decided upon near the heart of the city, and imposing buildings are to be erected, which should add greatly to the appearance of Lucknow.

Times.—Peshawar, the northernmost city of Hindustan, stands on the threshold of the untamed East, under the shadow of the great mountain ranges through which the tide of Central Asian invasions has in former times repeatedly poured down into the plains of India. The walls of the Ghor Khatri, where the Prince of Wales held a Durbar on his arrival yesterday, constitute in themselves a synopsis of Indian history. Originally a Buddhist monastery, then a Hindu temple, then the residence of the Sub-Governor of the Mogul province of Kabul, then the seat of the Northern Sikh Government, now it is a hall of audience where the Heir to the Throne of the British Empire received the homage of the frontier chieftains and Pathan sirdars.

The scene in the picturesque old city was striking enough as the Prince drove through the narrow streets, where every shop-front, every window, and every roof was packed with spectators, while an unbroken cordon of Gordon Highlanders, Black Watch, and Dogras kept the streets themselves absolutely clear—for the population of Peshawar still contains not a few unruly and dangerous elements—but the most impressive of all was the gathering under the shamiana at the Ghor Khatri. There were the Mehtar of Chitral, the Khans of Dir and Nawagai, and scores of other chieftains who have struggled, fought, and finally submitted to the new dispensation "that laws must silence spear and gun." There were patriarchs with long, flowing beards, some snow white, some palpably dyed red brown with henna, all with powerful, almost Jewish, features, hook-nosed and hawk-eyed, who might have sat to Michelangelo for his Old Testament prophets. Others were in the prime of life, broad-shouldered and burly, others again were wiry, upstanding youths with a lean and hungry look, and here and there among them, as connecting links between our world and theirs, were veteran officers of the Native Army with rows of medals on their breasts ranging back to the Abyssinian campaign, and even to the Relief of Delhi at the time of the Mutiny. After the Prince had read a reply to their address they filed slowly past the dais, some in flowing Cashmere shawls, some in velvet tunics, purple, scarlet, and green, over great, baggy white trousers. Others again wore old British uniforms of the Native Army. Each tended as he passed the hilt of his sword to be touched by his Royal Highness.

There could be no greater contrast to this old world scene than the garden party given the same afternoon by Colonel and Mrs. Deane in honour of Their Royal Highnesses in the grounds of Government House overlooking the European cantonment, perhaps the most beautiful in northern India, with its stately avenues and spacious gardens, now rich with autumn foliage and flowers.

In the course of his reply to a combined address from the Chiefs and the Municipal Committee of Peshawar, the Prince of Wales said security and order were blessings for which they all might be thankful, and he had little fear that in that free and hardy country tranquility and rest would impair the manly qualities of the Pathan Princes. He fervently prayed that the peace they now enjoyed might long continue. They were the wardens of the passes, and from far across the sea the British people watched them with sympathy and confidence.

5TH DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The following is the text of an address which was presented to the Princess of Wales on Thursday, November 30th, at a parda party given in Her Royal Highness's honour by Lady Rivaz at Government House. The party was attended by about fifty ladies of rank and the address was written for them by one of their number.

May it please your Royal Highness,—

We, the women of the Punjab, representing all classes of community,—Muhammadans, Hindus and Christians,—consider it our very great privilege to be given this opportunity of approaching Your Royal Highness with our heartfelt greetings and cordial welcome to India.

All over the land runs a thrill of loyalty and pleasure at having in our midst the Royal son, and Heir-Apparent of our Gracious Majesty King Edward the VII and of our noble and beautiful Queen Alexandra.

His Majesty's own visit to India 30 years ago some of us recall with joy, and now allowing His Royal son to come out is a sure token of the great interest taken by Their Majesties the King-Emperor and the Queen in their Indian subjects, and which cannot fail to draw its vast people into closer contact with the parent country.

Your Royal Highness is the first Princess of Wales who has set her foot on Indian soil, and we hail to have you, our future Queen, in our midst.

Your Royal Highness's touching reply to the Bombay ladies address shows what keen and lively interest you take in the welfare of the women of your country, and Your Royal Highness's most gracious manner has already endeared you to our hearts.

We also never fail to remember that Your Royal Highnesses are the near descendants of that beloved and illustrious Sovereign whose name will ever stand as the synonym of noblest womanhood.

Her exemplary life as a wife, mother, and Queen has been, and will be, loved and revered in every Indian home, as a pattern for all women to copy.

It is to her love for the suffering women of India that we owe that noteworthy institution, the Dufferin Fund, started by the Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava at the instance of Her Majesty the Queen Empress, Victoria the Good. To her benevolent rule is due the great progress of female education all over India.

Your Royal Highness, the Punjabis have been known and proved themselves to be the most loyal and brave subjects of the King-Emperor's dominion in India which truly is a bright diadem in the British Crown. But the women of the Punjab, too, have been known to be no less true to the cause of their King and country, and they consider it their proud privilege to be the mothers and wives of the brave and heroic men of the British Army of the Punjab.

In conclusion, may God Almighty abundantly bless Your Royal Highness and all the Royal Family.

And may your sojourn throughout India be most pleasant. So that Your Royal Highnesses may take back pleasant memories of India and its loyal people, and especially the women of the Punjab.

Her Royal Highness said a few gracious words in reply, expressing her satisfaction at meeting representatives of the Indian ladies of the Punjab. We understand that the party was a complete success and the ladies present were much gratified to have this opportunity of meeting their future Queen.

Daily Telegraph.—Peshawar, Monday, December 4 (6-40 p.m.). The Prince and Princess of Wales drove through the Khyber Pass to-day, lunched at Lundi Kotal, and on the way back received the Maliks, or headmen, of various Khels of Afridia living on the pass.

The latter ceremony was slightly different from the usual ritual of touching and remitting the offerings of native chiefs, as the offering, or "nazar," took the odd form of a fat and protesting mountain sheep.

Fourteen hundred Khyber Rifles were out to line the skyline on either hand, and everything passed off with entire success, which reflects the utmost credit upon Major Roos-Keppel, upon whom fell all the responsibility for Their Royal Highnesses's safe transit through this historic piece of no man's land.

The drive through the Khyber Pass was a most interesting and enjoyable experience. The Prince and Princess of Wales proceeded by train from Peshawar to Jamrud, where a fort bearing a remarkable resemblance to a battleship guards the mouth of the Pass. On arriving there, a score of carriages and tongas was waiting to convey the Royal party.

The wild and rugged grandeur of the scene impressed all seeing it for the first time as they wound in and out among a jumble of barren and inaccessible heights, a square stone block-house at intervals, dominating the only way in from the north, telling how well the frontier is watched. Statuesque khaki-clad figures on the skyline, singly or in twos and threes, with bayonets glistening in the sun, vouched for the safety of the Royal visitors in a region where life is still held cheap, and inter-tribal reprisals are of frequent occurrence.

A short halt was made when Ali Musjid was reached at eleven o'clock. Here the horses were changed. Crossing and re-crossing the pebble-strewn beds of the mountain stream and mounting and descending the serpentine route the party reached Lundi Kotal, the last post in British territory commanding the hills and defiles of Afghanistan.

Shortly after noon Their Royal Highnesses inspected the fort and viewed from the roof a sham fight, intended to illustrate the methods of mountain warfare. They lunched at the fort, and after being photographed began the return drive at 2-30. Stopping again at Ali Musjid they were met by a band of headmen, in rough, outlandish attire, each bringing a tribute of sheep and goats. Their Royal Highnesses inspected the men, and were greatly interested. The Prince, touching the sheep of the leading Malik, signified that the tribute was remitted.

An invigorating drive in the declining day, which showed the ranges in a new aspect, with wonderful effects of light and shade, brought the party to Jamrud, where they immediately entered the special train, reaching Peshawar at 4-40 without delay.

Englishman.—It was a clear crisp wintry morning to-day when, at eight o'clock, Their Royal Highnesses set out from Peshawar to visit the Khyber Pass. The natives crouched beneath their coarse country blankets or huddled over tiny fires. The guard of honour of stalwart Highlanders had much ado to keep warm. A morning indeed for fur coats and poshtens, so Her Royal Highness, who accompanied the Prince, donned a stout tailor-made costume and wore furs, and Lady Shaftesbury, the only other lady who accompanied the party, followed suit. Even then there was quite an unpleasant nip-piness in the air, as the royal train steamed out of Peshawar cantonment station, for the short run to Jarmud. The sun-baked houses of brick and wood, which in Peshawar have such an unfinished air, soon gave way to the bare mud-coloured exercising ground. This in turn to the fertile irrigated ground which lies to the north-west of the city, and this again all too soon to the gaunt stony plain which runs to the foot of the hills. These same low hills presented two curious comparisons. To the east they were as bare and brown as if they had been lifted bodily from the Gulf of Suez, to the west they were wrapped in a faint purple haze which made them almost beautiful. There was a little traffic on the Khyber road, though the last caravan passed on Friday and the next is not due until to-morrow, pack oxen, donkeys and mules, whose owners gazed stolidly at the long white Royal train. A bare mud-walled fort, this was the last police post north of Peshawar. Then the fort of Jarmud, with the Union Jack flying, rose abruptly out of the plain of mud and stones. It looked like nothing so much as a giant battleship with sharp prow, funnel and turret, and rounded stern, the out-buildings tailing off like a convoy lying at anchor in this sea of dust under the shadow of the cliffs.

At Jarmud was Major Roos-Keppel, the warden of the Marches, and the only Mr. Dunjibhoy with phaetons, tongas and tum-tums, an escort of thirty sowars of the Khyber Rifles, and a smart guard of honour of the same regiment. In almost less time than the telling takes the Prince and Princess were seated in a landau with the Hon'ble Colonel Deane. The escort wheeled into position and they had started on the long drive through the country of the Afridis to the little fort of Landi Kotal, which looks out on Afghanistan.

At once it became apparent that we had left the peace and tranquility of British India, and had entered the wild, fierce, turbulent borderland. Although there was not a sign of cultivation or of population, the road was closely guarded by the Khyber Rifles, posted at a few yards' interval. Smart soldier-like fellows they were too, with pleasant, intelligent faces, presenting arms with the steadiness and precision of veteran line-men. The road soon left the plain and began to climb the hills in snaky curves. Up and up it went, now in long sinuous sweeps, now in abrupt zig-zags, showing the royal carriage almost overhead, until it was lost in the tangle of hills. And such hills, bare, gaunt and unimposing, slightly spotted with little dots of bush, as if their brown skins had broken into an eruption. Save a couple of deserted villages, with the low watch towers which are the hall mark of the frontier, Their Royal Highnesses might have been driving through an absolutely unpopulated country. Yet everyone knew that these bare brown, hills are the houses of innumerable Afghans, who come down from the north to escape the rigours of the winter; that in the valleys over the serrated peaks dwell the factious tribesmen, where blood feuds are of daily occurrence and few men's lives are safe beyond the protection of their own watch towers; that the road was deserted because the order had gone in each village not to approach within three miles of the road whilst the Shahzada was going through, under penalty of being shot at sight; that on every peak and hilltop sometimes a few yards from the road, sometimes thousands of feet away, silhouetted against the blue sky, were posted eagle-eyed Khyber riflemen with Martinis ready to enforce the Sirkar's order.

After climbing steadily for an hour or more a point was reached, where one could glance back over these rugged hills on to the plains of Hindustan, dimly seen on the purple horizon. Small wonder is it that the hill men condemned to dwell where a scanty subsistence only can be won from the ungrate ful soil, have, to adapt Johnson's gibe, for centuries looked on the high road to India as the fairest prospect they ever saw, and like the Highlanders regard the lowlands as their legitimate spoil. And now the scene changed. The road debouched on to a great amphitheatre, ringed with low peaks at the far end of which could be discerned the famous fort of Ali Masjid, dominating the situation. The road wound round this amphitheatre, skirting the foot of the hill on which the fortress stands. There a temporary halt was called, in order to change horses, and it was welcome, because it provided an opportunity of more closely examining the fortalice, which has played so big a part in frontier history. It is a sturdy little structure of brick, scientifically laid out with every form of cover the soldier can desire, and as it is kept amply provisioned and garrisoned, it should prove a tougher nut than any frontier tribe can crack.

The following is an extract from an address presented by fifty Punjab ladies of high rank to the Princess of Wales:—"Your Royal Highness is the first Princess of Wales who has set her foot on Indian soil and we hail you as our future Queen in our midst. We also will never fail to remember that Your Royal Highnesses are near descendants of that beloved and illustrious Sovereign whose name will ever stand as a synonym of noblest womanhood. It is to her love for the suffering women of India, that we owe that noteworthy institution, the Dufferin Fund. To her benevolent rule is due the great progress of female education all over India. Your Royal Highness, the Punjabis are known and have proved themselves to be the most loyal and brave subjects of the King Emperor's dominion in India, but the women of the Punjab are to have been known to be no less true to the cause of their King and country, and they consider it their proud privilege to be the mothers and wives of the brave and heroic men of the British army of the Punjab."

Ten thousand poor people will be banquetted at Delhi on the 13th instant in celebration of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The cost is to be defrayed by public subscription. Hindus and Mohammedans will be invited.

Englishman.—The work of constructing the amphitheatre for the Indian entertainment to be held on the Calcutta maidan during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was taken in hand a week ago, and already satisfactory progress has been made. The work is in charge of Lieutenant G. Trusler of the Public Works Department. The amphitheatre is being constructed in the form of a horse-shoe, on the pilot of maidan north of the Victoria Memorial. The open space at one end will be for the erection of a pavilion for the Royal party, and in the centre of the arena a place is being constructed for the accommodation of the musicians. Between the Royal platform and the musicians' site will be erected a dais on which the performance will take place. The whole amphitheatre with the exception of the gallery for the seats, which is formed of masonry, is being built of wood, and will be covered over with plaster, so that when completed it will form an imposing structure. It will be surmounted by numerous towers and domes, on the mast heads of which, pennons and flags will float. The seating arrangements will be carried out on the same principle as at Delhi, the place being divided into blocks.

Special roads are being made, connecting the opening of the amphitheatre, which faces north, with the broad roads on the maidan. The amphitheatre will be finished in another fortnight's time, a large staff consisting of 200 Chinamen carpenters, nearly 1,000 coolies and 300 or 400 masons working from 7 a.m. to midnight to complete the work in time.

Indian Daily News.—The historic drive of the Prince and Princess of Wales through the Khyber Pass has taken place, and a very interesting though a very dusty experience it has been. While kings and armies have raised the dust of the Khyber to some purpose in the course of its eventful history, the peaceful cavalcade which to-day accompanied the Heir-Apparent to the British Throne on his memorable survey of the Pass has stirred the dust considerably, and has also left its impress upon the records to the writing of which the bare brown hills have frowningly borne witnesses. Apart from the fact of the drive and that the Khyber was terra nova to most of the party accompanying the Prince and Princess, the visit was almost entirely free from incident. Considerable precautions were taken that this should be so; a day was selected on which the caravans which pass up and down the Khyber twice a week would not be in the neighbourhood, and the arrangements precluded the possibility of a single hillman being seen anywhere near the road except the pickets visible on every eminence overlooking the pass. The Khyber Rifles supplied the mounted escort with the Prince and the pickets along the road, while upon the outlying hills thirteen hundred tribal ladies were distributed to keep watch and ward. The Royal party took the train at Peshawar cantonment station at 8.30 this morning, and half an hour's travelling brought Jamrud fort within sight. The inevitable comparison that is made on first seeing the outlines of this advanced British outpost lying in the waste at the foot of the hills which guard the frontier is that of a battleship lying off a rock bound coast. Here the party left the train and entered the carriages for the drive of nearly four hours through the Pass. The only impressions that could be gathered during that historic drive were of bare brown hills on either hand presenting barrier upon barrier, their barrenness relieved only by the scantiest tufts of herbage.

Formidable and forbidding of aspect, the hills grew more precipitous as the road penetrated and wound about them, the natural fortresses of a land of war, but to-day there were no hostile figures lurking upon those hillsides. Khaki-clad figures scarcely discernible from the rocks around stood straightly and silently upon the heights all eyes for the moving even of a stone; the road rose in a picturesque serpentine course to the highest point and then descended towards the Ali Masjid; and here the first sight of water was visible, a pellucid stream running down from beyond the scene of the historic fight. At the foot of the hill crowned with the small but famous fort, a shamiana was pitched by the roadside, and here there was a halt to enable the incidents of the Ali Masjid battle and disposition of General Browne's forces to be explained to the Prince. The escort of sixty-two sowars for the Khyber Rifles under Captain Costello was drawn up on one side of the road, and though no other guard was in sight it was known that a hundred men were posted on the summits of the overlooking hills at what was considered to be the most dangerous part of the route. The precautions were complete; the only other beings within sight of the Royal party were a group of Maliks sitting quietly at the foot of the hill remote from the road. It was given as an instance of the disposition of tribesmen that a truce of all feuds had been arranged for the period of the Royal visit to the frontier. Two days before a couple of tribesmen had escaped from jail at Peshawar; they walked into the fort at Jamrud, telephoned to Major Roos Keppel at Lundi Khotal acquainting him of their escape and asking what he proposed to do with them. The Commandant of the Khyber Rifles considered they would make useful pickets, and as such they were employed. Resuming the drive the Royal party reached Lundi Kotal at noon, passing on the way the roadside cemetery in which the tombstones were rough slabs unmarked by any sign. Outside the fortified barracks, which is surrounded by serrated mountains and is faced by a couple of block houses, a number of quiet hillmen were gathered. The Prince ascended the terrace on the walls and viewed the interesting country around, and at his request the men of the Khyber Rifles had a sham fight, attacking the hills opposite.

After lunch the Prince inspected the guard of honour and along with the Princess was photographed with them.

The return journey was begun shortly before two o'clock and the Ali Masjid was reached again about 3. Here the only ceremony of the day took place. A number of Maliks were in waiting and were presented by Major Roos Keppel, and in turn they tendered as tribute honey and fat-tailed sheep. This interesting form of nuzzar was duly remitted, and after a halt of a few minutes only the drive homeward was continued. Jamrud was reached about 4.30, and entertaining there the Royal party arrived at Peshawar cantonment at 5 o'clock. They leave to-night at 10.30 for Rawalpindi.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The spacious Baradari at the Kaiser Bagh, Lucknow, was thronged on Saturday at noon with a unique gathering of the Indian citizens of Lucknow on the occasion of the public meeting to collect subscriptions for the proposed Medical College to commemorate the Royal visit to these Provinces. A dais had been erected for the President at the head of the Baradari flanked by the statues of General Barrow and Raja Man Singh, and on the left, accommodation had been provided for Europeans, of whom there was a fair number present, including Mr. Leslie Porter, Commissioner of Lucknow, Mr. Saunders, Deputy Commissioner; Mr. Pirie, Mr. A. W. Ward, and Mr. M. B. Cameron of Canning College; Mr. Sykes, Reverend Mr. Oldham and Reverend Mr. Bare. Mr. Ross Scott, Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, arrived punctually at 12, and was received by the members of the Reception Committee and conducted to the dais. Long before the meeting opened the clerks at the head of the hall were busy entering subscriptions, and piles of silver were displayed to view on the table. The preliminary resolution voting Mr. Ross Scott to the chair, which was proposed by Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan, and seconded by the Raja of Salempur, was carried with loud applause.

Mr. Ross Scott, after thanking the meeting for the honour done him, spoke as follows:—

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor desires that the meeting should be informed, in Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan's own loyal words, that "in token of the expression of his unflinching loyalty and of his deep gratification at the fact that this is the first occasion that a Royal Princess of the British house is about to honour us with a visit to our capital, he subscribes the sum of Rs. 40,000 towards instituting a branch college for women to commemorate the visit of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales." (Loud applause.) This sum is in addition to the Rs. 15,000 already given by the Raja. Thus Raja Tassaduq has the credit of having initiated the movement for both colleges for men and for women.

His Honour also desires that the following letter of the Rani of Tiloi should be read at the meeting:—

From—Rani Jagannath Kuer of Tiloi District Rae Bareilly,

To—His Honour Sir James Digges LaTouche, K.C.S.I., Lieutenant-Governor, United Provinces.

Honoured Sir,—With my due respect to Your Honour, I beg to say that nearly all the Taluqdars and well-to-do persons of these Provinces are, according to their own position, going to subscribe to the Prince of Wales's Memorial Fund. The Tiloi Estate being under the Court of Wards management and I getting only a monthly allowance, can't possibly save enough from it to subscribe according to the Estate's position.

Therefore I most respectfully beg Your Honour to grant a proper sum of money to the said fund from the Tiloi Estate Court of Wards. And if it would not be possible for the Court of Wards to subscribe to the said fund, I shall try myself to give any sum that I would be able to lay by from other charitable works that I am going to do from my maintenance, for I don't regard a bit of my own ease and comfort in comparison with joining in such public good works. (Renewed applause.)

I think that these announcements are most gratifying to you all. Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan has been associated with every good work started in connection with the Province, and I am sure that there is no more loyal subject of the King-Emperor's than Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan. I think I may on your behalf also express my gratitude and the thanks of this meeting for the letter of the Rani of Tiloi. It is full of all good wishes and the desire that the estate of Tiloi should do all that it possibly can to support the memorial. It is quite unnecessary to dwell at any length on the objects of this meeting, as you have all read the excellent speeches delivered by our respected and highly esteemed Lieutenant-Governor. To recapitulate these objects briefly, as you are well aware, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales who are in India propose, at the end of this month, to visit Lucknow, and the people have in a most extraordinary manner, and spontaneously, expressed a desire that a memorial should be erected in Lucknow to commemorate that visit. The Prince and Princess have been a very short time in India, but there can be no doubt that they have already gained the hearts of the Indian people. The reports in the public press of the manly, straightforward speeches of the Prince shows that he follows in the footsteps of his dearly beloved grandmother, the late Queen Victoria, and of his father, the present King, in his respect for and devotion to the people of India. There has been a unique and almost unsurpassed spontaneity among the people of these Provinces, that the proposed memorial should take the form of a Medical College in Lucknow, and I think there can be a no more suitable memorial. It will provide a career for many men, and I hope also, on the initiation of our friend Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan, for women in these Provinces—a career that will be open to many of you here.

The people of the Agra Province have come forward with an earnest wish to associate themselves with the College in Lucknow. Naturally, one would not expect that they would desire the College to be built in Lucknow, but it seems to me that they regard Lucknow—and not Allahabad—as the capital of the United Provinces. It is easy to understand this: Lucknow with all its beauty and all its associations may be regarded as the queen of the cities of India. Allahabad has no doubt its advantages, but I think Lucknow is the place for the College. I hope also that the people of the Agra Province, having expressed their wish with regard to the College when the question of the High Court comes up, will also say, Lucknow. When I spoke to Lord Curzon about the matter in April when he was here, he seemed against it, his principal reason being that the Judges would not be able to give the University the advantage of their services. I, however, suggested that it would be best to take the opinion of the zamindars of the Provinces, and I think we may take that in some day we shall have Lucknow adorned with a High Court also. A sum in excess of seven lakhs has been collected for the College, and it is understood that ten lakhs are required. I think it is also sure that the sum will be forthcoming.

In consideration of the assistance that has been rendered by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, and of the earnest interest he has taken in the proposal, I think that the funds should be added to, for the purpose of placing within the walls of the College a statue of His Honour Sir James LaTouche. (Great applause.) I hope, therefore, when putting names down for subscriptions to-day that you will bear this in mind, and see that the funds are in excess of the necessary ten lakhs required. I would also suggest that in the library of the College a book should be kept in which the names of the subscribers to the College should be recorded, and that the book should be handed down to all time, so that your descendants will have an opportunity of seeing what you have done for them. It remains with you now. I cannot ask you to do it, for I am a Government servant—but you are all at liberty to subscribe. (Hear, hear and laughter.)

In proposing that a subscription list be opened, Mr. Pirie said:—

When the last Prince of Wales visited Lucknow, I had the honour to be present, and on that occasion the Talukdars of Oudh presented him with a memorial in the shape of a golden crown. On this occasion I hope the public of the United Provinces will be able to present the Prince with a far better memorial by giving him a crown, not of gold but of good work. (Cheers.)

The proposal was seconded by Mr. Hamid Ali Khan, Barrister-at-Law, who made an eloquent speech in Urdu, the humorous points of which were received with applause.

Munshi Prag Narain Bhargava then proposed that a sub-committee be appointed to collect subscriptions for the Medical College Fund in the city and district of Lucknow.

It was proposed by Khan Bahadur Chaudhri Nasrat Ali and seconded by Mr. Abdul Wahid Khan, that a vote of thanks be given to Raja Mahomed Tassaduq Rasul Khan for his generous donation of Rs. 40,000 for a branch College for women. The proposal was carried with enthusiasm.

Mr. Ross Scott read a number of letters from firms and individuals who were unable to attend, announcing subscriptions towards the memorial. There were rounds of cheering when the subscriptions from the schools in Lucknow were read. Mr. Ross Scott was kept busy for at least an hour in announcing the subscriptions as they were made, and it was 2 P.M. before the meeting broke up, the vote of thanks to the chair being proposed by Mirza Mahomed Abbas and seconded by Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan, amid great cheering. It was subsequently ascertained that a sum of Rs. 73,333-5-0 had been collected, including the donation of Raja Tassaduq Rasul Khan. With the Rs. 13,200 which came from the people of Lucknow at the meeting of 7th December, Lucknow's total contribution amounts to the handsome sum of Rs. 86,533. The local committee intend holding meetings in the various wards on the 10th instant when it is hoped the subscriptions will be brought up to at least a lakh of rupees. In the meantime subscriptions from the city and district of Lucknow should be sent to Munshi Prag Narain Bhargava, Honorary Treasurer of the Local Committee. The committee look forward to subscriptions from such of the European firms in Lucknow who have not yet subscribed, and we feel sure they will not look in vain. The detailed list of subscribers will be published in our next issue.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince and Princess of Wales reached Peshawar from Lahore at ten this morning and drove through Barra Bazaar, which was most effectively decorated, to Gorkhatri, the former Afghan and Sikh citadel, where an address was presented by the representatives of the North-West Frontier Province and the Municipal Commissioners of Peshawar, to which the Prince replied. There was a large gathering of Chiefs and Darbaris of the Frontier Province, including the Mehtar of Chitral and the Khan of Dir.

Lahore was effectively illuminated when Their Royal Highnesses left the city last night, and there was a great gathering in the neighbourhood of the station to witness their departure. Peshawar, which could not be visited thirty years ago by the King, was reached this morning by the Prince and Princess precisely at the pre-arranged hour. The Royal visit to this frontier city is one of considerable political and historical importance, and the arrangements which have been made to make the visit successful are of the most admirable character. Elaborate and most effective preparations had been made to indicate the memorable nature of the occasion, and outwardly at any rate the Peshawar bazaar was at pains to display its recognition of what was meant by the first visit of the Heir-Apparent to the British Throne to the Indian borderland. The reception of Their Royal Highnesses at the railway station was in accordance with the customary ceremonial. The station was prettily decorated, and the gathering of Civil and Military Officials included Colonel Deane, Agent to the Governor-General, and Lieutenant-General Sir Edmond Barrow, Commanding the Peshawar Division, with their staffs, and the heads of departments. The Prince wore his General's uniform, and after the introductions Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to their carriages and the procession went straight to the Gorkhatri. The route lay by the north city or Godown Road through the Edwardes Gate and the Barra Bazaar which the Gorkhatri commands. The troops lining the road were the Royal Highlanders, the Gordon Highlanders, their battalions extending well into the bazaar, and the 28th Dogras, who completed the line up to the gate of Gorkhatri. The broader portions of the route were thickly lined with the picture-que strong-featured people of the north, but in the bazaar the crowd kept within the precincts of their shops and houses, preserving the demeanour of quiet, orderly yet keenly interested spectators. Handsome carpets hung from the windows and covered the verandahs of all the shops. Streamers and most effective flower decorations were hung across the narrow streets, and mottoes of welcome in Pushtu and Urdu abounded. The pupils of the Mission and other schools were gathered at one point, and made a bright show. The Gorkhatri stands somewhat elevated, and looking thence along the line of the decorated bazaar, with its shops crowded with humanity and backed by higher buildings revealing groups of brightly clad women filling the flat roofs, a very vivid picture was obtained. All trade and barter was suspended. The absence of questionable characters had been made certain, and it was Peshawar the picturesque, the reposeful and the expectant that one looked down upon.

Within the grounds of Gorkhatri there waited a notable gathering of Chiefs and Darbaris of the North-West Frontier Province, along with the Municipal Commission of Peshawar. They were seated in a shamiana, awaiting the presentation of an address of welcome jointly from the Provincial Darbaris and the Municipal Commissioners. There were fifty-one Chiefs and Darbaris, all being present except three, who were unable to attend. They were men remarkable for their physique and appearance of strong individuality, and for the most part the simplicity of their attire was in contrast to the gorgeousness of Central India and Rajputana. The Mehtar of Chitral occupied the premier position among the Darbaris, and beside him sat the Khan of Dir and next to him the Nawab of Nawagai, who has recently had trouble caused by fratricidal differences.

The scene of the meeting between the Prince and these Chiefs is a place believed to have been built by Noor Mahal, and has been used as an official residence by successive Governments. The Prince and Princess arrived escorted by the 16th Cavalry, and the 38th Dogras furnished the Guard-of-Honour in the grounds. At the entrance to the shamiana the Deputy Commissioners of the Province and other civil officers were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, and on reaching the dais the address of welcome was presented. The address was read by Khan Abdul Ghafur, Khan of Zaida, who is also the Divisional Judge of Jhelum. It states that the representatives of the North-West Frontier Province and the members of the Peshawar Municipality offered Their Royal Highnesses a most loyal, dutiful and heartfelt welcome to the capital of their Province. It was to them a source of deepest pride and gratification that Their Royal Highnesses had been graciously pleased to include that capital in the programme of their Indian tour. These feelings were intensified by the knowledge that this was the first occasion upon which they had been accorded the supreme privilege of welcoming the Heir to Throne of the British Empire in company with his most gracious and Royal Lady, to whom they humbly offered their deepest loyalty and affection. They also welcomed the happy circumstances attending Their Royal Highnesses' auspicious visit to the Khyber, through which, stated the address, in the past, kings and conquerors have advanced bringing battle and plunder in their train, which now, under the beneficent protection of His Majesty the King-Emperor, affect us not, and disturbances from foes have given place to security and order, tranquility and rest. The address was illuminated and enclosed in a silver casket. The Prince in reply said:—

"Gentlemen.—I thank you on behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself for the sincere, frank words with which you welcome us to the North-West Frontier Province. I shall communicate your loyal and grateful assurances to my dear father the King-Emperor. It was one of the regrets of his Indian visit that he was unable to see Peshawar, but thirty years ago there was no railway to your interesting and important city. There have been many other changes in the country across the Indus since my father visited India, and I am rejoiced to learn that those changes have tended towards your happiness and prosperity. Security and order are blessings for which we may all be thankful, and I have little fear that in this free hardy country 'tranquillity and rest' will impair the manly qualities of the Pathan. The Princess and I fervently pray that the peace which you now enjoy may long continue. You are the wardens of the passes, and from far across the seas the British people watch you with sympathy and confidence."

At the conclusion of His Royal Highness's speech the Darbaris were presented by Colonel Deane and all tendered nazzars, which were touched and remitted. Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the gateway and, ascending to the roof of Gorkhatri, obtained a splendid view of Peshawar City and the country around. Descending from the terrace they drove to Government House, seeing much to interest them on the way, from the camel caravan which had just come through the Khyber to the varied human types crowding the thoroughfares. At Government House Their Royal Highnesses were received by Mrs. Deane. Later in the day they attended a garden party, when Colonel and Mrs. Deane were "at home." A banquet is being held to-night. To-morrow afternoon Their Royal Highnesses will inspect the Peshawar exhibits, and drive through Cantonments. On Monday they visit Landi Kotal, leaving Peshawar after midnight.

The garden party held in the grounds of Government House this afternoon was a most interesting and successful function.

Colonel and Mrs. Deane were "at home," and there was a large gathering, the Chiefs and Darbaris of the Frontier Province being present. The Prince and Princess appeared on the lawn shortly after three o'clock, and stayed for nearly two hours.

The Princess wore a costume of pale blue. Many of those present were introduced to Their Royal Highnesses, but the chief interest centred in the presentation of the Frontier Chiefs and head men.

Stalwart old warriors many of them were, each with a history that might be read in the powerful frames and strong features of the sons of Anak. Prominent among them was the old Mashud leader, Mahni Khan, to whose influence most of the turbulence for many years among the Mahsud Waziris has been ascribed. A man so old that his age has almost become legendary, Mahni Khan is still a tall upright figure, black-browed, and as rugged looking as a crag. His strong jaws are falling in, but his heavy brow, strong nose and keen eye give a dour expression to the lined face. Wrapped in a dull red quilted coat, and his head covered with a huge black turban, he presented an air of stern independence, or it may have been just the pose of a grim-visaged saturnine philosopher. More than in any other feature of the gathering, he and his associates appeared to be interested in the pipers of the Black Watch and the Gordon Highlanders, who paraded and played their wild music in the grounds. The brass bands of the regiments were also in attendance and played admirably. The Chiefs and Darbaris who were present at Gorkhatri in the morning were also present at the garden party, with the exception of the Nawab of Amb, who attended the Darbar though suffering from paralysis. All appeared to be greatly impressed and pleased, and beamed with amiability—all with exception of the grim old Mahsud Waziri, who is too old to smile and whose visage can reflect only the calm of exhausted turbulence or resemble the stern lava-lined sides of an extinct volcano.

While the gathering included many who had opposed us in frontier warfare and had been at enmity with each other in tribal feud, it also included veterans who had done good service for us in the Punjab. In contrast to the dark-browed Mahsud Waziri was the burly and genial figure of a man of eighty years who, despite a remarkable career as police officer all over the borderland, looked no more than sixty. He wore the Mutiny medal with the Delhi clasp, and proudly displayed a gold watch and chain given to him by the King-Emperor during the Royal tour in India thirty years ago.

Sunday has been quietly observed. This morning the Prince and Princess drove to church, and in the afternoon they inspected the Peshawar wares brought to Government House for them to see. Shortly after four the Prince, accompanied by General Barrow, and attended by an escort of the 16th Cavalry, drove through Cantonments. This evening Their Royal Highnesses dined quietly at Government House. To-morrow they visit the Khyber, lunching at Landi Kotal, and the Maliks will be presented at Ali Masjid. This historic visit is being anticipated with much interest.

Times.—The expedition through the Khyber Pass to Lundi Kotal, which overlooks the Afghan border, has brought the Royal visit to Peshawar to a successful conclusion today.

Even so extended a tour as that which Their Royal Highnesses have undertaken cannot include every place of interest, historical or actual, in India, but a visit to the Khyber Pass could not possibly be omitted. In the whole length and breadth of the Heir-Apparent's future dominions this wild borderland of North-Western India is absolutely unique. Elsewhere may be found mountain fastnesses equally stern and forbidding, peopled by hardy and turbulent races equally impatient of the trammels of modern civilization. But nowhere is the contrast so sharp between the orderly lines of settled government and the untutored license of primitive social organisms as in this rugged belt of country, commonly called the "Independent Territory," which extends beyond the limits of direct British administration to the southern frontiers of Afghanistan as defined in the Durand Agreement of 1893.

Great as is the flexibility with which British statesmanship has constantly adapted the maintenance of British paramount power to the peculiar idiosyncrasies of the countless peoples brought under its sway, nowhere is there, I think, any parallel to the régime adopted in this "Independent Territory." British laws are not enforced upon the tribes; no attempt has been made to introduce British administrators, and, least of all, the revenue officer, into their rock-girt valleys. They are left absolutely free to govern themselves according to their tribal customs, and even to settle their own feuds according to tribal practice. All that the Government of India requires of them is that within certain well-defined limits they shall recognise and help to maintain the sanctity of the Pax Britannica. For this much the tribes are responsible, but not only do they receive subsidies in return for the proper discharge of those responsibilities, but it is upon the tribes themselves that we rely for the only organized forces by which this régime is secured. In the "Independent Territory" there are no British troops, but only a frontier militia drilled and commanded by a few British officers, but recruited exclusively from amongst the tribesmen themselves. Such in mere rough outline is the system evolved by Lord Curzon which, with the creation of the new frontier province, has secured the peace of a turbulent region where, only ten years ago, a large British force was engaged in none too successful warfare, and has secured it during his tenure of office on lines of economy and stability unknown under his predecessors. Unpleasant incidents will occur, such as the attack only two nights ago on the Samana post by a band of outlaws; and the murder of Captain Donaldson last month at Bannu was unquestionably a serious reminder of the persistency of the methods of Waziri fanaticism. But on the whole, as Lord Curzon said in his farewell speech at the Byculla Club, quoting Colonel Deane, the Agent-General for the Frontier Province, than whom there is no higher official authority, the situation on the frontier, from Hunza and Chitral to the Khyber and the Kuram, and away into Baluchistan, can be summed up in the one word, "confidence." But if that confidence is to endure, it must not be forgotten that there are, and must continue to be for many a long day, explosive elements all along the frontier which it would be easy to ignite if the principles which, as Lord Curzon observed, have been so carefully laid down with regard to the tribal militia, or border military police, or frontier roads and railways, or tribal control were lightly abandoned or departed from. This is not the time or the place to discuss the larger questions of frontier policy, to which I hope to return on a future occasion, but it may be well at once to put in those few words of warning, as schemes are already said to be on foot which, if hastily sanctioned, might bring the reign of peace to a sudden and inauspicious close all along the frontier.

Of the results which the present policy has achieved, the Khyber Pass affords a striking illustration. The boundary of British administration is drawn about nine miles north of Peshawar, at the foot of the rugged mountain barrier which separates the plains of Northern India from the highland plateaus of Afghanistan. A mile and a half beyond that boundary, at the southern entrance to the pass itself, stands the fort of Jamrud. Half way across it, where precipitous mountain walls tower to a height of four and five thousand feet over the narrow defile, the fort of Ali Masjid crowns a lofty pinnacle of rock, and at the further end, about 34 miles altogether from Peshawar, the fort of Lundi Kotal commands the northern end of the pass, where it opens out on to the valley of the Kabul river, and overlooks the highlands of Afghanistan right away to the Hindu Kush and the snows of Kafiristan. All these three forts together with the chain of small blockhouses joining them up are committed to the care of the Khyber Rifles, a frontier militia under the command of Colonel Ross-Keppele, who is at the same time Political Officer for the Khyber, and there is no keener body of men, none more devoted to their officers, none more loyal to their trust than these smart soldierly hillsmen. Yet the Khyber rifleman is the same dare-devil Afridi who has so often held the pass not for, but against us, and whose name is writ large in the annals of our border warfare, the same wild tribesman whose every-day life even now, until the moment he donned his uniform or from the moment he quits it, be it only for a few weeks' furlough, presents the strangest contrast conceivable to the habits of obedience and methods of discipline he cheerfully accepts during his term of service. Quick-witted and full of imagination, though profoundly ignorant, as we reckon knowledge, prompt to fierce outbursts of passion, and yet capable of equally generous impulses, one wonders what thoughts cross the mind of this untutored child of nature as, keen-eyed and alert, he guards the crests of his native hills, as rugged and wild as himself, whilst the Shahzadeh, the son of the King-Emperor whose uniform he wears, passes along the winding road beneath, which to him is the supreme symbol of the far-off Western world of orderliness and peace, combined with indisputable power, which he has learnt to dread and even to respect, but not yet to understand.

There were many picturesque incidents to-day, such as the inspecting of the guard-of-honour at Lundi Kotal, which, like Their Royal Highnesses' escort, was furnished by the Khyber Rifles, who pride themselves on being the smartest corps among the frontier levies, and a splendid piece of skirmishing up a steep bit of cliff which gave the Prince an idea of their wonderful cragsmanship. But the most characteristic incident was the reception at Ali Masjid of representative Afridi Maliks, the headmen of the Zakka-khels and Kukki-khels, and other warlike tribes of the Khyber and the surrounding mountain fastnesses. They were only ten in number, but were able together to control some 25,000 fighting men. Each addressed a few words of Royal welcome to the Prince, one blind patriarch asking permission, as he could not see his Royal master, to touch his hand, and each brought an offering of sheep as the customary symbol of tribute, which the Prince graciously remitted. Altogether it was a memorable day in the annals of the Khyber.

The Royal party leaves at midnight for Rawalpindi to attend the manoeuvres and the grand review of the army. Though the manoeuvres, as is inevitable in such circumstances, are mainly spectacular, every movement and every incident having been carefully arranged beforehand, they will constitute a splendid military pageant on the largest scale ever witnessed in India.

Times of India.—The following is an extract from an address that was presented by fifty Punjabi ladies of high rank to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales:—

"Your Royal Highness is the first Princess of Wales who has set her foot on Indian soil, and we hail to have you, our future Queen, in our midst. We also never fail to remember that Your Royal Highnesses are descendants of that beloved and illustrious Sovereign whose name will ever stand as a synonym of the noblest womanhood. It is to her love for the suffering women of India that we owe that noteworthy institution, the Dufferin Fund; to her benevolent rule is due the great progress of female education all over India.

"Your Royal Highness, the Punjabis have been known and have proved themselves to be most loyal and brave subjects of the King-Emperor's dominion in India, but the women of the Punjab, too, have been known to be no less true to the cause of their King and country, and they consider it their proud privilege to be mothers and wives of the brave and heroic men of the British army of the Punjab."

Ten thousand poor people will be banqueted at Delhi on the 13th instant, in celebration of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the cost being defrayed by public subscription.

Hindus and Mahomedans will unite.

The work of constructing the amphitheatre for the Indian entertainment to be held on the Calcutta maidan during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was taken in hand a week ago and already satisfactory progress has been made. The work is in charge of Lieutenant G. Trusler, Public Works Department. The amphitheatre is being constructed in the form of a horse-shoe on a plot of the maidan north of the Victoria Memorial. The whole amphitheatre, with the exception of the gallery for seats, which is formed of masonry, is being built of wood and will be covered over with plaster, so that when completed it will form an imposing structure. It will be surmounted by numerous towers and domes, and mast-heads on which pennons and flags will float.

Seating arrangements will be carried out on the same principle as at Delhi, the place being divided into blocks. Special roads are being made connecting the opening of the amphitheatre which faces the north with broad roads on the maidan. The amphitheatre will be finished in another fortnight's time. A large staff consisting of 200 Chinamen carpenters, nearly 1,000 coolies and 300 or 400 masons are working from 7 A.M. to midnight to complete the work in time.

The following supplementary note regarding the arrangements proposed for the entertainment on the Calcutta maidan on 2nd January 1906, during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, has been issued:

The Red Road will be decorated by Government for the State procession on the 29th December, and these decorations will remain during the stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta.

From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance to the place of entertainment on the Grass Ride the route will be decorated in the following manner:—

Across the Casuarina Avenue, from the Dufferin Statue southwards, there will be a succession of triumphal arches in the form of "tapestry" suspended from high masts. Between these masts at frequent intervals will be smaller poles bearing suitable devices.

These pieces of "tapestry," which are to be of Oriental design, are being painted by hand under the immediate supervision of Signor Ghilardi.

At the junction of Kidderpore Road with the Casuarina Avenue, the procession will pass through a handsome pavilion with open sides. A similar pavilion will be erected on the Grass Ride at the spot where Their Royal Highnesses will alight from the carriage.

From the Dufferin Statue to the entrance pavilion the road will be lined by 1,000 retainers lent by various Indian noblemen. These retainers will carry maces, silver sticks, spears, etc., and on the return journey will light the road for Their Royal Highnesses with 1,000 torches.

The pavilion will be gaily decorated with flags and bunting and the Royal dais will be covered with a rich canopy of red, embroidered in gold, the front fringe of which will have the Prince of Wales's feathers and motto in white silk in the centre with the Star of India and the Order of the Indian Empire on either side.

In each corner will be a peacock picked out in jewels. This canopy will be supported by four silver pillars.

The pavilion will be illuminated without and within by electric light and will have the Royal Arms brilliantly lit at the highest point.

The pavilion will be divided into blocks and behind each block will be a shamiana for refreshments.

Both tanks will be outlined with coloured chirags, and the western bank of the Serpentine Tank and the surface of the tank itself will be brilliantly illuminated by men brought down from Murshidabad for the purpose.

The whole of that portion of the maidan which is bounded by the Outram Avenue on the north, by Chowringhee and the Cathedral Road on the east, by the Casuarina Avenue on the west and by the Grass Ride on the south will be hung with thousands of lamps, and it is believed that the Bengal Club, the Army and Navy Stores and other buildings in that portion of Chowringhee will also be illuminated on that evening.

The bands of the 15th Hussars, the King's Own and the Town Band have already been engaged. The Town Band will support the choir of 500 children who will sing "God Bless the Prince of Wales" under the direction of Mr. Slater, the Cathedral Organist. The other two bands will play during the entertainment.

6TH DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The first visit of a Prince and Princess of Wales to the Khyber was as quiet and peaceful a progress as if it had been through the Alps instead of the most troublesome region in the world. Except for the presence of the frontier guards and posts, there was absolutely nothing to indicate that fifty yards beyond the margin of the road every man carries his life in his hands and is never safe beyond the protection of his walls. Of course, these peaceful indications were very much on the surface. Fourteen hundred Khyber Riflemen were posted on the route, and thousands of village picquets. But one remarkable feature in the composition of this guard should not escape notice. It was entirely composed of the people of the country through which the road runs. The escort, the guard, the picquet were Afridis and their kinsmen without a British sabre except those of the handful of British officers to the force. Colonel Deane recently described the new frontier policy as one of confidence. Could there have been a greater mark of confidence than this?

The work of constructing an amphitheatre for the Indian entertainment on the Calcutta maidan during the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales was taken in hand a week ago, and already satisfactory progress has been made. The work is in charge of Lieutenant G. Trusler, Public Works Department. The amphitheatre is being constructed in the form of a horse-shoe on a plot of the maidan north of the Victoria Memorial. The seating arrangements will be carried out on the same principle as at Delhi, the place being divided into blocks. Special roads are being made connecting the opening of the amphitheatre, which faces north, with the broad roads on the maidan. The amphitheatre will be finished in another fortnight's time, a large staff consisting of 200 Chinamen carpenters, nearly 1,000 coolies, and 300 or 400 masons working from 7 A.M. to midnight to complete the work in time.

Civil and Military Gazette.—A correspondent writes from Jammu:—The camp, pitched at Satwari, which is the cantonment near here for the Prince and Princess of Wales, is well nigh ready. The bungalow known as Satwari House has been re-furnished for Their Royal Highnesses, the staff and others being accommodated in a huge camp, lit throughout by the electric light. An imposing arch has been erected at the entrance to the camp and another, a permanent structure, at the city gates. Raja Sir Amar Singh has pushed things on energetically; his Private Secretary, Dewan Bishen Das, working hard, and Mr. Campbell, the Divisional Engineer, has done the laying out of the camp and its decoration. The ladies of the Residency have been very busy in seeing to the interior arrangement of the tents in camp. The task has been almost doubled owing to the Royal camp having to be removed for His Excellency the Viceroy to Jammu. The Resident with his staff are in camp at Satwari. His Highness the Maharaja returned to Jammu from Godavari on December 1st. The programme for next Saturday and Sunday is as follows:—Their Royal Highnesses are timed to arrive at Satwari at 9 A.M.; His Highness the Maharaja will pay his visit at 11-30 and the return visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is fixed for 4-30 P.M. There will be a State banquet at 8 P.M. On Sunday the 10th instant Their Royal Highnesses and staff will attend Divine Service in the Darbar Tent. The Bishop of Lahore will officiate, and Mr. Burroughs, the State Bandmaster, will preside at the organ. The Prince and Princess of Wales leave Jammu at 10-30 on Sunday evening.

Daily Telegraph.—The manoeuvres at Rawalpindi were attended by the Prince and Princess of Wales to-day. The general idea is that a strong hostile force from across the Indus attempts to seize Rawalpindi before reinforcements can arrive. The cavalry screens of the two opposing forces met in a charge to-day in the presence of Their Royal Highnesses. The scene rather gained than lost in impressiveness from the huge sea of dust which concealed everything from view except the general impression of moving masses of horsemen and the glint of spears as soon as the order to gallop was received.

The northern force continued its advance, and to-morrow 56,000 men will be engaged in assaulting and defending the Margalla Pass, the scene of one of John Nicholson's victories and the site of the obelisk in his honour.

A grand review at Rawalpindi will conclude the work of the week, which will gain additional interest because it will be attended by the Tashi Lama and his suite.

Englishman.—The Calcutta Port Commissioners have arranged, with reference to the arrival of the Prince and Princess of Wales, to moor the Commissioners' vessels in line on one side of the channel, and that the vessels conveying Their Royal Highnesses shall be preceded by one of the Commissioners' boats only, namely, the Waterwitch, with Police launches to keep the channel clear. A circular letter has been addressed to the owners, agents, and captains of vessels in Port on the day of the Royal arrival requesting them to have their vessels dressed on the occasion, and it is understood that orders have already been issued for the decoration of the Commissioners' own offices, of the River Bank at Ramkrishnapore and above and below Prinsep's Ghat, where Their Royal Highnesses will disembark and be received by the Corporation of Calcutta.

For weeks past all the roads leading to Rawalpindi have been crowded with armed men and choked with greyish dust. From the north and the south, the east and the west, have come horse and foot, guns and transport, until there is now assembled in the neighbourhood of Rawalpindi an armed host of nearly fifty-five thousand fighting men, the pick of India's military forces. All these days they have been marching into position. Last night they were launched against each other and opened with a dashing cavalry action, the biggest combined manoeuvres that have ever been held in this country. Something of the Army in India has already been seen by the Prince and Princess of Wales at various stages of their tour. They have seen smart cavalry escorts, horse, artillery, Imperial Service cavalry and camelry. But to-day they saw, under the aegis of the Commander-in-Chief, the advanced forces of two great armies, commanded by able generals, well tried in war, meet in mimic combat under conditions approximating as nearly as possible to those which would obtain on active service, and carried away the liveliest appreciation of the splendid military machine which lies at the service of the State in India.

General ideas and special ideas do not convey much to the reader who has not a detailed manoeuvre map before him, but it may be possible in a few sentences broadly to indicate the principle underlying these great operations. They presuppose the existence of two kingdoms, one north of Rawalpindi and one south, which have been bickering for some time and preparing for war. The northern kingdom being ready first suddenly declares war, and throwing its army, commanded by Sir Archibald Hunter, across the Indus makes a rapid advance on Rawalpindi, in the hope of capturing that great arsenal. The southern army, commanded by Sir Alfred Gaselee, being in danger of having its communications with Pindi cut, hurries forward to hold the Margalla Hills, which command the approach to the town, pending the arrival of the large reinforcements that are being pushed up from Jhelum and Lahore; the northern army at this time numbering 30,000 men, and the southern army 24,250. Out of this arose the special idea of to-day's movements. The Northern Cavalry learning that the enemy's horse were covering the road to Pindi, it became their duty to advance and clear the way for the main body.

And now a few words as to the theatre of war. It is a broad open plain, typical of much of Northern India and of much of Afghanistan too, once the southern passes are crossed. To the north and south this plain is bounded by modest hills, pierced by comparatively easy passes. This plain, like most in Northern India, comprises two widely differing characteristics. To the east it is good open country, well suited to the operations of cavalry; to the west it is intersected by innumerable nullahs of the true Rawalpindi type; just rideable for single horsemen, but absolutely impracticable for any large mounted body. Now behind the general idea lay this dominating idea. The manoeuvres were not designed to create any remarkable strategical situations. The general strategical situations were fixed, but out of them arose a series of tactical problems for the brigadiers to solve on the spot; thus continuing Lord Kitchener's system of training, which began with the thorough instruction of the regimental units. As the cavalry had to come into contact the point of combat was clearly indicated by the terrain and the distance dividing the opposing forces, and was a little more than three miles from the Commander-in-Chief's camp at Sarai Kala. Accordingly the Royal train was halted at Hassan Abdal, where the Prince and Princess were met by Lord Kitchener. His Royal Highness and Lord Kitchener rode off to a selected vantage point; the Princess of Wales, with Lady Shaftesbury in attendance, following on a lordly elephant with gorgeous trappings of cloth of gold.

Twelve cavalry regiments and the four batteries of horse artillery joined in combat in the operations of the morning, and they were pretty evenly distributed between General Locke Elliot, of the Northern Army, and General Haig, who commands the Southern Cavalry. But with an equality of force the task ascribed to General Locke Elliot was incomparably the harder, indeed it was almost impossible, but not quite. He did not attain his end, and not that only, but was held by the umpires to have been rolled up by his opponent. The manner of it was in this wise. The advanced force of the Southern Cavalry were holding the Chagru Valley, and General Locke Elliot tried several crossings, at which he was checked. He then brought up the whole of his force, before whom General Haig had to withdraw. In so doing he laid a neat little trap. He threw his horse artillery out to the left and concealed two squadrons dismounted in a nullah. The Northern Cavalry dropped on to the two squadrons and were received by a galling fire. Then they were caught on the flank by the horse artillery and severely rounded before their own guns could come into action. The scene as the two bodies joined in the final shock was extremely fine and only marred by the dense clouds of dust which hid the combatants from view, as soon as the leading lines passed. The advantage was held to lie with General Haig and the Northern Cavalry were ordered to retire three miles. The operations were watched with intense interest by the Prince and Princess, Lord Kitchener and the staff, and His Royal Highness warmly complimented the Commander-in-Chief upon the conduct of the manoeuvres.

This concluded the main business of the morning, and after lunch the Prince made slowly across country with Lord Kitchener to camp, whilst the Princess motored to the station and there took the train to Rawalpindi. But the interest in the manoeuvres was by no means over, even for the day. General Gaselee threw his infantry on to the Nargalla ridge, where they dug themselves in with feverish activity. To protect them whilst entrenching he pushed three brigades of infantry through the pass under the shadow of the monument to the heroic John Nicholson. They came trudging along the Grand Trunk Road, the Queen's in knickerbockers and putties, the sombre Sikhs, the stout, active Gurkhas in their new smasher hats, all powdered as white as millers and moving amidst a choking cloud of dust.

There was some pretty work between the advanced posts of the two armies in the plain in the late afternoon, which brought the cavalry and horse artillery into play, but the Southern force were entrenched and the horse and guns fell back to their bivouac to prepare for the big business of the morrow.

The situation for to-morrow is full of interest. The advanced posts of the Northern and Southern Armies are bivouacked on the plains, their picquets being almost in touch with one another. General Gaselee's main body is strongly entrenched on the Nargalla ridge, which commands the road to Rawalpindi, but Rawalpindi is Sir Archibald's objective and to reach it he must apparently do one of three things: either crush the enemy's centre, which owing to the strength of the position would be an extremely difficult task; turn his right through a pass which is known to be well guarded; or march round his left. None of these courses is easy, indeed General Gaselee's position is a much better one to hold than to attack and it will be most instructive to see what the resourceful General makes of this most unpromising tactical problem. It is not at all improbable that the operations will close with a night attack upon the Southern entrenchments.

His Royal Highness is the guest of the Commander-in-Chief in a well-arranged camp in the manoeuvres area and will be a spectator of to-morrow's operations. Her Royal Highness, meanwhile, is staying in a second camp at Rawalpindi. After the conclusion of to-morrow's action the troops will march into Pindi, ready for the great review of December 8th, when 50,000 men of all arms will march past the Prince. These manoeuvres are being carried out in a spirit of stern reality, the troops marching hard and bivouacking in the open, which in this Northern India cold is not to be lightly esteemed.

The following is the programme of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Jammu next Saturday and Sunday:— Their Royal Highnesses are timed to arrive at Satwari at 9 A.M. The Maharaja will pay his visit at 11-30 and the return visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is fixed for 4-30 P.M. There will be a State banquet at 8 P.M. On Sunday, the 10th instant, Their Royal Highnesses and Staff will attend Divine Service in the Darbar tent. The Bishop of Lahore will officiate. The Prince and Princess leave Jammu at 10-30 on Sunday evening.

Indian Daily News.—It is understood that it has been practically decided that the Prince and Princess of Wales will not visit Simla in March. A halt may possibly be made at Bahawalpur in order to break the long journey from Aligarh to Quetta.

Their Royal Highnesses reached the manœuvres camp this morning. The Prince left the train at Hasan Abdal, where he was met by Lord Kitchener, and drove by the Grand Trunk Road to the neighbourhood of Budho, where the Princess joined him from the Royal train. The manœuvres had begun during the night and the advanced Cavalry of the Northern and Southern Armies came into contact this morning. The meeting of the Cavalry was witnessed by Their Royal Highnesses from a hill beneath which a charge took place. The Northern Cavalry had advanced east during the night, and the Southern Cavalry had come northward. After witnessing the charge the Princess proceeded by train to Rawalpindi, the Prince going on to the manœuvre camp. The general idea of the manœuvres is that a Northern force invading, having completed its mobilization, crosses the Indus at daybreak on the 4th December; on that day the mobilization of the Southern forces is still incomplete. A concentration is in progress at Rawalpindi—an important arsenal, but inferior in numbers to the strength of the Northern forces already in the field, while large reinforcements, which will ultimately be available from Jhelum and Lahore, cannot arrive for some days. Two Infantry divisions and one division of Cavalry with divisional and corps troops are engaged on each side, amounting in all to about 25,000 men in each army. The aim of the Southern Army is to prevent the enemy reaching Rawalpindi before the arrival of reinforcements. The Southern Cavalry were this morning on the Babudra river holding the line Jhang, Tharibaiti, Thatch Khalil, the idea being that a regiment of Native Cavalry has been left to hold Margalla Pass until the arrival of the Infantry. The object of the Northern Army is to capture Rawalpindi before the arrival of reinforcements there. The conditions governing the movements of the Northern Army are that, having crossed the Indus, they reached Burshan this morning. The country in which the manœuvres are taking place is encircled by hills and is much broken by nullahs.

The first day of the manœuvres has been one entirely of Cavalry operations. After the mounted arms had come into contact this morning, the Southern Cavalry at noon attacked and drove off the force of the invaders. In the afternoon the Northern Cavalry advanced in force; the Southern had come upon some of the Northern Cavalry watering their horses and showed front, but the main body of the Northerners coming up the Southerners began a retirement. They rode off under cover of their guns, but the Northern batteries quickly came into action and opened fire on the enemy. The advancing Cavalry were reinforced by the appearance of the Infantry, and the Southerners continued to fall back until they came in touch with their Infantry, who had been occupying the line of hills to the south of Kalaki Serai. As the Southern Infantry emerged and entered the order was passed for the Cavalry operations to cease. What little of the spectacle of the retreating and advancing Cavalry as could be seen through the clouds of dust was very pretty, and operations were suspended in the interesting situation that the Southern Cavalry had been compelled to retire and the Infantry of the opposing armies bivouacked in anticipation of the fight to-morrow. The Southern Infantry hold a line in front of a range of hills behind Kalaki Serai. The country over which the manœuvres are taking place is excellently adapted for the purpose; the wide plain, in which nullahs abound, and which is intersected by the Grand Trunk Road, being enclosed by ranges of hills.

The manœuvres are being directed by Lord Kitchener, Sir Bindon Blood being the Deputy Director. Sir Archibald Hunter commands the Northern Army and Sir A. Gaselee the Southern. The chief Umpires are Major-General Collins with the Northern and Major General Henry with the Southern Force. The Divisional Commanders are:—Northern Cavalry—Major-General Sir E. Locke Elliot; Southern—Major-General Douglas Haig. Infantry—Northern—Lieutenant-General Sir Edmund Barrow and Major-General F. W. Kitchener; Southern—Major-General Woodhouse and Major-General Sir O'Moore Creagh.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrive at Jammu next Saturday morning and will be accommodated in "Satwari House" in the Cantonment. Visits will be exchanged with the Maharaja during the day, and a State banquet will be held in the evening. Their Royal Highnesses will attend service on Sunday in the Darbar tent, conducted by the Bishop of Lahore, and will depart the same night. To commemorate the visit an imposing permanent arch has been erected at the city gates.

The Honorary Colonel of the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteers Corps, on forwarding a copy of the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteer Annual for 1906, to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, has received the following very gracious reply, which must be very gratifying to Commander E. W. Petley and the officers and men of the Corps:—"I have received from Major-General Beatson, and laid before the Prince of Wales, the copy of the Annual Report forwarded by the Lieutenant-Governor as Honorary Colonel of the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteer Corps. His Royal Highness begs that His Honour will be good enough to express His Royal Highness's thanks for the book, and also his congratulations to the Corps on their having won the Prince of Wales' Shield for Ambulance work in the first year of competition for the same."

Previous to His Royal Highness the Prince's departure for Peshawar from Lahore on the night of 1st instant, a railway collision occurred between the Bombay Mail and a troop special. The latter, which was coming in from Mian Mir, ran into the mail starting for Bombay. A few passengers were injured, among them being His Highness the Maharaja Pertab Singh of Idar, who got off with a severe shaking, but his servant is seriously injured. Prior to starting His Royal Highness the Prince summoned Mr. Holloway, the Station Superintendent, and expressed his appreciation of the arrangements for the comfort of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales and himself, and presented Mr. Holloway with a pair of gold sleeve links with His Royal Highness's monogram and plumes.

Madras Mail.—The manœuvres have commenced. The general idea is that the Northern Force was across the Indus at daybreak, having completed its organisation. The mobilisation of the Southern Forces is still incomplete. A concentration is in progress at Rawalpindi. The Southern Force are in possession of an important arsenal, but are in fewer numbers than the strength of the Northern Forces already in the field. Large reinforcements will arrive from Jhelum and Lahore. Fifty-seven thousand men are engaged in these manœuvres.

Delhi is busy preparing for the Royal visitors. The Circuit House, where they will be accommodated, has been refurnished and decorated. The leading Hindus and Mahomedans have subscribed to give 10,000 poor a feast on the occasion.

Pioneer.—Saharanpur, 3rd December. A representative public meeting of the principal residents of Saharanpur District was convened to-day in connection with the Medical College scheme. Owing to the Collector's unavoidable absence in camp, Mr. Phelps, Joint Magistrate, took the chair and explained the object of the meeting. He assured the audience that the movement was an entirely spontaneous and non-official one. Pandit Mohan Lal, Barrister, and Moulvi Abdullajan, Pleader, then spoke, impressing upon the meeting the necessity of helping in the establishment of the proposed College, which would supply a real want and be a fitting memorial. Khan Sahib Naim Khan, Lala Joti Prasad of Jagadri and Pandit Mohan Lal were then appointed Chairman, Treasurer and Secretary of the Saharanpur Sub-Committee for collecting subscriptions. Rs. 4,000 was subscribed on the spot, and more is expected.

A public meeting was held last evening at the Town Hall to raise subscriptions for the proposed Medical College to be founded at Lucknow as a memorial of the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to the United Provinces, and Rs. 1,053 were subscribed on the spot. The subscription list was not closed when the meeting dispersed.

Pioneer.—The Prince, Princess and Suite attended Divine Service in the church this morning (3rd December). In the afternoon the Prince, accompanied by General Barrow, Commanding the Peshawar Division, drove through Cantonments. The 21st Cavalry furnished a travelling escort, and the roads were kept by the police. The station is well wooded and the compounds are neatly kept, but Peshawar is not seen at its best now as the season of roses has not come round, when the whole place blossoms into one beautiful garden.

Visitors who wished to see more of the native city went there in the course of the day and were well repaid by the busy life which they saw. The main street leading from Edwardes Gate was thronged with people, and again, as on Saturday, one recognised how thoroughly Pathan in character Peshawar is, and how just at present the number of men from across the border is larger than usual. They have come in to make holiday and see the Shahzada and Princess, while the petty traders, with their bullocks, donkeys and ponies, are everywhere seen as in normal times. There are hundreds of idle men who saunter carelessly along, loitering at the shops or gathering in curious knots when Europeans stop to make purchases. They are of many classes. All have an independent bearing and some half-insolent looks, due as much to a mistaken sense of their own importance as to any desire to show themselves as not mere peaceful dwellers in the city. Sepoys in undress, distinguishable at once by their carriage; camelmen; travellers who have housed themselves in the serais and are out taking their pleasure; Hazaras with their long handled shovels; nondescripts whom it must be difficult to place—they, may be anything from border villagers to tribesmen from distant parts; Afridis with their keen hawk eyes and the lock of hair canting forward over each ear; vagrant men, women and children who beg with a volubility only equalled by their importunity; and here and there a solitary policeman with bâton in hand and sword at his belt, the only visible sign of the authority which keeps the city in hand; noisy vendors of vegetables and fruit; the melon-seller in his shop who raises a weird hawker's cry as he plies his knife and hands slice after slice to his customers; the braziers ceaselessly hammering as they finish brass or copper vessels; the quiet workers who turn out the beautiful wax-cloth for which Peshawar is famed; other workers, industrious also with needle or sewing machines—all these are in evidence. A few fruit stalls well stocked with apples, pomegranates and grapes break the line of stalls where poshtern fur rugs, embroidered skull caps, kullahs, suzanis, and native clothing of every kind are on sale. The crowd thins out and then deepens again. The clumsy water buffalo loafs along even with a man on his back. A fat tailed sheep or two are slowly piloted through the crowd. A few country dog-carts and a stray carriage, men on horseback, with here and there British officers also riding, make their way through the throng at an easy pace, for the foot passengers here seem to think that the roadway belongs to them solely. One cannot but be struck by the fine stature of many of the men and their easy walk, though the city breed intrudes often enough. Down the narrow winding side streets, with high houses on either hand, there are other streams of life trickling away into the heart of town, but one does not venture into these alleys. They are not attractive; there may just possibly be a lurking danger in some of them. As we are leaving a heavy bullock cart lumbers through the gateway with a man lying in it. A halt is called at the police station just within the gate. A small dooly is brought up, the man is placed in it and he disappears within the courtyard. He may be sick or wounded, but he has had a rough journey in any case and his transfer from cart to dooly was plainly a painful one. Let us hope that he fared comfortably thereafter. It is nearing sunset, but there are no signs of the crowds diminishing, and workers outside the walls are drifting in to their homes as the visitors are taking their leave. One looks up at the small fort, with its mud walls and embrasures empty of cannon on the side facing towards Cantonments, and once more come to mind those stormy times of Sikh rule when Avitabile ground the city to dust and terrorised it with his artillery. Peshawar will be under lock and key at gunfire, but till then traffic and barter go cheerily along, and a handful of police keep order in its streets.

To-day (4th December) the trip into the Khyber has been successfully accomplished and no untoward incident of any kind served to mar the interest and pleasure attaching to the adventure, if such it may be called. The Prince and Princess, with Lady Shaftesbury and most of the members of the Staff, accompanied by Colonel Deane, Chief Commissioner of the Frontier Province, and Mr. Humphreys, his Personal Assistant, drove to the Railway Station, where the Royal train was drawn up. The platform was guarded by a detachment of the Black Watch and Police. Jamrud was reached at 9 o'clock, Wilde's Rifles furnishing a guard there. Major Roos-Keppel, Political Officer in the Khyber, was in waiting at Jamrud, and the Royal party at once entered their carriages for the drive to Lundi Kotal, their escort being thirty sowars of the Khyber Rifles under Lieutenant Muspratt and a Native Officer. The Prince and Princess were in the leading carriage with Colonel Deane, the Staff and Press representatives following in other carriages. Before describing the journey it may not be out of place to say something regarding the region visited.

The Khyber is the most historic of all the Passes which lead from Afghanistan to India, and the warlike tribes which cluster in and about it—Afridis, Shinwaris and Mullagaris—have harried every army which has ventured to enter it from either side. Alexander avoided it, turning off northwards from Jellalabad, and traversing Bajour and Swat in order to reach the Indus, but most probably he afterwards opened a line of communication through it to Dikka. Mahmud of Ghazni chose the Gomal as the best route for his armies, but with those exceptions the tide of Mahomedan invasion set mainly through the Khyber, and the Mogul Emperors rated its possession at a high value. It lay on the main road from Delhi to Kabul and hence its supreme importance. When the Sikhs sprang into power under Ranjit Singh, there was many a fierce struggle in its neighbourhood, for Peshawar was a prize worth fighting for, and the Afghans had to be driven out of the valley and forced back beyond Jamrud into the Khyber hills. Sikh and Pathan were well matched, and the open country about Harisindh-ka-Burj witnessed a memorable battle, in which the former came off conqueror. Later the British Government, which succeeded to the Sikh heritage of bitter hatred and bloody reprisals, learned to know what the Khyber meant. Peaceful missions passed through it, but in the first Kabul War, with its terrible reverses, the Afridi and his neighbours swarmed into the Pass and every mile had to be forced before the heroic garrison of Jellalabad could be relieved. Again in 1878-80 we had to count with the tribesmen and hold the Pass in strength, while punitive columns struck at them in the Bazar Valley. It is an evil thing to have thirty miles in a line of communications infested by as many thousand raiders, who will plunder friend or foe with equal zest should occasion serve, and yet for seventeen years following the second Afghan War the Khyber rested in peace without a single soldier of the regular army beyond Jamrud. The tribal allowances were liberal. The Khyber Rifles gave employment to the best fighting men of the clans, and tranquillity seemed permanently assured. We built a fortified station at Lundi Kotal. Ali Masjid Fort was strong enough to resist an enemy without artillery, and Fort Maude nearer Jamrud was in its small way impregnable. These were held by the corps which had been raised among the tribesmen, and no one suspected that any danger was possible, but there is one great force in the tribal country which sweeps everything before it when it is once set in motion. Fanaticism makes no count of political arrangements, subsidies, or service in irregular corps. When a jihad is preached, such as that of 1897, from end to end of the border every clan must go the way that the tribe as a whole elects to take. The Mullahs had their triumph that year and we lost the Khyber. The flames that leapt up from Fort Maude were seen from Peshawar. Ali Masjid was sacked and Lundi Kotal serai shared a similar fate. It is not necessary to enter into the humiliating history of those few days in the summer of 1897, when all that could be done was to shell Fort Maude from a secure distance. The Afridis were amazed at their own success, and it took months to bring them once more to heel, half whipped only even then. Eventually we swept the Khyber clear after the Tirah-Bara campaign. Its fortified villages were demolished and the towers of Bazar were blown into the air. Then we proceeded to make a new settlement, and to-day we see it in full working order after seven years' maturing. There is a real fort at Lundi Kotal; it is crenellated and loopholed for musketry, it has steel shutters and traverses, and the whole Afridi tribe might break their heads against its walls and bastions without effect so long as the garrison within was staunch, well provisioned and with abundant ammunition, which points, it may be remarked, are always quietly kept in view. At Ali Masjid the old historical fort has been demolished and ugly fortified barracks are alone seen. At intervals all along the Pass are small towers with solid stone basements rising 13 or 20 feet and steel-floored rooms above, provisioned and watered. When the ladder is drawn up each detachment is absolutely secure in its little fortress. It can keep up communication by day and night signalling with its neighbours on either side, and thus should the telegraph wire be cut, news can be sent to and from Lundi Kotal and Jamrud. The reorganised Khyber Rifles, now between 1,700 and 1,800 strong, hold these posts with their headquarters at Jamrud and strong companies at Lundi Kotal, and it was to their guardianship to-day that the Royal party was entrusted, Major Roos-Koppel, Political Officer in the Khyber, and Commandant of the Corps, being responsible for all arrangements.

These arrangements were very complete in every way. There were some 1,400 infantry of the Khyber Rifles on duty, the road and the adjacent heights being picquetted, while at every block house was a small detachment, and a half Company on the road below Ali Masjid. Moreover, the several headmen of the tribes had undertaken the task of placing picquets on the outer ranges to the south, and probably two or three thousand men were engaged keeping watch and ward in this direction. The most important section was in the neighbourhood of Ali Masjid. The Bazar Valley lies near at hand, and here alone three hundred men of the Khyber Rifles were on picquet. It is a local saying that one is safer in the Khyber when the Pass is guarded on Kafilat day than in Peshawar City, and certainly this morning there was an absolute sense of security while the party were in the tribal territory. One saw the men of the Khyber Rifles standing with fixed bayonets not only in the low foothills and just above the road, but away on the high ranges on either side. Their figures were clearly outlined against the sky, and though they seemed isolated yet there was a living chain stretching for twenty miles. Some of the picquets had had to bivouack out as the heights which they held rose to five or six thousand feet, but the corps makes light of this kind of work, for the men are bred in the hills, and they know every crag and every path leading to it. They presented arms as the string of carriages passed on, a thick cloud of dust resenting its progress, for the sand is one that is usually trodden by pack animals only. The Khyber is well known by this time, for visitors can drive up to Ali Masjid and even to Lundi Kotal with special permission, and many a description has been given of the scene on Tuesdays and Fridays, when the Kafilat to and from Kabul wend their way in security under the protection of the Rifles. The bare brown hill sides, the camel thorn and other bushes dotting the slopes, the steep cliffs that appear here and there, the rugged and forbidding mountains that tower above, all shutting in the view and seeming to close in upon the traveller as he moves onwards—all these are features that impress the imagination. Trees there are none save at Lala China, and one looks in vain for the orchards that are so common in Afghanistan itself. From Jamrud to Ali Masjid there is no sign of life, save perhaps a solitary eagle wheeling in mid-air. All is desolate and the road winds among a succession of low hills into dry water courses seaming them at every turn. To the north the Rhotas Range shows its grim line ever to the view; to the south hills are piled upon hills in almost endless succession; Shaghai heights are passed, whence Sir Sam Browne's force ineffectually shelled Ali Masjid Fort in 1878, and one comes to Lala China, where there is the ripple of running water and the Khyber River courses rapidly on its way towards the open country. Facing round one can see the little valley from which General Havelock Allen rode to his death in 1897, shot down by Afridis lying in hiding ready to attack any convoy on the main road, but never thinking that a British Officer would wander within range of their rifles.

A halt is called at Ali Masjid while horses are being changed, and the position is briefly examined from the road. General Beatson at least can recall the day when Ali Masjid was attacked after the shelling from Shaghai, and how our troops could not force the sangars. It was Macpherson's turning movement which caused the Afghans to evacuate the place after nightfall, while the Afridis sat perched on the hills waiting to loot the losers or harry the winners if they became careless in success. The glory of Ali Masjid, as I have already indicated, has departed, and very prosaic indeed seem the fortified barracks and block-houses which now crown the crest of the terrific hill that overlooks the Khyber stream. There is a real Pass here, the river breaking through a gorge only a few yards in width. The old road followed the bed of the stream, but now for years there has been a thirty-foot road-way on the northern side blasted out of the solid rock. For three or four miles beyond Ali Masjid the route is still shut in, but when the Buddhist tope comes in view the hills begin to recede and soon a narrow valley is entered. Here there are the first signs of cultivation, and the young wheat is spreading a carpet of green over the stony ground. Fortified homesteads forming a village are seen, each with its characteristic mud tower overlooking the enclosure within, which all the members of the family, with their flocks and herds, are securely housed at night. Most of these towers are new, for eight years ago scarcely one was left standing when our troops had worked their will after the re-occupation of the Khyber. A few women and children are seen at the doorways, but the absence of life is one of the most significant signs in this lawless region. There is one narrow strip, fifty yards on either side of the roadway, which may be termed the sole area of safety in the Pass. It is the order that the route which the British Government undertakes to protect by means of the Khyber Rifles shall be held sacred and the limit applied is just one hundred yards. There must be no fighting within these bounds under severe pains and penalties, and the tribesmen have come to recognise that the order is a reasonable one.

They may carry on their blood-feuds, their tribal or family quarrels to their hearts' content away from the road, and this they do. In fact at the present time a seven days' truce has been proclaimed among certain bloodthirsty Zakkas, who have been engaged in one of these disputes for two or three months past. Our officers know how the fight is progressing by the wounded men who are carried into Lundi Kotal hospital to be made whole again. It is an exciting country to live in, for the traditions of killing at sight are still piously maintained when an enemy comes in sight.

The ascent to the Lundi Kotal plateau is by an easy gradient and once more a sterile stony tract is entered upon. The Royal party drove rapidly along this second section of the route from Ali Masjid, the escort having been changed there and Lieutenant Costello having replaced Lieutenant Muspratt. The Fort was reached at noon and the Royal carriage drove through the gateway. The party was received by Captain Davidson Houston, Commanding at Lundi Kotal, and a guard of honour of the Khyber Rifles under Lieutenant Tancock gave the usual salute. The Prince inspected this guard, which was the picture of smartness, and then the party proceeded to the roof of the officers' quarters and looked out upon the plateau. There was little to see beyond a stony plain and barren hillsides, but away to the west over Tor Sapper and the break in the ranges where lies Lundi Khana was Afghanistan. There was no time to go up even Suffolk Hill for the party to look out towards Dakka and Jellalabad, but on a clear day one can see the snows of Kalistan and the distant peaks of the Hindu Kush. The Prince had expressed a wish to see the Khyber Rifles "at work" and a small party went out, skirmished with blank ammunition and then rushed an imaginary position. A crowd of two hundred or more of the local inhabitants, Shinwaris mostly, assembled outside the Fort, but these were the only spectators of the Royal visit. There are not many people in these hills and they are not given to great curiosity. The Fort is just a plain, simple designed building, severely practical in every detail and exactly suited for the purpose to which it is devoted. It accommodates about 600 of the Rifles in small barracks. There are neat quarters for the officers, a hospital, magazine, store-rooms for food and supplies and water tanks of sufficient capacity to ensure the garrison against thirst in case they are besieged by the tribesmen, always a possible contingency, though the Movable Column at Peshawar would prevent any repetition of the occurrences of 1897. Trees, shrubs and flowers are seen struggling to live amidst rather uninviting conditions, but Lundi Kotal is not a spot that anyone would select to make a home in. What its future may be no one can forecast; at present it is a tribal-proof fortified enclosure, and that suffices.

After being photographed the Royal party started back for Jamrud at 2 P. M. At Ali Masjid the Malikhs were waiting to give their welcome to the Prince and Princess.

The Afridi headmen present were Khan Bahadur Yar Mahomed, Chief of the Malikdin Khel; Malik Zaman Khan of Rajgal, Chief of the Kuki Khel; Malik Sher Mahomed Khan of Bara, head of the powerful Sipah clan; Malikhs Abdul Jabbar Khan and Nur Mahomed Khan, joint representatives of the Zakka Khel; Malikhs Amal Din, Meh Raham and Inza Khan, joint headmen of the Kambar Khel; Malikhs Hafid Samandar Khan and Azam Khan, joint headmen of the Kamrai or Kamar Khel. Of these ten representative men something may be said beyond bare enumeration of their names. Yar Mahomed has practically sunk the whole of his fortune in building a fort at Chura at the eastern entrance to the Bazar Valley. It is in the bottle neck of the Chura Pass, the beginning of which can be seen from the road at Ali Masjid, and it effectually blocks the path of raiders from the Bazar Valley into the Khyber. He has well earned the Khan Bahadurship which Government bestowed for his loyal services in the cause of peace and order. Zaman Khan is brother of the late Amin Khan, once well-known as the strong-handed leader of the Kuki Khel, over whom his influence was complete. Zaman was a Colonel in the Amir's Army, but upon his brother's death resigned Afghan service in order to take up the Maliki. Abdul Jabbar is son of the late Wali Mahomed Khan, and Nur Ahmad is nephew of the notorious Khwas, now a refugee in Kabul. From 1880 to 1897 Wali Mahomed, and Khwas were all-powerful in the Khyber, liberally subsidised by Government and enjoying high prestige among all the Afridi clans. Their downfall came when the great rising took place. They failed to give warning of what was going forward in the Afridi country, and suddenly threw in their lot with the tribesmen. Retribution overtook them. Their forts and villages were destroyed, and they had to flee to Afghanistan. Wali Mahomed eventually made his peace with the British authorities. He was allowed to rebuild one fort, not far distant from Lundi Kotal, and there he died two years ago, a discredited old man and a standing example to all other Malikhs of the disgrace which attaches to broken faith. Khwas is still a refugee at Kabul, and he has been responsible for much of the passing trouble in the last few years with the Afridis. He is constantly intriguing, and the Amir seems to consider him a useful agent for keeping in touch with the tribesmen. The remaining Malikhs are men with no particular history attaching to them, though Sher Mahomed of Bara as head of the Sipah clan is an important factor where Afridi politics are in question. These ten Malikhs control together a fighting force of some 25,000 men which shows that the power of the Afridis is still great even after the events of 1897, when the purdah was lifted from the Tirah for the first time.

The headmen were very pleased with the kindness shown them by the Prince in return for their greeting, "Sir o mal," which means by interpretation that their heads and their property are at his disposal. Blind old Hafiz Samandar of the Kamrai clan was deeply touched. "Though I am blind," he said, "I can touch my King's hand," and he bowed over it. Yet another said, "We are poor people and we live in a poor country, but the land will blossom like the rose now that it has been trodden by footsteps of the King." Each Malik brought two sheep and twigs of honey as their offering. These were their nazars, and far more eloquent than the gold mohurs which are touched and remitted in durbars. The Prince and Princess accepted the honey. Salutations were exchanged, and then the carriages once more moved on, leaving behind pleasant memories among the Afridi leaders who had been under the shadow of Ali Masjid. The journey to Jamrud and Peshawar was without any incident. The Prince requested Major Roos-Keppel to convey his thanks to the officers and men of the Khyber Rifles, and expressed his high appreciation of their soldierly bearing and appearance. This visit to Lundi Kotal was a complete success and no more interesting day is likely to be spent by Their Royal Highnesses during the whole of their tour. To-night they leave for Rawalpindi Manœuvres. Colonel Deane must be well satisfied with the manner in which everything has proceeded here, and the Royal party must appreciate the reception which they have had.

Englishman.—This morning broke upon a scene ideally adapted to great military operations. These Northern India nights are intensely cold and searching, but as soon as the sun has warmed the air the climate is absolutely perfection; dry, crisp and bracing, inviting to hard physical exertion. Nor would it be possible to find a terrain better suited to the exercise of a great body of armed men than the picturesque plain, which rolls away from Lord Kitchener's camp. For here we have a wide belt of absolutely level country some fifteen miles wide, enclosed between rugged passes, and this innocent-looking, ploughed land is just deceptive as the illusive veldt, which was responsible of so many of our early troubles in South Africa. Instead of the tame expanse of good galloping country it looks, it is cut up by innumerable nullahs not easy for infantry, just rideable for single horsemen and absolutely impracticable for either large bodies of horse or for guns. Affording excellent cover and defensive positions for a well handled force, it is just the country in short to develop those tactical situations, which the manœuvres are specially designed to bring about.

The scene, when His Royal Highness rode out with Lord Kitchener after an early breakfast, was exceedingly fair to look upon. The purple haze was still hanging over the encircling hills, and to the right of the Grand Trunk Road there was a glorious vision of the snow-capped mountains of Kashmir. The plain was just breaking into life and soon we came into contact with the antennæ of the great force, sweeping down on Rawalpindi from the northern side. First came the neutral transport strings of camels and mules making the best of their way to the arsenal before the road was blocked up by fighting men. Then the advanced posts of the Southern Army falling back before superior forces. When night imposed a halt upon the combatants the advanced posts of the two armies confronted each other on the plain, General Gaselee's Infantry covering the main body, who were busily entrenching on the Mergalla Ridge and General Hunter's foot being held in leash until they should be launched against that stern position. The Southern Infantry fell back suddenly, holding position after position, but they had to fall back and soon the winking heliograph and little wisps of horsemen told of the advance of the northern force.

On this flank were deployed two divisions of Infantry and three batteries of Field Artillery. They were almost lost along this six or seven miles of front. All you saw were occasional thin lines of men, their khaki uniforms, the colour of the earth now running forward, now crouching behind a sheltering bank. Even these lines were not continuous. A little larger group, this was a maxim detachment bunched behind the shield of their weapon. A brown spot in the rear of a village, the balloon section and reserve transport under shelter. A little larger and more orderly were the guns awaiting orders. For all you could see the enemy might have been picnicing in Kashmir, whose glistening peaks were so cool and grateful to the eye. Neither horse, nor man, nor gun could be seen. Had it not been for the glister of the helio on the hill top, the occasional dull boom and white smoke of the Artillery, the Northern Army might have been pursuing a chimera. Yet this was an almost exact picture of scores of engagements during the early part of the war in South Africa.

To make what follows intelligible it is necessary to hark back for a moment. General Gaselee's position on the Mergalla heights was so strong as to be practically impregnable to frontal attack. General Hunter, therefore, threw his right out several miles in attempt to turn his enemy's left and at the same time flung a brigade against the Shaldita Pass, the weak point in General

Gaselee's right. The heaviest marching and the heaviest fighting was done in connection with General Hunter's turning movement, and the operations on this flank gave a pretty picture of what modern battle is like, now the British tactics revolutionised by experience of South Africa have been re-modelled out in consonance with the teachings of Manchuria. And the dominating impression was to emphasize once more how completely the pomp and circumstance that once invested it have departed from the practice of war.

Soon the booming of those distant guns became more insistent, little, however, figures began to dot the plain and a splutter of musketry broke out. The enemy had grown tired of a continuous retirement and was making a stand even threatening a counter attack. Instantly all was changed. With jingling harness the batteries of artillery trotted up raising a cloud of dust on the dry, ploughed land and by the time we had cleared the guns were in action. The range finders sang out the distance to some mysterious target, the guns bellowed out and the infantry kept well under cover. Soon the advance was resumed through with caution and by joining one of these running bodies, it was possible to gain a very fair insight into infantry work under modern condition.

Fair-haired Britisher and dust-begrimed Sikh and the Rajput entered thoroughly into the spirit of the game. The widely extended formation in attack adopted after the South African war has now been materially altered, and the intervals considerably decreased in accordance with the experience of the Japanese in Manchuria. In the open and in contact with the enemy the men took fair advantage of such cover as the country afforded, but in crossing the nullahs all formation was necessarily abandoned. And what nullahs! Wide and deep with almost precipitous banks they were more like ravines or cañons and some larger would have screened not only a brigade but an army. If there were many like these in South Africa of whose existence you could not be conscious until you stumbled upon them small wonder that certain regrettable incidents occurred. Once in contact with the enemy was lost however an extraordinary aimlessness seemed to overtake the attacking force. Officers and men with regimental transport of entrenching tools and ammunition and water plugged on vaguely in the direction of the enemy, but in many cases without knowing who was on their right hand or on their left, or even their exact position in the line of attack. And there were on occasions rather large gaps between regiments and brigades. Seeing these things one quite understood how in the course of the morning a whole division was temporarily lost having outmarched its comrades.

What happened on this part of the night attack may be taken as fairly characteristic of the day's operations. And now to give some general idea of these operations. Sir Archibald Hunter's movements extended over a front of about fourteen miles. On the left General Pollock, with a brigade, moved against the Shaldita Pass, the shortest road to Rawalpindi, but found it too closely guarded to be able to attempt more than a demonstration. In the centre General Walter Kitchener moved out against General Gaselee's position based on the Margalla Pass, and a pretty artillery duel occurred. General Kitchener had eighteen guns in action and General O'Moore Creagh a battery on the heights, and the attack could make no impression.

These manœuvres were, however, designed to cover and assist the principal movement of the day, the turning movement by General Hunter's first division under Sir Edmund Barrow against General Gaselee's left. This was the principal and the most interesting operation. General Barrow handled his troops with great ability, and though his advance was noticed in time to enable General Gaselee to strengthen his left, it was in some way before the support came up. The armies are now halted but General Hunter attacks the Margalla Pass at midnight. All the troops are marching to Pindi to-morrow in readiness for the great review on the following day.

Indian Daily News.—Orders issued by General Hunter, Commanding Northern Army, last night, stated that our cavalry have to-day driven back the enemy's cavalry and artillery to the line Mesia-Losar-Brahma. The hostile infantry reached that line at 4 p. m., to-day. Reliable reports show that the enemy is entrenching Margalla heights. The Commander of the Northern Army intends to reconnoitre the enemy's position, and, if strongly held, to turn his west flank. A Cavalry Division will co-operate moving south by Jhang, and will endeavour to cut the enemy's communications with Rawalpindi.—Our correspondent.

The Prince, accompanied by Lord Kitchener and attended by his suite, witnessed the operations this morning, riding out by the Grand Trunk Road from the Southern lines to the Northern Army. The whole position was reviewed, and the Prince returned to Kalaka Serail with a portion of General Hunter's advanced forces. The attack by the Northern Army developed successfully, the Southern Army falling back before them. Before noon, the flanking movement had progressed considerably, and the 3rd Division was advancing through Losar and Mesia, covering the reconnaissance.

The advancing Northerners were directly opposed by the 2nd Infantry Division of the Southern Army and the Cavalry Division. In retiring before General Hunter's force the Southerners fell back upon the Margalla heights, an absolutely impregnable position where the pass and ridge were strongly held by General Gaslee's other Infantry Division, the 4th. The 2nd Division in falling back cleared the left front of the Margalla ridge and formed part of the general reserve near Fateh Khled, where they arrived about two o'clock. The 4th Infantry Brigade of this Division retired along the line of the Grand Trunk Road to the Margalla Pass indicated by a monument erected between the two hills. The Northern Army continued their advance upon this position in the afternoon and attacked it with rifle and artillery fire with a view of compelling the enemy to display their strength. The Southern Infantry were entrenched along a position which was fronted by a much broken ground in which the advancing infantry found cover. They were enfiladed by a heavy artillery fire from the left of the southern position until a couple of batteries of the Northern Field Artillery were brought into action. The position was one which it would be impossible to take in actual warfare except with great loss, and the main idea of this afternoon's operation was a reconnaissance in force with a view to a night attack which was bound to fail. The Northern Infantry lay in the nullahs to await the attempt to force the position to-night, and the Artillery maintained a heavy fire until the evening. The Southern force is equipped with mountain guns and holds a naturally strong position in such force that a night attack in realistic conditions would inevitably be disastrous. To-morrow the troops proceed to Rawalpindi, the rearguard action being fought on the way.

So much has had to be crowded into a few days that the chief value of the manoeuvres counts in the tactical lessons which may have been deduced from them. A number of military inventions and new patterns have been given trial during the manoeuvres; among these are a German system of wireless telegraphy; Austro-Hungarian telephone wires of a new pattern; a silk fabric balloon, used by the divisional troops of the Southern force; Japanese ammunition carriers and special reserve panniers, the latter being tried by the 9th Lancers and Hodson's Horse; the Crooker equipment and lance buckets experimented with by the 12th Lancers, Japanese entrenching tools, and Colonel Justice's and Sparkington tools. General Clement's brigade utilised and mamooties, and the 9th Lancers had the Danish Rexer automatic machine gun. The Divisional Supply experimented with the new pattern bread tins, also fibre coverings for metal tanks, preserved meat, sausages, and Russian soup carts; while the P. M. O. of the Northern force utilised X-rays and the troops tried the value of tabloids. During the night attack Malleson's flare lights were utilised by the defenders at the Margalla Pass.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Royal visit to Jammu, although extending to only two days, was of a most successful character. The Prince returned the visit of the Maharaja at the Mundi Palace on Saturday, where the magnificent view of the surrounding country which could be obtained from the balconies was much admired by the Princess and the rest of the Party. The illuminations in the camp in the evening transformed the scene into a veritable vision of fairyland. After the banquet the Royal party witnessed a display of fireworks, and a devil-dance by Lamas from the Leh monastery. The visit to Jammu is to be commemorated by a State College to be named after His Royal Highness. An interesting figure in the Maharaja's party was the son of Sir Amar Singh, brother of the Maharaja, who as the heir-presumptive to the gaddi, is destined to play an important part in the future history of Kashmir. After spending a quiet Sunday, their Royal Highnesses left in the evening for Amritsar.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses reached the Manœuvres Camp this morning. The Prince left the train at Hasan Abdal, where he was met by Lord Kitchener, and drove by the Grand Trunk Road to the neighbourhood of Budho, where the Princess joined from the Royal train. The manœuvres had begun during the night and the advanced cavalry of the Northern and Southern armies came into contact this morning. The meeting of the cavalry was witnessed by Their Royal Highnesses from a hill beneath which a charge took place. The Northern Cavalry had advanced east during the night, and the Southern Cavalry had come northwards. After witnessing the charge the Princess proceeded by train to Rawalpindi, the Prince going on to the Manœuvre Camp.

The general idea of the manœuvres is that a Northern Force invading, having completed its mobilization, crosses the Indus at daybreak on 4th December. On that day the mobilization of the Southern Forces is still incomplete. A concentration is in progress at Rawalpindi, an important arsenal, but inferior in strength to the Northern Forces already in the field, while large reinforcements, which will ultimately be available from Jhelum and Lahore, cannot arrive for some days. Two Infantry Divisions and one Division of Cavalry with divisional and corps troops, are engaged on each side, amounting in all to about twenty-five thousand men in each army. The aim of the Southern Army is to prevent the enemy reaching Rawalpindi before the arrival of reinforcements. The Southern Cavalry were this morning on the Babudra river holding the line Jhang—Tharbaiti—Thatch—Khalil, the idea being that a regiment of Native Cavalry has been left to hold Margalla Pass until the arrival of the infantry. The object of the Northern Army is to capture Rawalpindi before the arrival of reinforcements there. The conditions governing the movements of the Northern Army are that having crossed the Indus, they reached Burhan this morning. The country in which the manœuvres are taking place is encircled by hills, and is much broken by nullahs.

The first day of the manœuvres has been one entirely of cavalry operations. After the mounted arms had come into contact this morning the Southern Cavalry at noon attacked and drove off the force. In the afternoon the Northern Cavalry advanced in force. The Southern had come upon some of the Northern Cavalry watering their horses and showed front; but the main body of Northerners coming up the Southerners began a retirement. They rode off under cover of their guns, but the Northern batteries quickly came into action and opened on the enemy. The advancing cavalry were reinforced by the appearance of the infantry, and the Southerners continued to fall back until they came in touch with their infantry, who had been occupying a line of hills to the south of Kalaki Serai. As the southern infantry emerged and entered, the order was passed for the cavalry operations to cease. What little of the spectacle of the retreating and advancing cavalry as could be seen through the clouds of dust was very pretty, and the operations were suspended in the interesting situation that the Southern Cavalry had been compelled to retire, and the infantry of the opposing armies bivouacked in anticipation of the fight tomorrow. The Southern Infantry hold a line in front of the range of hills behind Kalaki Serai. The country over which the manœuvres are taking place is excellently adapted for the purpose, the wide plain, in which nullahs abound and which is intersected by the Grand Trunk Road, being enclosed by ranges of hills.

The manœuvres are being directed by Lord Kitchener, Sir Bindon Blood being the Deputy Director, Sir Archibald Hunter commands the Northern Army, and Sir A. Gaselee, the Southern. The Chief Umpires are Major-General Collins, Northern, and Major-General Henry, Southern. The Divisional Commanders are:—Northern Cavalry, Major-General Sir E. Locke Elliot; Southern, Major-General Douglas Haig. Infantry, Northern, Lieutenant-General Sir Edmund Barrow, Major-General F. W. Kitchener; Southern, Major-General Wodehouse and Major-General Sir O'Moore Creagh.

Orders issued by General Hunter, Commanding the Northern Army, last night, stated:—"Our cavalry have to-day driven back the enemy's cavalry and artillery to the line Mesia—Losar—Brahma. The hostile infantry reached that line at 4 p.m. to-day. Reliable reports show that the enemy is entrenching the Margala heights."

The Commander of the Northern Army intends to reconnoitre the enemy's position and, if strongly held, to turn his west flank. The Cavalry Division will co-operate, moving south by Jhang, and will endeavour to cut the enemy's communications with Rawalpindi.

Madras Mail.—This is not a topic of engrossing interest in this District. But some discontent and disappointment would seem to be felt about the way in which some of our Zemindars have been left out of the list of those invited by Government to Madras on the occasion of the Royal visit. For instance, the Zemindars of Mandasa, Serugada, Chikate, and Chinna-kimedi are quite as much entitled to the invitation as the other local Zemindars. No one can see any reason for omitting them; and knowing as we all do how solicitous Lord Ampthill's Government have ever been to offend none who deserve better, it is hoped that the mistake will be rectified in time to enable these gentlemen to pay their devoirs to Their Royal Highnesses. When Zemindars—as distinguished from ruling Princes—are invited, there seems no adequate reason why others, representative of other interests, men of good standing and repute, but whose life work lies in the mofussil, should not be similarly honoured; especially in the case of districts lying remote from Their Royal Highnesses' route.

Pioneer.—Kala-Ka-Sarai, 5TH DECEMBER. The night journey of the Royal party from Peshawar to Hasan Abdal was made at a slow rate of speed as the distance was comparatively short. The Prince and Princess on arrival at Hasan Abdal were received by Lord Kitchener with his Staff. His Royal Highness then rode out to the manœuvring ground, the Princess and Lady Shaftesbury proceeding there on elephants provided by the Maharaja of Kashmir. The howdahs and trappings were of the richest kind glittering with gold and superbly handsome. The Royal party took up their position on a mound north-east of the village of Losar and quite close to the Grand Trunk Road. Losar is between three and four miles from Lord Kitchener's small camp at Kala-ka-Sarai.

In order to understand the morning's operations it will be necessary to state both the general and special ideas governing the manœuvres. The former is that a Northern Force, invading the Punjab and with Rawalpindi as its immediate objective, has mobilised up to the following strength: One Cavalry Division, consisting of two Brigades (each with a battery of Horse Artillery), two Infantry Divisions of three Brigades each or twenty-four Battalions in all. The Divisional troops are two Brigades of Field Artillery and with the Corps troops three Mountain Batteries and two Companies of British Mountain Infantry. Having completed its mobilisation this force crosses the Indus at daybreak on the 4th instant, on which day the Southern Force, which is to bar its way to Rawalpindi, is still mobilising. There has, however, been a concentration of troops at Rawalpindi, inferior in strength to the invading force, and reinforcements are supposed to be hurrying up from Jhelum and Lahore, though they cannot arrive until the 7th. This is the General Idea. The Special Idea as regards the Northern Force is that Rawalpindi must be captured before the reinforcements from Jhelum and Lahore can appear on the scene. Accordingly, it is taken that the Cavalry Division begins to arrive at Burhan, six miles west of Hasan Abdal at 7 A.M. on the 5th and the Infantry Division four hours later. It is known in advance that the enemy's cavalry is in the valley of the Haro river between Hasan Abdal and Kala-ka-Sarai. As to the Southern Army the Special Idea is that their Cavalry Division having moved out of Rawalpindi on the 4th instant, has reached the Haro river and are holding a line at 6 A.M. on the 5th, south-west of the well-known Margalla Range. The Pass of that name is watched by one regiment of cavalry, detached for that purpose. The remainder of the Southern Army at that hour are still encamped at Rawalpindi, but ready to move at once to the Pass.

Having given these ideas as a guide, one may now show the movements that took place. Major-General Haig, Commanding the Southern Cavalry, bivouacked at Jhang and Nahga in the valley of the Haro and marched at dawn due north to Wah and seized the river, crossing near by the Grand Trunk Road he then extended his line so as to hold the country from Wah eastwards through Bhabra to Kamala on the railway. Sir Locke Elliott, Commanding the Northern Cavalry, moved down the Grand Trunk Road to Hasan Abdal, but found his way through a gap in the hills close by the hostile force. He could not therefore continue to advance by this road and accordingly moved his Division north of the railway and swept out in the open country so as to turn General Haig's right. This movement was successful and the Southern Cavalry had to fall back towards Kala-ka-Sarai. They took up a new position in the neighbourhood of Losar, where they placed their Horse Artillery so as to command the plain to the North-eastward. The Northern Cavalry then advanced in full force moving by the Grand Trunk Road in line of squadron columns and formed line for a charge north of Losar. They thus came under a heavy fire from the artillery at that village. General Haig meanwhile had also formed line and the two forces met on fairly good ground. The charge was made within full view of the Royal party and they had full advantage of seeing two Brigades on either side gallop to within 50 yards of each other. The sight was one that could not fail to impress them, but unhappily dense clouds of dust rose as the charge was made and this eventually hid everything from view. Umpires ruled that the Southern Cavalry had had the best of the encounter, mainly because the Northern were held to have suffered severe loss from the Horse Artillery fire. The Northerners were ordered to fall back three miles, but by this time their artillery came to their assistance and the Southern Cavalry had to retire in their turn. General Haig had sent for his Field Artillery and three Brigades of this arm shortly afterwards appeared. A truce was then called and the Royal party lunched in tents prepared for them and afterwards went to Kala-ka-Sarai by motor-cars.

In the afternoon the Northern Cavalry, supported by Horse Artillery, moved forward again and manœuvring took place for some two hours. They could not advance far, as twenty-four guns were brought to bear upon them and the Southern Infantry having made a splendid march from Rawalpindi blocked their way. At five o'clock the cavalry on each side withdrew. The position to-night is that Sir Archibald Hunter, Commanding the Northern Army, has the 1st Infantry Division at Wah and the 2nd at Kamala, while his Cavalry Division are at the Haro. Sir Alfred Gaselee, Commanding the Southern Army, has placed the 4th Infantry Division astride the Grand Trunk Road, where they have entrenched themselves, so as to hold the line from Losar to Mesia on the railway, thus covering Kala-ka-Sarai. The cavalry are bivouacking to the south-east of this place. The rest of the Southern Infantry, with Divisional and Corps Troops are at Jani-ka-sang, and are also holding the Margalla Pass in force with picquets on the heights. To-morrow will witness the determined advance of the whole Northern Army.

To-day's operations have been interesting, but dust interferes very badly with the movements as it rises in clouds on every side. The Grand Trunk Road is crowded with troops and transport animals as the troops that have marched all the way from Rawalpindi are passing northwards. They also move in one thick cloud of dust and their powdered faces are almost the colour of their khaki uniforms. More hard work is still before them as there is to be a grand night attack on the Margalla position to-morrow night.

The following are the Divisional and Brigade Commanders on either side:—

Northern Force.—1st Cavalry Division, Major-General Sir E. Locke-Elliott; 1st Cavalry Brigade, Brigadier-General Adams; 2nd Cavalry Brigade, Colonel F. S. Garratt; 1st Infantry Division, Lieutenant-General Sir E. G. Barrow; 1st Infantry Brigade, Major-General Des Voeux; 2nd Infantry Brigade, Brigadier-General Sir J. Willeocks; 3rd Infantry Brigade, Colonel F. J. Alymer; Divisional Troops, Lieutenant-Colonel C. T. Robinson; 3rd Infantry Division, Major-General F. W. Kitchener; 7th Infantry Brigade, Colonel W. du G. Gray; 8th Infantry Brigade, Brigadier-General H. A. Abbott; 9th Infantry Brigade, Brigadier-General J. A. H. Pollock; 10th Infantry Brigade, Major-General R. A. P. Clemmets; Divisional Troops, Lieutenant-Colonel Borradaile.

Southern Force.—2nd Cavalry Division, Major-General D. Haig; 3rd Cavalry Brigade, Colonel A. Phayre; 4th Cavalry Brigade, Brigadier-General B. T. Mahon; 2nd Infantry Division, Major-General J. H. Wodehouse; 4th Infantry Brigade, Colonel C. W. Park; 5th Infantry Brigade, Colonel H. B. Watkins; 6th Infantry Brigade, Major-General J. B. Woon; Divisional Troops, Brevet-Colonel Hogge; 4th Infantry Division, Major-General Sir O'M. Creagh; 11th Infantry Brigade, Colonel C. A. Anderson; 12th Infantry Brigade, Major-General A. G. F. Browne; Divisional Troops, Brevet-Colonel Hayes.

As regards the manœuvres generally it may be stated that the whole of the strategical idea has been fixed beforehand, the problem offered being practically the attack and defence respectively of this Margalla position. The strategical developments are left to the Divisional and Brigade Commanders. In this way it is hoped that an estimate may be formed by Lord Kitchener and the Umpire Staff as to how far the troops have benefited by the tactical exercises which they have practised during the past two years. The long marches, the entrenching, and the night attack are all tests of the endurance and training of the men and of the capacity of their officers to apply the knowledge which they have acquired under the latest methods of training. Incidentally there are certain phases, which present the actual collision of the opposing forces under conditions made as realistic as possible and the first of these was the great cavalry action this morning. There were some five thousand troops engaged in this and those who witnessed the charge near Losar speak of it as a magnificent sight as regiment after regiment came into line on either side and finally charged with all the dash that was certain to be shown when led by men of the stamp of Locke-Elliott and Haig with Brigadiers such as Adams, Garratt, Phayre and Mahon. The Northern Cavalry when they came under fire from the Horse Artillery batteries placed near Losar village had either to retire or charge practically over the ground swept by the guns, as their own Horse Artillery were in the open and could not be used with equal effect. The risk was taken and though Sir E. Locke-Elliott's Cavalry were presumed to be partially enfiladed they charged home. It may be admitted that the ground favoured Haig and the disposition of his guns was so skilful that they really decided the fight. This was indeed the Umpires' ruling, for there was otherwise nothing to choose between the handling of the cavalry itself on either side. The Brigades were brought up in echelon and the movement by which they were formed into line was admirably carried out. The horses were still fresh and could gallop hard, thus proving that they had been carefully nursed during the preliminary movements.

The Princess of Wales left here for the State camp at Rawalpindi at 4 p.m., accompanied by Lady Shaftesbury and some members of the Royal suite. The Prince remains for the night at Lord Kitchener's camp here and will witness tomorrow's operations between Kala-ka-Sarai and the Margalla Range. In the Commander-in-Chief's camp are the Maharajas of Jodhpur, Malwa and Bikanir, Lieutenant-Colonel Irving, Commandant of the Australian Commonwealth Forces, and Major Hiyashi of the Japanese General Staff. The weather is bright and pleasant during the days but the nights are very cold and bivouacking out has its drawbacks.

To a letter addressed by the Hon'ble Mr. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General in Rajputana, to Sir Walter Lawrence on the subject of the deep regret felt by those Native Chiefs who have not had an opportunity of meeting the Prince, His Royal Highness himself was graciously pleased to reply. The correspondence is as follows:—

Bikanir, 26th November 1905.

DEAR SIR WALTER LAWRENCE,

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have now visited three of the States of Rajputana, viz., Udaipur, Bikanir and Jaipur, and the Chiefs of these States are the only ones that have had the honour of meeting Their Royal Highnesses during their tour in Rajputana. It was, as you know, arranged that the Chiefs of a number of other States should come into Ajmer to be present there during Their Royal Highnesses' visit, but the partial failure of the monsoon and the consequent distress, which has specially affected the central and eastern portions of Rajputana, made a revision of the programme obligatory. His Royal Highness accordingly directed, on the advice of the Government of India, that Ajmer and Bhartpur should be omitted from the programme of the Royal Tour. The communication of this decision was accompanied by a gracious message of regret and sympathy to the afflicted States and districts, which did much to soften the blow. But it was nevertheless inevitable that much disappointment should be occasioned. I have received so many proofs of this from every possible direction that I feel it is my obvious duty to bring them to your notice, especially those which have reached me from the Chiefs of Rajputana who were to have come into Ajmer. The citizens of Ajmer have been graciously afforded an opportunity of expressing their loyalty and sense of loss when His Royal Highness received the deputation of the Ajmer Municipality at Jaipur; the Mayo College at Ajmer, which was to have been the scene of a special ceremony, has been granted the consolation of sending its Cadet Corps to Jaipur to provide part of the escort for Their Royal Highnesses at that place.

But the Chiefs who were to have come into Ajmer will now, I fear, have no opportunity of being presented to Their Royal Highnesses. It was, as you know, suggested that they should be invited to come for this purpose to some other convenient place in the programme of the Royal Tour, such as Agra, but, after the most careful consideration, this alternative also has, of necessity, been abandoned. In reply to my letters informing them of this decision, the Chiefs have sent me messages, and in some cases "kharitas" to the address of His Royal Highness in which they give expression to their great sorrow and disappointment at not having been able to testify their loyalty and devotion in person. These messages and "kharitas" I now beg to forward to you with this letter. No one can regret more than myself the misfortune which has deprived them of the honour to which they had looked forward with such joyful anticipation; and I feel that the least I can do is to forward these messages in the hope that they will be accepted by His Royal Highness.

I venture also to mention the case of the Tazimi Istimrardars of Ajmer, who would have been presented to His Royal Highness at Ajmer, had the visit to that place not been abandoned.

I attach a list showing the names of the Chiefs in question. His Highness the (minor) Maharaja of Bhartpur is not included, as he was to have been visited in his own State; nor does the list include His Highness the Maharaja of Kishangarh nor His Highness the Maharaja Rana of Dholpur, since it was arranged that these two Chiefs, instead of coming to Ajmer, should be present with the Imperial Cadet Corps during His Royal Highness's visit to Calcutta next month; and it is hoped that this plan will be duly carried out.

Yours sincerely,
E. G. COLVIN.

To Sir Walter Lawrence, K.C.I.E., Chief of the Staff of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

His Highness the Maharaja of Jodhpur (Kharita enclosed).
His Highness the Maharao Raja of Bundi (Kharita enclosed).

His Highness the Maharao of Kotah.

His Highness the Maharaja of Karauli (Kharita enclosed).

His Highness the Maharawal of Jaisalmer.

His Highness the Maharaja of Alwar.

His Highness the Nawab of Tonk (Kharita enclosed).

His Highness the Maharao of Sirahi (Kharita enclosed).

His Highness the Maharawal of Dungarpur.

His Highness the Raj Rana of Jhalawar (Kharita enclosed).

The Raja Dhiraj of Shahpura (Kharita enclosed).

His Royal Highness was pleased to acknowledge this communication with the following letter in his own hand:—

Prince of Wales's Camp, India.

27th November, 1905

DEAR MR. COLVIN.—Sir Walter Lawrence has made known to me the contents of your letter of the 26th instant, and has handed me the Kharitas and other communications which you have received from the eleven Chiefs of Rajputana, with whom, unfortunately, owing to the circumstances recounted in your letters, I have been unable to exchange visits. Pray assure them how greatly the Princess and I regret that we could not carry out our original wish to see them at Ajmer, and, failing that, at Agra. Tell them how heartily we reciprocate the feeling in their message. At the same time I will ask you to send them the portraits of myself which I had hoped to hand to them personally. We were equally sorry that our visit to Bhartpur had to be abandoned.

Will you also take the earliest opportunity of expressing to the Tazimi Istimrardars of Ajmer how disappointed I am to have been unable to make their acquaintance.

I am glad that we shall have the pleasure of seeing the Chiefs of Dholpur and Kishangarh at Calcutta.

Believe me, sincerely yours,

GEORGE P.

The Hon'ble Mr. E. Colvin, Agent to the Governor-General, Rajputana.

Lahore, December 6.

The Officer Commanding the 1st Punjab Volunteers has received the following letter from Commander Sir Charles Cust, the recent manœuvres, and by this time is a deserted desert again.

His Holiness paid a formal visit to the Prince of Wales, who received the Lama graciously and made him sit down between the Princess and himself. His Holiness appreciates the sharp cold of Rawal Pindi nights, as even the modified warmth of Indian winters had considerably oppressed one who habitually lives 14,000 feet above sea-level.

Englishman.—A fine moonlight night clear, and mild, and these, from the spectacular point of view, were the ideal conditions for the attack on the Margalla Pass last night. Whether they were equally acceptable to the attacking force is another question. And as a spectacle, the little fight was worthy of the occasion. The path to the pass lay along the Grand Trunk Road guarded by gaunt Sikhs, who stood solemnly to arms. Down this road came a procession of motor cars bearing Lord Kitchener and his staff to the head of the pass, acetylene headlights shining weirdly upon the white dust. These same headlights gave timely warning to the defenders of the heights and the burning of magnesium flares to reveal the advancing infantry showed that they were on the alert. Along a road from the rear came the Artillery of the attacking forces, who began to fire salvoes streaking the darkness with flame. Then the crackle of musketry war was heard on the hill rising and falling, now in an irregular splutter, now in a wave of sound. Soon the progress of the attack could be gauged by the spurts of flame from the rifles moving slowly up the slope like a line of fireflies. As it neared the crest the guns ceased, the rifles were silenced, and then the sound of faint cheering showed that the position was won. This was as much as most people saw of the night attack.

Quite early this morning every one was astir, for the Commander-in-Chief's Manœuvre Camp at Kala-ki-Serai was to be broken up and all the troops marched in Rawalpindi by nightfall, and as some of them had to cover twenty-five miles this allowed no dallying. It was moreover no unchequered progress. The Southern army in its retirement held every defensive position and had to be driven from post to post, in withdrawing to Pindi. This gave rise to a series of interesting engagements and culminated in one of the prettiest movements in the operations. After retreating from the hills General Gaselee's forces concentrated on the defences of Rawal Pindi for a last stand. They were attacked by the divisions under General Barrow and General Walter Kitchener and the co-operation between these two forces and the timing and delivery of the attack were in the opinion of those competent to judge skilfully managed. This last phase of the manœuvres included a cavalry charge by General Locke Elliott, in which he was again held to have been repulsed. His Royal Highness, who rode and motored with Lord Kitchener, was a keenly interested spectator of the operations, as was also Her Royal Highness who by rail and elephant reached the vantage point of Thomar.

The manœuvres are over and all the troops are assembled in Rawal Pindi removing the stain of recent dusty work and preparing for to-morrow's review. It is too early yet to attempt to give any general outline of the lessons of the greatest manœuvres ever attempted in India that must await the umpires' detailed report and it is a question for experts. But certain broad conclusions drawn by men well capable of judging may be indicated. They are first that the manœuvres have demonstrated the great value of the divisional training in process of organisation under the redistribution scheme. The great object of that scheme is not to mass men on the frontier as is commonly supposed, but to concentrate them in Divisions which will move out as homogeneous bodies, well used to acting together, if required, on service. These new Divisions were to a very large extent employed in the manœuvres, not entirely because the scheme is not complete, and with very advantageous results.

After this everyone was struck with the physique and fitness of the men. Some of the regiments had to march a couple of hundred miles to the manœuvres area and the day's work was rarely less than twenty to twenty-five miles yet the men were always found trudging cheerfully along and one scarcely saw any who had fallen out by the way. What applies to the men applies equally to the horses, which were in splendid working fettle. The very great improvement that has been effected in the transport was also a matter of favourable comment, although the movements of the troops were far more rapid than would take place in war. No cases were reported of the transport having broken down, or of supplies not having come up. The field telegraph and telephone were also used to a far greater extent than on any previous occasion, keeping the Generals in touch with the Brigadiers and even smaller units. The telegraph is reported to have worked uniformly well, but of the telephones a less satisfactory account was received. All sorts of military inventions were under trial, wireless telegraphy on the German system, Austrian telephones, Japanese ammunition carriers, the Crocker lance and bucket equipment, Japanese entrenching tools, the Rexer automatic gun and Russian soup kitchens, but the experiences cannot be hastily collated. We also saw for the first time the motor car used on a considerable scale in Indian manœuvres. Major Warren with Lieutenants Jenkin Wood and Hall controlled a team of seven cars carrying Their Royal Highnesses, the Commander-in-Chief and the umpires up and down the Grand Trunk Road with a swiftness and freedom from accident which show that there is a great future for the car in military operation. In short, without dwelling upon the errors of which there were no doubt many, or the deficiencies, of which there were probably also many, the manœuvres demonstrated that great strides have been made in preparing the Indian army for war, and that an earnest progressive spirit prevails at head-quarters.

Their Royal Highnesses are still the guests of Lord Kitchener in the large camp laid out on the confines of Rawalpindi close to the review ground. The art of camping is better understood in India than in any other country in the world, but surely never was a camp more picturesquely ordered or better designed than this. When Major Cowper entered upon his task he had nothing to work upon but an avenue of fine trees and a huge stretch of unlovely ploughed land. Down this avenue runs a fine road broken by two graceful ornamental clumps. At the head of the avenue behind the flagstaff are Their Royal Highnesses' tents and on either side and in wings those of the staffs and Lord Kitchener's personal guests. The roads are lighted by electricity and the tents are perfectly arranged with to crown all Major Cowper has coaxed a most restful growth of herbage to border his avenues, which is a delight to the eye. The spectacle as Their Royal Highnesses drove up, escorted by Skinner's Horse, in the blouses which still indicate that they sprang from Scindiah's army, through lines of stocky Ghentish till he was received by the scarlet clad guard of honour of that fine regiment the Queen's and the stalwart 23rd Sikh Pioneers, was pleasing in the extreme.

It is understood that the Prince during his visit to Beas in February will pay a visit to the Central Hindu College and receive an address from the trustees. A technical institute is to be founded in connection with the College in honour of the royal visit.

It has now been finally settled that Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will visit the M. A. O. College at Aligarh and lunch there on the 8th of March. Grand preparations are being made and invitations have been sent to behalf of the president and trustees to the Muhammadan Chiefs and notables.

Indian Daily News.—The Bengali writes:—We regret to find that our appeal to Government to drop the proposal for a Purdah party at Belvedere in honour of Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales, has so far proved unavailing and that pressure is still being put upon Mofussil Zamindars and others to induce, or rather compel, them to send the ladies of their families to Belvedere. These Zenana ladies have never been near Belvedere, and some of them have scarcely ever ventured outside the gates of their houses. To compel them to be in attendance at Belvedere would be positively inhuman, and the attempt might, for aught we know to the contrary, end in a fiasco for which none but the promoters of the proposed party alone would be responsible. Public feeling already runs very high, and we appeal to the authorities not to presume too far upon the forbearance of a loyal and peaceable community. The Purdah has a sanctity which must be respected. The proposal has been received with so much indignation by the educated classes of our fellow-countrymen, that even the Brahmins, who do not observe the purdah, are as firmly opposed to it as are the Hindus and the Mohamedans.

Indian Daily News.—With regard to the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall on January 5th by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, it is announced that to enable them to proceed to the distribution of invitation cards, the Trustees will be obliged if all subscribers to the Memorial Fund of Rs. 250 and upwards, who wish to attend the ceremony, will kindly intimate before December 15th their intention and the number of cards that they desire for themselves and the members of their family living with them. As the accommodation is limited, it will ordinarily be impossible to issue more than two cards to each such subscriber.

Indian Daily News.—The night attack by the Northern Force on the Makalla position concluded about one o'clock this morning, and about nine the troops began a final action, preparatory to marching into Rawal Pindi. The Prince witnessed the night attack, and this morning the Princess joined him at Gohra Junction about midway between Pindi and Kalakaserai, to view to-day's battle which is taking place about twenty miles from Pindi.

General Hunter concentrated his whole force for the night attack on Margella heights, and the troops began to move on the position about nine o'clock. General Gaselee's forces were admirably disposed to resist the attack, and in actual warfare the only prospect of success for the attacking force lay in turning the west of the position. . . . and earlier in the evening been checked, . . .

Manœuvres. The night attack on the heights was designed to succeed. The Northern Artillery opened heavy fire, the Southern Mountain batteries answering well. Gradually under the combined artillery and rifle attack, the Southern Infantry were driven from the trenches, and the heights were captured by the Northern Infantry about eleven o'clock. The night was bright moonlight, but little could be seen, save the flashes of artillery. The Prince did not personally witness the attack, being represented by members of his staff. The manner in which the Prince disregarded the fatigue of the Manœuvres greatly impressed military men.

The Commander-in-Chief's State camp, where the Prince arrives to-day, is some five miles beyond Rawal Pindi, and is most admirably laid out. Excellent garden paths have been made throughout the camp, and plots of mustard and cress give green patches before each tent. A broad avenue of trees leads to the camp, and the road is decorated with streamers, while several triumphal arches have been erected along the route from the railway station. The Princess has been staying here during the Manœuvres, and Lord Kitchener's guests include the Maharaja of Bikanir, and the Maharaja of Jodhpur who along with Maharaja of Idar have attended the Prince as Aides-de-Camp during the Manœuvres.

To-day the Tashi Lama is expected in Pindi.

The action to-day finished with a general advance of the Northern Army and grand charge operations concluding at the line of forts in the neighbourhood of Gobra junction about 12-30, the Prince and Princess witnessing the last phase of the field manœuvres, which have been most successfully conducted.

The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Lord Kitchener and staff, proceeded in the Royal train to Chaklall station where they arrived about 1-30. They were received by Mr. Meredith, Commissioner of Rawal Pindi, and other civil officials, and entering the Royal carriage drove to the Commander-in-Chief's state camp at Balabgarh. The 7th Gurkhas lined the road immediately inside the camp, and in the centre of the camp, in front of the Royal tent, guards-of-honour of the 2nd Queen's West Surrey Regiment, with band and colours, and the 30th Pioneers were drawn up. Their Royal Highnesses's escort was furnished by the 1st Skinner's Horse, who made a very effective appearance in their full dress uniform, which comprises a bright yellow coat. Their Royal Highnesses were received with a Royal salute and the Royal standard was hoisted on a flagstaff in the centre of the camp. The Prince inspected the guard-of-honour, and the ceremonial reception was at an end. This afternoon has been spent quietly. The Tashi Lama paid an informal visit to the Prince, being accompanied by the Prime Minister, the Prince and Princess afterwards going out to take tea with Sir Bindon Blood. The troops marching in after the manœuvres have to prepare for the grand review tomorrow in which fifty-five thousand men will take part. An interesting feature of the camp is an important exhibition of the latest patterns of military equipment and of new military inventions, besides those which were experimented with during the manœuvres. The list of the Commander-in-Chief's guests in camp, besides Their Royal Highnesses and suite, and the Maharajas of Bikanir, Ulwar, Jodapur and Idar, includes Sir A. Hunter, Sir A. Gaselee, General McArthur of the United States Army, and Major Hiyashi, Japanese Military Attaché in India.

Indian Daily News.—The special convocation of the Senate for conferring the Honorary Decree of Doctor in the Faculty of Law on His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales will be held on Thursday, January 4th, at 3 P.M., instead of Monday, January 1st, as already announced.

Indian Daily News.—It is understood that the Prince of Wales during His Royal Highness's visit to Benares in February will pay a visit to the Central Hindu College and receive an address from the Trustees. A Technical Institute is to be founded in connection with the College, in honour of the Royal visit.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Prince, accompanied by Lord Kitchener and attended by his suite, witnessed the operations this morning, riding out by the Grand Trunk Road from the Southern lines to the Northern army. The whole position was reviewed and the Prince returned to Kalaki-Serai with a portion of General Hunter's advanced forces. The attack by the Northern army developed successfully, the Southern army falling back before them. Before noon the flanking movement had progressed considerably, and the third division were advancing through Losar and Mesia, covering the reconnaissance.

The advancing Northerners were directly opposed by the second infantry division of the Southern army and the cavalry division. In retiring before General Hunter's force, the Southerners fell back upon the Margalla heights, an absolutely impregnable position, where the pass and ridge were strongly held by General Gaselee's other infantry division, the fourth. The second division, in falling back, cleared the left front of the Margalla ridge and formed part of the general reserve near Fateh Khalel, where they arrived about two o'clock. The fourth infantry brigade of this division retired along the line of the Grand Trunk Road to the Margalla Pass indicated by the monument erected between the two hills. The Northern Army continued to advance upon this position in the afternoon and attacked it with rifle and artillery fire, with the view of compelling the enemy to display their strength. The Southern infantry were entrenched along a position which was fronted by much broken ground in which the advancing infantry found cover. They were enfiladed by a heavy artillery fire from the left of the Southern position until a couple of batteries of the Northern field artillery were brought into action. The position was one which it would be impossible to take in actual warfare, except with great loss, and the main idea of this afternoon's operation was a with the view to a night attack, which was bound to fail. The Northern infantry lay in the nallahs to await the attempt to force the position to-night, and the artillery maintained a heavy fire until the evening. The Southern force is equipped with mountain guns, and holds a naturally strong position in such force that a night's attack in realistic conditions would inevitably be disastrous. To-morrow the troops proceed to Ravalpindi, a rear-guard action being fought on the way. So much has had to be crowded into a few days that the chief value of the manoeuvres consists in the tactical lessons which may have been deduced.

A number of military inventions and new patterns have been given a trial during the manoeuvres; among these are the German system of wireless telegraphy; the Austro-Hungarian telephone wires; a new pattern of silk and fabric balloon used by the divisional troops of the Southern force; Japanese ammunition carriers and special reserve panniers, the latter being tried by the 9th Lancers and Hodson's Horse; the Crocker equipment and lance buckets experimented with by the 12th Lancers; Japanese entrenching tools and Colonel Justice's and Sparkington's tools. General Clement's brigade utilised hand mamutis; the 9th Lancers had the Danish Rexer automatic machine gun. The Divisional Supply experimented with the new pattern broad tins, aloof-fibre coverings for metal tanks, preserved meat, sausages, and Russian soup carts, while the Principal Medical Officer, Northern Force, utilized X-Rays and the troops tried the value of tabloids. During the night attack Malleon's flare lights were utilized by the defenders at Margalla Pass.

Military Mail.—A member of the staff of Military Mail—Mr. Charles James Stewart—is accompanying the Prince and Princess of Wales throughout their Indian tour, and the first of his despatches will be read, we feel sure, with great interest. It is dated from Bombay, November 11th, and is as follows:—

Though it wanted a week to the arrival of the Royal Party it was evident even at this early stage that Bombay was actively preparing a great reception for Their Royal Highnesses. As the days passed one could see the inhabitants had an intention to excel anything previously attempted in the way of decorations. From the Apollo Bunder to Government House at Malabar Point, whether it be the handsome and stately buildings or the meanest dwelling, great endeavours were being made to decorate and only with such decorations as the gorgeous East can supply.

I have watched with amusement a London crowd gather as a workman proceeded with the simplest of jobs, but it is no comparison to that which interests and seemingly electrifies the native of India as he watches the process of erecting the many arches and other paraphernalia. From early morning to late at night, thousands of men, women, and children throng the streets, and watch with unmingled curiosity the preparations going forward for greeting the son and daughter of the King-Emperor. To all classes the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is a source of genuine satisfaction, especially so at this moment when the question of the partition of Bengal has led to so much agitation and boycott of British manufactured goods. It is hoped that the Royal visit will divert the attention of the natives from the movement and check the energies of the Bengali leaders.

Accustomed as we are at home to express our hopes for fine weather, the question of the hour and expression here is, "Will it be cool?"

Unfortunately, when the great day arrived very little breeze was found near the landing stage. The long wait in the sun drove many away to seek the shelter of the Taj Mahal Hotel and other shady spots, resulting in many empty seats when Their Royal Highnesses did arrive.

And what a sight to unaccustomed Western eyes was the continuous arrival of the Native Princes and Ruling Chiefs of Western India! Arrayed in all the colours of the rainbow, their arrival went on for two or three hours. Here and there greatly amusing were some of the equipages. Coaches and anything on wheels, hidden, perhaps, since the dark ages, had been turned out for this occasion. A friendly Anglo-Indian explained to me that one specimen of a retinue that arrived with an escort of ten or twelve mounted men were mounted so badly, not for cheapness sake or that the Raja was a poor man, but because had their horses been too well bred they stood a good chance of bolting or causing some damage or other to the rider. Of course this did not apply to a third of those that came to pay homage to their future Emperor.

Amidst the salvo of guns Their Royal Highnesses landed at the Apollo Bunder, on whose steps to greet them was the Governor's staff and other High Officers of State. A touch of colour was added by the greeting and profound salaams of Sir Pertab Singh.

As His Royal Highness set foot in India this gallant chieftain humbly laid his sword at the feet of the Prince. A touch of pathos was thus added to this impressive scene. At the top of the flight of stone steps the ceremony of introducing the Rajas, their suites, and members of the Parsi community occupied considerable time. As each presentation was made His Royal Highness shook hands with unaffected cordiality. This part of the ceremony over, His Royal Highness inspected the smart Guard-of-Honour of the Royal Scots, and then followed by his Staff, walked under the triumphal arch to the dais, where he was to receive the Corporation's address.

Now the Royal cortege moved off at a stately walk. What a goodly cavalcade it was! From the Apollo Bunder, as far as eye could reach, stretched a splendid array of nodding plumes and flashing swords and dancing pennons, helmet and turban, horse and artillery. Each balcony and window was bright with keen eyes and animated faces, with gay frocks and gorgeous sarrees. Behind the stolid ranks of the infantry was wedged a solid mass of humanity clad in the variegated yet always graceful colours which only the East can show. And as the shrill notes of the trumpet gave the call to advance, every verandah and coign of vantage broke into a fluttering kaleidoscope of handkerchiefs and flags, and from ten thousand throats rose a joyous cry of welcome, and an earnest outpouring of the deep spring of loyalty which exists in every true heart, and welled over at the advent of the grandson of India's revered Empress, the son of her beloved King-Emperor.

First came a smart and well-mounted police officer, Constable

Burgh, followed by the Staff Officers of the Quartermaster-General's Department, the band and one squadron of the 10th Hussars, the "Great Tenth", the crack cavalry regiment of the British Army, under Major Vaughan, D.S.O. The reception by the populace knew no bounds. Bombay had given way to enthusiasm, and the scene which presented itself to the Royal visitors no pen can describe. It was evident to one and all that the Prince and Princess had already won the hearts of the people.

The opening of a new street in the native quarters was the event of Friday. When the Bombay Improvement Trust was created by Lord Sandhurst in 1898 to deal with the appallingly insanitary condition of the city, revealed by the close inquiry instituted during the plague operations, three main works were entrusted to it—the improvement of the unwholesome quarters of the native town by clearing and re-modelling the worst districts; the construction of main thoroughfares running east and west providing new arteries for traffic and admitting the sea-sweetened western breezes into the centres of dense population; and the rescue of those parts of the island still undeveloped from the blight of the jerry builder. This great clearance scheme closely resembled the work carried out in Kings way by the London County Council. This was, for the nonce, the Princess Street, which Their Royal Highnesses opened on the second day in Bombay. The usual cortege led the van of the Royal procession from Government House.

Hussars and Native Cavalry composed the escort, and then about half a dozen wild looking men in flowing white robes with enormous white pugarees came dashing along through the spectators to form the rear-guard. They were mounted on singularly spirited mules and huge musselsacks, sprinkling water as they went, hung from either side of the saddles. The rush with which they came on quite took everybody aback, but when the point of the situation became understood the onlookers laughed their heartiest and cheered the "bhistics" to the echo. Shortly after the start one of the native troopers left his saddle and embraced mother earth, but he was speedily up again and back in his place in the ranks, apparently none the worse for the un-rehearsed experience which had befallen him.

Bombay's new street opened, a move was made to the "People's Fair", a conglomeration of highly amusing side shows and other things necessary to amuse the natives.

The levee held in the evening was a big affair. Natives vied with Europeans in getting foremost into the Royal presence, and some amusing scenes were witnessed.

Preceded by a brilliant staff His Royal Highness ascended the staircase and walked to the Presence Chamber. The scene then was one of no little brilliance and dignity. His Royal Highness stood in front of the gilded chair; he was wearing the uniform of a Vice-Admiral of the British Navy, with the ribbon of the Star of India. On his left was His Excellency the Governor of Bombay, and on right and left the Staffs, representing almost every rank in the Royal Navy, and the uniforms of the most famous regiments in the British Army. Then, as those entitled to the private entree were received, there was a constant procession of handsome uniforms, both civil and military, of judges in wig, and gown, and of Native Chiefs in their magnificent silks and embroideries. When the private entree gave way to the public entree, the atmosphere became greyer, for now black and white predominated. Some fifteen hundred presentations were made, and it was midnight before the last gentleman passed before His Royal Highness.

Pioneer.—A pleasant incident occurred at Kala-ka-Sarai station yesterday afternoon. When the Princess of Wales arrived there by motor-car from Lord Kitchener's camp on her way to Rawalpindi the Royal train was not ready to start. Her Royal Highness at once had some of the people brought to her, and as at Jaipur enquired about their occupation, mode of life, customs, etc. The Princess showed herself thoroughly interested in all that was told her, while those who were privileged to be questioned went away much elated.

This morning after breakfast the Prince rode with Lord Kitchener and Staff up the Grand Trunk Road so as to witness the forward movement of the Northern Army, and later on struck across country in order to see the troops at close quarters. He was thus enabled to follow accurately all that was being done, and only returned to camp when the rearguard of the Southern Army had passed through Kala-ka-Sarai and had fallen back upon the Margalla position. The morning's operations were quite interesting and instructive, and the men acquitted themselves well, though they had bivouacked out in the cold after their long march of the previous day. It may be remembered that at nightfall yesterday three of Sir Alfred Gaselee's Brigades (Southern Army) were entrenched on a line which blocked the approach to the Margalla Pass by way of Kala-ka-Sarai. This line extended from Mesia on the railway south-west through Losar to Brama and had a front of about five miles. General Wodehouse was in command of three Brigades which formed the 2nd Infantry Division, his Brigadiers being Woon, Park and Watkins. The Cavalry Division, under General Haig, were to the south-west of the Mesia-Losar-Brama line, while the 4th Infantry Division were busy entrenching themselves on the Margalla heights and in the Pass. It was to enable them to do this that the Cavalry and 2nd Divisions were thrown across the enemy's line of advance. The Northern Army bivouacked on a line extending from Wah across the Grand Trunk Road to Kamala with the railway on their left flank. Their two Infantry Divisions were thus concentrated ready to drive the 2nd Division out of their entrenchments and this was easy of accomplishment as the attacking force was two to one. Sir Archibald Hunter, Commanding the Northern Army, took the further step as a diversion of sending the 9th Brigade, under Colonel Pollock, to Tarmukhi, north of the Shalditta Pass which gives direct access to Gobra junction on the railway. It may here be mentioned that General Gaselee, alive to the importance to watching this Pass, had detached a Battalion to hold it, and thus Colonel Pollock's Brigade could not do more than threaten this part of the position. The 1st Division of the Northern Infantry under Sir Edmond Barrow, with the Cavalry Division under Sir Locke-Elliot, began their advance by moving from Wah upon Brama, thus threatening to turn the left flank of General Wodehouse's Division. At the same time the 3rd Division under Major-General Walter Kitchener advanced upon Losar and Mesia. There was thus a fighting front of some seven miles and in the face of the danger of both his flanks being enveloped General Wodehouse began to retire upon the Margalla position. This movement was effected fairly rapidly as regards the right and centre, but more deliberately on the left. The country was admirably suited for such a retirement as it was cut up with ravines and a number of home-steads could be held almost to the last moment. Further, the Grand Trunk Road being higher than the fields on either side and having long stretches of road metal piled up alongside, gave excellent cover for men lying down, their khaki uniforms rendering them almost invisible. I watched the retirement of Park's Brigade and saw how the 2nd Queen's worked. They had to hold on to the road in order to enable the retirement to be rapid. The men availed themselves of every piece of cover. They fired their blank ammunition as carefully as if it had been ball cartridge and paid due attention to their sighting. At one period some 200 men, with a maxim which was lowered under its tripod, spread-eagled level with the ground, managed to pour in a very heavy fire upon the enemy.

There was a clump of trees with circular mud walls near at hand, and this was smartly occupied. The Northerners came streaming across the fields making for the ravines, but they must have suffered heavily had it been real warfare. There was some very pretty rearguard action on every part of the field, and it was almost exciting to see companies doubling away and then taking new positions where they at once opened fire. Now and again guns opened fire on the Northern side but there was no good target for them at any time. A tendency was noticeable towards the close of the retirement for the Northerners to press too far forward, regardless of the heavy musketry fire which met them and thus one saw Infantry engaged at 400 or 500 yards. The Umpires could not be everywhere, but this point of too rapid advance when the retiring force is still in good order cannot fail to be noted.

By the afternoon the 2nd Division had been driven back past Kala-ka-Sarai, the Prince and Lord Kitchener watching the fighting about the centre. The Division made an orderly retirement, Watkin's and Woon's Brigades passing clear of the left front of the Margalla ridge and joining the Gaselee's general reserve near Thatch Kalil in the rear of ridge, while Park's Brigade marching along the Grand Trunk Road made direct for Nicholson's Monument in the Margalla Pass, where he came under the orders of Sir P. O'Moore Creagh, Commanding the 4th Infantry Division. The 3rd Division was halted near Kala-ka-Sarai for some time. The 1st Division had similarly pushed past Brama driving in Wodehouse's left and advancing until they had occupied the villages of Jhang Balot and Jalala all south-west of Kala-ka-Sarai, thus joining hands again with the 1st Division. Sir E. Locke-Elliott's Cavalry Division had meanwhile swept round to the south beyond Jhang, the idea being to cut Gaselee's communications with Rawalpindi. Haig's Cavalry Division had kept in touch with them, on Wodehouse's left flank, but eventually joining Gaselee's general reserve and holding a short line between the Pind and Chokur villages, five miles west of Jani-ka-sang railway station. This may be taken as the position of the two armies at 2 P.M., by which time it became fairly clear that Hunter meant to turn the left of the Margalla position.

The afternoon witnessed some of the most instructive tactical work that has yet been done. The Prince once more rode out with Lord Kitchener and proceeded towards the extreme western point of the Margalla heights where some low foot hills run out into the plain. On his way he saw General Walter Kitchener's Division making a demonstration against the Margalla Pass, 18 field and some mountain guns covering the advance of the Infantry. Fire was heavy on both sides and the crackle of musketry was continuous from the heights on either flank of the Pass, the men being so well placed that they were absolutely invisible. Four 4-inch guns in the mouth of the Pass and Mountain Artillery on the crest to the west replied to the fire of the field guns in the open at long ranges. The troops forming the extreme right of Walter Kitchener's Division veered south-westwards and 1½ battalions eventually attacked the extreme western point of the Margalla heights. But far more important than all this was the great turning movement which Barrow was making with the whole of his Division. The Guides were leading, and the Infantry in a body pressed on from Balat and Jang due south and occupied Tharbaiti and Jod in the Haro Valley. The advance was a splendid one to watch as regiment after regiment, in extended order, pushed forward up the valley and thus threatened the rear of the Margalla heights. Everything was well ordered and the troops were handled in a fashion that left little to be desired. But Gaselee had not been idle, for he had become aware that the main attack of the enemy was developing at a rapid rate and that their further advance up the Haro Valley must be checked; otherwise he would be compelled to evacuate the whole position and fall back upon the road to Pindi. He could not afford to withdraw any troops from Margalla Pass and heights as Walter Kitchener's Division might then press home its attack, but he had his two Reserve Brigades of Infantry and Mountain Artillery available, and these he hurried to the hills south of the Haro Valley and hence they could pour a flanking fire upon Barrow's Division in case it moved forward from Jod. At the same time he directed Wodehouse to occupy the spurs about Thatch Kalil, Haig's Cavalry and Horse Artillery supporting this movement from their position near by at Pind and Chukur. Here occurred a very realistic scene, for Wodehouse's leading Brigade had to come up at the double, so quickly had the head of Barrow's division appeared at Jod. No time was lost in opening a heavy fire upon the latter, and Gaselee at the same time brought up his heavy artillery. Up to this point Barrow had 18 field guns opposed to an equal number, but the heavy guns changed the whole aspect of the situation, and Barrow's Division was held to have been checked. It could not advance beyond Jod in the face of such a fire as it came under.

The Northern Cavalry, under Sir E. Locke Elliott, which had been moving well to the right of Barrow's Division, could not force their way up the Haro Valley as they were not only opposed throughout by the Southern Cavalry, but they also found the country terribly cut up by ravines in every direction.

Thus the afternoon closed with Gaselee still in possession of the Margalla heights and Pass.

Lord Kitchener as Director-in Chief of the operations sent word to Sir Archibald Hunter that the Northern force had been checked, and that his remaining chance was to carry the heights by a night attack as news had been received that reinforcements for the Southern Army were coming up from Rawalpindi. Operations were suspended at 5 P.M., the Prince having watched with the closest attention Barrow's turning movement and his advance up the valley.

His Royal Highness then rode back to the camp at Kala-ka-Sarai. From 5 to 9 P.M. the troops are resting, cooking and eating their food and preparing for the night attack. Hunter's plan is to advance his left from Kala-ka-Sarai and Jalala, his Infantry working up the ravines towards Margalla Pass, while on his right Barrow's Division will storm the western end of the heights. At midnight it is hoped that the Northern Force will be in a position to deliver their attack, three Brigades of Walter Kitchener's Division assaulting the Pass itself. If this plan proves successful, the Southern Force will retire to Jani-ka-Sang and begin its march back, though it will take the troops all their time to reach Pindi during the day.

The scene here at the present moment is one that proves how large a force has been engaged. The Northern Army is now all beyond Kala-ka-Sarai, but thousands of camels and other transport animals are moving along the Grand Trunk Road, all making for the Margalla Pass, the only route that can be followed. Clouds of dust are raised as the transport moves slowly along and one wonders whether it will all be through the Pass before the night attack begins. Once beyond the Margalla heights, six roads lie open to the troops and animals. The passage of 50,000 men with their transport is no light matter, however, especially as all those of the Northern Army and a large proportion of the Southern Army have had a very heavy day. This can be best understood by the statement that Wala is ten miles from Jod, and the line and distance covered by Barrow's Division during the day has been much more than this. However Rawalpindi has to be reached by Thursday evening, as there is the Grand Review on Friday.

Lord Kitchener has been Chief Director of the Manœuvres, with Sir Bindon Blood as Deputy Director, and the latter has had with him his officers of the Northern Command Staff, and with this combination the operations have been successfully carried out on the strategical lines laid down in advance. The tactical developments, as stated yesterday, have been left to Divisional and Brigade Commanders under Sir Alfred Gascolee and Sir Archibald Hunter, and the general verdict seems to be that there have been practical and instructive lessons derived from the operations.

The night attack is now proceeding, but even with a bright moonlight it is difficult to follow the movements of troops save at very close quarters. Long lines of dust can be seen on the plain which lies north of the Margalla heights and every few minutes a low red flash shows that guiding lights are being used to direct the march of Walter Kitchener's three Brigades. Firing is proceeding.

The Pass is being captured and the Southern Army are retiring upon Jani-ka-Sang. Everything was over by 10.30. General Clement's Brigade on Kitchener's left attacked the heights to the north of the monument, two Battalions storming the actual position at the monument, while another Brigade rushed the heights immediately to the south of the Sarnais and shrill cries heard showed that Pathans were to the front here. Sir P. O'Moore Creagh's Division opposing the attack used magnesium flare lights, which shone out most brilliantly and enabled his men to pour a terrific fire from their entrenchments which, as previously stated, were admirably placed. The attack had to succeed, and it certainly lacked nothing in execution considering the ground that had to be passed over at night, while the dash of the regiments making the assault was very fine. Lord Kitchener and the Army Head-quarters Staff were present and watched the final developments of the attack. A few hours hence the whole of both Divisions will be on their way to Rawalpindi.

The latter will take place on the maidan on the 2nd January. For this entertainment subscribers will be the first to receive tickets.

Pioneer.—His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor presided to-day over a meeting, held in the Council Chamber, of the Central Committee of the Medical Memorial College scheme, the total subscriptions towards which now amount to over eight and a half lakhs. Various questions of importance were talked over and His Honour delivered the following speech:—

"I congratulate the members of the Committee very heartily on the general response that has been made and is being made to the suggestion that a Medical College should be founded at Lucknow to commemorate the visit of Their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. That the promised donations include very large sums, and are sufficient to justify a request to His Highness to lay the foundation stone is a matter for congratulation, but it is equally a subject of congratulation that the scheme has secured universal approval. Many who are not in a position to contribute large sums have shown that the project is one which they have at heart, and the legal profession and the educated classes generally have been prominent in their support of the movement, and have given not only of their money but of their time. A new development has been given to the original scheme by the Raja Tassaddug Rasul Khan, C.S.I. This development is the establishment of a branch college for women, to be named after Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. I anticipate the greatest benefit to the community from this Women's College. It should, in my opinion, be completely separate from the college for men, and there is ample space whereon to build it close to the Lady Dufferin Hospital. Medical tuition, meaning thereby the teaching and training in India of women as doctors, was one of the primary objects of the Dufferin Fund. We have classes for Female Hospital Assistants at Agra, but we have done nothing to give higher medical teaching and training to educated Indian women. The time will not, I hope, be long before educated Muhammadan and Hindu ladies will be found who are willing to take up the profession of medicine. Education in the colleges will be conducted with every regard for the customs of the country, and the trained lady doctors will command the confidence and respect of the women who seek their aid.

"The Government of India have agreed to the establishment of the College, the cost of which would fall on the local Government on the following conditions: that at least eight lakhs are promised by substantial men, who can be relied upon to pay within a reasonable time; that the local Government make themselves responsible for realising the subscriptions; and that a suitable site can be secured without trenching upon the sum required for the construction of the College. I have accepted these conditions.

"I wish to announce that His Royal Highness the Prince has graciously consented to lay the foundation stone of the Medical College and Hospital on the 26th December. I understand that arrangements for a fitting reception of Their Royal Highnesses have already been made. I am gratified to learn that the Committee has invited representatives from our principal Colleges and High Schools to view the ceremony. I am glad that so far as possible our young men and boys should be present and carry on to the coming generation the remembrance of this occasion. There is, in my opinion, no site in the Province which can compare with the site selected for the Medical College and Hospital. It is close to the city, yet it will stand in ample grounds of its own, and it is protected from building encroachment by Victoria Park. The sanitary and medical advisers of this Government, indeed all whom I have consulted, have approved of the site. It is royal land and must be presented by Government to the College. We all desire that the Hospital and College should be the best of their kind. Within the last twenty years great changes have taken place in the construction and administration of hospitals. In the place of one large building, a plan of pavilion or cottage hospitals has generally been adopted, so as to facilitate the proper accommodation of patients, and to avoid the overcrowding of the site. There is ample space for such a hospital on the place now selected, and enquiries are being made as to the best plan of hospital. Again, as regards the Medical College buildings, we shall gather up the results of experience in the older medical colleges of India and Europe. We shall consult the University to which it will be affiliated, and ask the University to establish a Faculty of Medicine. We shall seek expert advice as to the course of studies, the number of years required for full qualification, at what period in the career of the student general education may end and special medical study begin. It will have to be decided how far we will go. We shall then see exactly what buildings are required, and how they should be arranged. All this will take some time, but it will be time well spent. Colonel Murray, Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, has recently paid a special visit to Lahore Medical College, and his knowledge, observation, and experience will be of good service. It is proposed to move the Bacteriological Laboratory of this province from Agra to Lucknow. At present it is in a hired house, and it would be in many ways convenient if the work of our eminent chemist and bacteriologist, Mr. Hankin, were conducted in Lucknow in a properly constructed laboratory. Mr. Hankin's help would be most valuable to the Medical College. I need not dwell on other consequent developments, but I wish to assure members of the Prince of Wales's Memorial Committee and subscribers to the fund that the Government and its advisers will do all in their power to carry out the wishes of donors, and to establish a Medical College of which the United Provinces will be proud.

Pioneer.—Among those who contributed to the comfort in which the Prince and Princess of Wales made their recent trip up the Khyber, Mr. Danjibhoy should not be forgotten. He provided the carriages and horsed them in a way which made the journey to and from Landi Kotal an easy and rapid one. Needless to say the Prince was the first to express appreciation of Mr. Danjibhoy's arrangements.

9TH DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—THE Prince of Wales has graciously accepted a copy of "Sahifazarin," published by the Nawal Kishore Press in commemoration of the King-Emperor's Coronation and spoken of by Lord Curzon as a book that will bring home to the minds of many readers the true significance and importance of the Delhi Durbar.

Daily Chronicle.—An extraordinary demonstration of Indian armed strength assembled on Rawal Pindi plain to-day for review by the Prince of Wales. The troops comprised 7,000 cavalry, 5,000 artillery, and 35,000 infantry, making a total strength of 55,000 officers and men, with 13,000 horses, 146 guns, and 14,000 transport animals.

The scene was extraordinarily impressive. In the march-past the artillery and cavalry were splendidly horsed, and faultlessly equipped, and the infantry were in grand condition. British, Sikhs, Pathans and Gurkha went by in double companies in grand style. Neither men nor horses showed any trace of the strain of the past fortnight's campaigning.

The horse artillery went past at the gallop, and the cavalry at such a pace as only the Indian horse, or a horse trained in India can go. A few men and horses went down, but there was no serious casualty. The infantry then marched past in mass of brigades in line of quarter columns, showing to advantage their physique and condition. The final advance of horse artillery and cavalry at the gallop in a line a mile and a half long was a brilliant display.

The Prince was highly pleased with the spectacle he had witnessed.

The lesson of the manoeuvres just ended is that the Indian Army was never so ready for war.

Daily Telegraph.—The only vestiges now left of one of the most important reviews which has ever taken place are the trampled and wheel-torn plain and the vast canopy of dust still slowly drifting southwards, illuminated by the fiery crimson of a splendid sunset. From the beginning to the end of the march-past to-day nothing could well have been bettered, in spite of the fact that the whole of the gigantic operations were totally unrehearsed. Perhaps the gallop-past of cavalry might now and then have been a trifle more spirited had the review not followed three days' severe manoeuvres, succeeded by a twenty or thirty miles' tramp into camp last night.

But this is hypercriticism, and it is pleasant to remember that, on the whole, both in cavalry and infantry, the British regiments marched past with even more credit than natives. In particular, the gallop-past of the horse batteries—an evolution which ours alone of civilised armies ever attempts—was magnificently impressive, and though the entire review, including the preliminary inspection, lasted for hours, there was not an uninteresting moment.

Among the unending varieties of races and tribes of India who were represented to-day—from Brahmins of ancient lineage to the Moplas Regiment from Madras, whose name proclaims their scanty pedigrees—not one failed. A spirit of competition was abroad, and whether it was a single company of Punjabis, Muhammadans in a mixed battalion, or the self-conscious pride of the two massed brigades of Goorkhas, over 5,000 strong, the infantry step was as bright and the bearing as soldierlike.

The Prince of Wales, who is in robust health, took the salutes through the morning, and rode home, heartily congratulating Lord Kitchener upon the splendid exhibition he and the Princess had just witnessed.

Reuter's correspondent states that in military circles the most important feature of the review was the return march of the massed divisions, including all the infantry, cavalry, artillery, and sappers, which go to make up a war division on its field service formation, under its own divisional generals and brigadiers, by whom they have been trained in peace. For the first time this formation has been shown, and the possibility of doing it is the result of Lord Kitchener's redistribution scheme, seen for the first time in effective operation.

An Army Order which was issued to-night contains the following letter from the Prince:—

My dear Lord Kitchener,—After having spent three days in the camp of the manoeuvres of a large portion of the Army in India and witnessed the parade and march-past this morning, I am anxious to express my appreciation of the physical fitness and high standard of training evinced by the troops in the field and the smart and soldierlike bearing on parade. I much regret that time will not permit of my staying longer with them, but I have seen enough to enable me to form a high estimate of the efficiency of the Army and of its readiness to take the field whenever it is called to do so.

While congratulating you on your splendid command, I beg that you will convey to all ranks an assurance of my great pleasure in having been thus personally associated for the first time with the King-Emperor's army in India under these practical conditions. I shall take the earliest opportunity of communicating to His Majesty these very favourable impressions which I have been able to form.—Believe me, yours very sincerely,

GEORGE.

Englishman.—Everyone in any degree who is responsible for the great review which closed the manoeuvres at Rawal Pindi to-day faced this morning with a considerable degree of trepidation. All that the wit of man could devise to make the biggest review ever held in India a complete success had been done. Horses and men were ready to the last buckle and chin strap, the timings were worked out to seconds, the programmes were exhaustive in their details. But in Pindi at this season of the year man proposes and the dust disposes. The Pindi dust is the most fearsome in all this dusty land of India. It sweeps up in vast curling clouds of impenetrable yellow on the smallest provocation, obscuring everything from view. It has a penetrative quality unequalled even by glycerine, and its acrid pungent odour is abominable. As a precautionary measure the space in front of the saluting post was sown with barley, which was just showing green above the ground, and covered with litter, whilst a corps of bhistis was held in readiness. But these were a thin protection against the attack of fifty-five thousand horse and foot, and if the wind chanced to be in the wrong direction no one would see anything beyond occasional glimpses of the soldiery through a khaki fog.

It was a singularly impressive sight, this of a fifth of the fighting force of India standing silent, immovable on the plain. By their depth you could just discern the artillery from the horse, and both from the foot, but beyond the occasional flash of a bayonet there was no sign of life. Presently His Royal Highness galloped on to the ground distinguished by his British General's uniform crossed with the Star of India Ribbon, and with Lord Kitchener and their brilliant staffs commenced his ride down the long line, the Princess following in a four-horsed Landau. Little could be seen of this part of the ceremony for the dust raised by the Royal cavalcade and their escort of yellow-bellied Skinner's Horse obscured everything from view. You could just distinguish the advance of the royal cortege by a little thicker cloud of dust and no more. The inspection took just an hour, and when their Royal Highnesses and the Commander-in-Chief turned to the saluting point they were the centres of an animated gathering that embraced all Rawalpindi but contained no more interesting figures than the Tashi Lama of Shigatse and his yellow-robed retainers.

At first it looked as if the worst were going to happen. The morning was intensely cold and absolutely still, so that the dust raised by the regiments as they were marched into position hung like a haze under a sky that was of a wintry aspect. All that could be seen from the long stands flanking the saluting post was an ochre plain fading into a thin fog through which could be faintly discerned a long dark line. Soon then the haze lifted a little and this line resolved itself into two and a half miles of the finest fighting men in India. Here were arrayed four batteries of Horse Artillery, sixteen regiments of Cavalry, nine batteries of Field Artillery, nine batteries of Mountain Artillery, two companies of heavy artillery and fifty-two battalions of infantry. On translated into bulk figures fifty-five thousand officers and men, a thousand horses, a hundred and forty-six guns, and a hundred and thirty-six machine guns. This takes no account of the fifteen thousand transport animals massed by the roadside.

Then the unexpected happened, the sun burst through the wintry clouds and a gentle breeze rolled back the dust haze.

Instantly the full splendour of the muster was revealed, the scarlet and green, the blue and yellow and khaki of the varied uniforms, the flashing of lance points and the sheen of bayonets. It was with the sun full upon it that the line broke up and resolved itself into batteries, squadrons and battalions, each moving off amidst its own little cloud in readiness for the march past. A fanfare of trumpets and the march past began. In the van the staff comprising besides the splendidly mounted junior officers the great chiefs of the army, Major-General Selater, Major-General Duff, Major-General Parsons, Major-General Collins, Major-General Elliot, Major-General Henry, Surgeon-General Gallway, Lieutenant-General Gaselee, Lieutenant-General Sir Bindon Blood and Lieutenant-General Archibald Hunter. Finally His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Kitchener, a splendid figure, splendidly mounted and looking the embodiment of robust health.

Englishman.—A correspondent writes from Jammu:—The camp, pitched at Satwari, which is the cantonment near here, for the Prince and Princess of Wales, is well nigh ready. The bungalow known as Satwari House has been re-furnished for Their Royal Highnesses, the staff and others being accommodated in a huge camp, lit throughout by the electric light. An imposing arch has been erected at the entrance to the camp and another a permanent structure at the city gates. Raja Sir Amar Singh has pushed things on energetically; his Private Secretary, Dewan Bishen Das, working hard and Mr. Campbell, the Divisional Engineer, has done the laying out of the camp and its decoration. The ladies of the Residency have been very busy in seeing to the interior arrangement of the tents in camp. The task has been almost doubled owing the Royal camp having to be removed for His Excellency the Viceroy to Jammu. The Resident with his staff are in camp at Satwari. His Highness the Maharaja returned to Jammu from Godavari on December 1st. The programme for next Saturday and Sunday is as follows:—Their Royal Highnesses are timed to arrive at Satwari at 9 A.M.; H. H. the Maharaja will pay his visit at 11-30 and the return visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is fixed for 4-30 P.M. There will be a State Banquet at 8 P.M. On Sunday, the 10th instant, Their Royal Highnesses and Staff will attend Divine Service in the Durbar Tent. The Bishop of Lahore will officiate, and Mr. Burroughs, the State Bandmaster, will preside at the organ. The Prince and Princess of Wales leave Jammu at 10-30 on Sunday evening.

English Review.—Apart from the direct value to the Empire and the Crown of such visits as the Prince of Wales is now making to India, the indirect gain arising from the tours of Royal personages in our distant dependencies is considerable. Where the Princes are, there are the journalists also; and thus each trip of a member of our Royal house to the ultimate ends of British territory becomes the text for essays in popular enlightenment on this, that, or the other area or people. We cannot know too much about India; for whilst we do not share the absurd alarm of some of our contemporaries with reference to the so-called "Russian designs" in Asia, India must remain always, it is evident, the Achilles' heel of the British Empire. Given such a settlement of our vexed army question as will provide a reasonable force of white troops with which to leaven the dusky masses on which our dominance in India indisputably stands, we have no fear of dangers from without. For that matter, we have no serious misgivings as to the maintenance of the internal peace of India, if the problem of its gradual development be entrusted to wise men—men who will not chatter openly like school-girls of their differences, but will strike the happy mean that lies between the stern repression of native aspirations and an excessive truckling to native pretensions. No one recognises more keenly than ourselves the difficulty of the task that may be stated in such easy terms, and our sense of this difficulty is not lessened after reading some of the many instructive articles in the English and other papers inspired by the visit of the Prince of Wales. Mr. Sidney Low's contributions to the Standard have interested us particularly, and they have disturbed us just a little. Mr. Low appears to have been especially fortunate in his opportunities for studying 'educated' Indian opinion at close quarters and he has observed 'a certain acerbity' in the sentiments of 'many influential Indians towards the English and English rule.' The 'educated' Indian 'is a man with a veiled grievance,' not so deeply veiled either as it used to be. If the educated classes rather than the common peoples of India were the root of our power in Asia, we might be extremely upset by Mr. Low's articles. As it is, we note them simply as symptomatic of something less than a spirit of rebellion that must nevertheless be faced and dealt with.

Globe.—The Prince and Princess of Wales saw a notable and most splendid sight yesterday, when 53,000 trained soldiers, European and Asiatic, paraded before them at Rawal Pindi. That great military station, with the Himalayan slopes forming its background, and the snow-clad mountains rising behind, could hardly be equalled for natural picturesqueness in the whole of India. The adjacent country has the additional advantage of being almost level with only such occasional undulations as vary the scene. The review of a force amounting numerically to a couple of Army Corps, could not fail, therefore, to be deeply impressive in any circumstances. Its fighting strength was almost exactly double that of the military contingent assembled at Imperial Delhi to do honour to the Coronation Darbar. But on the present occasion there was among the spectators a guest whose presence invested the occasion with an historic character. Never before has the Sovereign Pontiff of Tibet made personal appearance at such a scene; and it may be farther affirmed that the Tashi Lama would have remained in seclusion at Lhasa had not the Younghusband Expedition entirely changed the Tibetan political attitude towards British India. Occupying, as he now does, the position of Grand Lama, and wielding all the authority, sacred and temporal, immemorably attached to it, the Abbot of Shigatse ran the risk, as he knew full well, of being deposed as a renegade and apostate. It is indisputable, therefore, that before he started from the Potala on the long journey to Rawal Pindi he must have taken counsel with the other great hierarchs and ascertained from them that his performance would be highly agreeable to the large majority of his subjects, both monks and laity.

Pioneer.—The manoeuvres came to an end on Wednesday when the Southern Force made good their retreat into Rawalpindi. An interesting feature of the manoeuvres have been the experiments made with various appliances, an enumeration of which will be found in our special Correspondent's account. At the time our correspondent wrote the Royal party were in a luxuriously furnished camp awaiting the grand review that was to take place yesterday on Khanna Plain, when close on 60,000 men were to march past His Royal Highness.

Pioneer.—The following is the text of the address which will be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales at the foundation stone ceremony of the Medical College, Lucknow:—

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS.—The people of the United Provinces take pride in their loyalty and loving devotion to His Majesty the King-Emperor and the Royal Family, and all classes of His Majesty's subjects, of whatever creed, have evinced an eager desire to commemorate the visit of Your Royal Highnesses, a desire continually accentuated by the gracious acts of sympathy which have marked the path of Your Royal Highnesses through India. The need of a Medical College affiliated to the Local University has long been felt; the active support at all times extended by His Majesty and Your Royal Highnesses to all movements for the development of medical work has touched the hearts of the people in this Province, as in other parts of the Empire; and it seemed to all that no memorial of this glad occasion could be more appropriate than a Medical College. The proposal to start this movement was made by Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan, C.S.I., of Jhangirabad; it was promptly taken up by Maharaja Sir Pratap Narain Singh, K.C.I.E., of Ajodhya, and other prominent gentlemen in both Provinces. The list of subscriptions ranges from the munificent donations of three lakhs of rupees by Maharaja Bhagwati Prasad Singh of Balrampur, fifty-five thousand rupees by Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan, C.S.I., and fifty thousand rupees by the Hon'ble Raja Ali Muhammad Khan Bahadur of Mahmudabad to the not less welcome offerings of pocket-money by students at our colleges and schools: some of our most active workers have been journalists and busy members of the legal profession. Their Highnesses the Maharaja of Benares and the Raja of Tehri have aided us with gifts of fifty thousand and ten thousand rupees, respectively. The movement marks an epoch in provincial history: for the first time, the two Provinces of Agra and Oudh have united in a public work: loyalty and gratitude to Your Royal Highnesses have made us one people.

"We shall endeavour, with the help of Government, to make this College the best in the East; and it is part of our scheme to open a Branch College for women. We respectfully pray that this Institution may bear the name of Your Royal Highness and that the Branch College for women when complete may bear the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.

"That Your Royal Highness may graciously be pleased to lay the foundation stone is our further humble prayer."

Pioneer.—This evening a dinner party was given by Lord Kitchener in honour of the Prince and Princess, and a reception followed for senior military officers who were presented to Their Royal Highnesses.

All the troops have now reached their camps here and will have a well-earned night's rest before appearing at the Grand Review at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. It is estimated that just over 53,500 men with 146 guns and 136 machine-guns will march past, the largest force ever assembled in India for such a purpose.

Queen, The Lady's Newspaper.—Rawalpindi, the Aldershot and Woolwich combined of North India, the Prince of Wales makes his headquarters from December 5 to December 8, is some 170 miles north of Lahore, and about 100 miles south of Peshawar. Politically in the Punjab, it is to all intents and purposes part of the new North-West Frontier Province, of which it is the chief military station and arsenal. It is here that the great military manoeuvres and review will take place, instead of at Delhi, as originally intended.

It is not surprising that the army in India takes a more prominent position in the social order than at home. For one thing, its necessity is more obvious. In short, one might almost say that, comparing the status of the army in India and Great Britain respectively, the army is as much more an important factor in the state than it is in Great Britain as the army in Germany is to that in Switzerland or Norway. For one thing, as Mr. G. W. Steevens has pertinently observed, the army is far more in evidence than at home. Probably nine out of ten Englishmen have never seen a greater number than 4,000 or 5,000 troops collected together. Near London, of course, there are no open spaces where large bodies of troops can be manoeuvred satisfactorily. Even at Aldershot I believe 4,000 is the record at the Jubilee Review.

In India, on the other hand, opportunities of witnessing the massing of troops comprising whole divisions are frequent at the great military stations, Rawalpindi, Secunderabad, Quetta, Delhi, etc. The officer, too, takes his profession more seriously than at home, where the army is too often regarded as a pleasant occupation for a few years, affording great social advantages and opportunities for sport to the rich idler.

The establishment of this immense entrenched camp or military base at Rawalpindi is, of course, the direct result of the latest phase of the great frontier problem. This question is no doubt the crux of the foreign policy of India. The Government of India, from the time of Lord Auckland down to the rule of Lord Curzon, has attempted to solve it in turn by a policy of conquest, alliance, subsidised native levies, partial annexation, and frontier posts to say nothing of the addition of a "masterly inactivity" policy and the temporary doctrine of a policy of buffer states.

The present policy might be called one of "defence, not defiance;" at all events, its main principle consists in the withdrawal of the advanced posts among the semi-independent districts in the Borderland, and strengthening the forts and garrisons on the borders of the new Frontier Province, utilising tribal levies for the defence of the Khyber Pass, and to some extent allowing the natives to police themselves. But this is, of course, only a lay, and necessarily inadequate, description of the policy whose problems seem insoluble.

Most authorities are agreed, however, that in 1879 we lost a splendid opportunity of settling the frontier question once and for all, though of course it is proverbially easy to be wise after the event. Lord Roberts, by his famous campaign, had practically offered Afghanistan to India. Unfortunately, instead of annexing it, the Government were satisfied with the nominal control of the chief passes. However, political matters are outside the scope of these descriptive papers, but this digression may perhaps be excused, as it explains why Rawalpindi is the most important military station in India.

Kashmir was lost to India in a more unpardonable manner than Afghanistan, it being actually sold, when the Punjab was annexed in 1849, to a Rajput General, Golab Singh, for the sum of £1,000,000—a transaction considered by most authorities to be one of the most discreditable acts ever committed by the Indian Government, and the chief blot on the rule of Lord Dalhousie. The present Maharaja of Kashmir is the second in descent of this Rajput soldier of fortune. The Prince of Wales, indeed, will have much food for thought in his visits to Rawalpindi and Jammu.

In one of Lord Curzon's speeches he explained the frontier policy so remarkably lucidly and graphically that his definition is worth quoting. Comparing India to a fortress surrounded on two sides by the sea as a moat, and a chain of mountains like a rampart on the north, he likened the frontier territories to a kind of glacis, which must remain in the hands of tribes allied to us. In short, these frontier states should form a kind of neutral zone, or buffer states.

Rawalpindi is a modern town, and possesses no sights or attractions for the ordinary tourist, unless he is interested in military affairs. But though there is nothing typically Indian, it is a pleasant residence, with a beautiful and singularly well laid out public garden and park, and it has a picturesque situation, with magnificent mountain views. As it is the most important military state in the Frontier Province, there is plenty of society open to visitors with introductions. To most travellers, however, it is chiefly known as the starting place for Kashmir excursions.

Then the beautiful hill station of Murree, one of the highest in India, is easily reached from Rawalpindi, being only forty miles distant.

Jammu, which will be the headquarters of the Prince of Wales for a day or two, is the ancient capital of Kashmir. Here is the Maharaja's palace, which occupies a commanding site on the banks of the river, confronted on the opposite shore by a singularly picturesque fort. There is an almost total lack of accommodation for visitors, which no doubt accounts for its being rarely found in the ordinary globe-trotter's itinerary. The present Maharaja is Sir Pertab Singh, an enlightened and progressive ruler.

To reach Srinagar, the "Summer capital" of Kashmir, takes the greater part of three days of extremely tedious tonga travelling, the distance being some 170 miles. It is, of course, unfortunate that the Royal visitors will not see that region, which has greater scenic attractions than any in our vast Indian dependency. The charm of the famous Vale of Kashmir—the Happy Valley—has been sung by many Eastern poets, and at second hand by Thomas Moore. This oval valley, some 6,000 feet above the sea, is inclosed by snowy peaks, vast forests, and glaciers, and enjoys a sub-alpine climate that makes the famous sanatorium a summer paradise to those sweltering in the Punjab plains. Travellers may be forgiven for rhapsodising over its beauties, its green fields, its flowery meads, covered with blue irises, so that the ground seems to reflect the sky; the hawthorns, chestnuts, and wild strawberries, the villages embowered in orchards and trellised with vines, the floating gardens on its lakes. In short, the tourist finds here a kind of blend of Switzerland.

Srinagar itself, the capital of this Indian Switzerland, and Italian lakeland, is in some respects the most striking city in the Indian Empire. Well may the City of Waters, with its rivers, lakes, and canals fringed by palaces and temples, be called the Venice of the East. Then the European quarter with its tents, houseboats, and launches, suggests an Oriental Henley.

Spectator.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Peshawar was fittingly concluded on Monday by a drive through the Khyber Pass. Escorted by a detachment of the Khyber Rifles, the frontier Militia recruited from the Afridis, the Prince and Princess drove from Jamrud to Lundi Kotal, halting at the famous rock fort of Ali Musjid to receive a number of representative Afridi Maliks, or headmen of the warlike tribes of the Khyber. As the Times correspondent observes in his remarkable despatch, no more striking example of the flexibility of the British rule could be furnished than in the régime adopted in this "independent territory," where neither British laws are enforced nor British administrators introduced, but the tribes are left free to govern themselves according to their own customs, subject to the maintenance of the Pax Britannica, within certain well-defined limits.

Standard.—The military manoeuvres came to an imposing close to-day with a combined review of the Northern and Southern Army Corps outside Lord Kitchener's camp near here.

Over fifty-five thousand men marched past the Prince of Wales. This is the largest army that has ever been assembled in India in time of peace. The force that marched past the Duke of Connaught and Lord Curzon at Delhi during the Coronation Darbar festivities numbered only 29,600 men. On the present occasion, too, it must be remembered that it was not a mere parade force, but an actual mobilised army, complete with transport and equipment of all kinds, and nearly one hundred and fifty guns.

Though the troops have had four very exhausting days of marching and sham fighting, in which some of the corps have covered over a hundred miles, while many have spent two nights sleeping in the open, the men, British and Indians, showed no trace of fatigue, and appeared on parade in splendid condition. All branches of the Anglo-Indian Army were represented. Sikhs and Gurkhas, Punjabis and Pathans, vied in steadiness with the Gordon Highlanders, the Queen's (Royal West Surrey Regiment), the 9th and 12th Lancers, and 3rd Hussars.

It was a magnificent spectacle when T. and I. Batteries, Royal Horse Artillery, thundered past the saluting flag at a break-neck gallop, followed by the Indian cavalry, whose dashing horsemanship was rendered still more conspicuous by their picturesque uniforms. Perhaps an even more impressive sight was the advance of the infantry by divisions, these huge masses of armed men, in scarlet or khaki, moving slowly together with a tread that shook the earth.

The Prince of Wales, who has spent a large part of the past four days on horseback, witnessing various stages of the manoeuvres, was over five hours in the saddle this morning; and I am able to say that he greatly enjoyed the superb military display which Lord Kitchener had prepared in his honour.

Conspicuous near the Royal enclosure was the Tashi Lama with his suite, in bright yellow dresses.

The Princess of Wales, attended by Lady Eva Dugdale, was dressed in white, with a white ostrich boa.

In military circles, the most important feature of the review was the return march of the massed divisions, including all the infantry, cavalry, artillery, and sappers which go to make up a war division on its field service formation under its own divisional generals and brigadiers by whom they have been trained in peace. For the first time this formation has been shown, and the possibility of doing it is the result of Lord Kitchener's redistribution scheme seen for the first time in effective operation.

Times of India.—There is news from the elephant forest of Kakenkote to the effect that a herd of from 80 to 100 has been located and is being watched. It is being kept within bounds for the convenience of the encircling operations later on, but both fodder and water are running short and are insufficient to last such a large herd till the first week in February. The authorities contemplated pumping up sufficient water from the Kubni river but gave up the idea as the throbbing of an engine might have the effect of scaring off the herds if the smoke did not. Elephants are probably the most keen scented creatures on earth and elaborate precautions are necessary even in the matter of camping. In these circumstances it was suggested that the herd might be driven into the large Khedda there to await the final drive into the smaller Khedda, but even this alternative requires consideration in view of the contingency that the elephants will have become practically domesticated before Their Royal Highnesses arrive, and there would, therefore, be no sport or excitement in the final drive into the tying up stockade.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 9TH DECEMBER 1905.

Sanjivani.—Referring to the route which has been selected for the Royal party to drive along on the 3rd January next, when they will be out inspecting the city of Calcutta, the Sanjivani [Calcutta] of the 30th November writes:—

One cannot help according high praise to the intelligence of those who selected the route. The streets through which Their Royal Highnesses will drive are mostly fronted by business houses and rarely by residential dwellings. Further the Europeans and not the Bengalis form the predominant element in the population in the neighbourhood of these streets.

Bharat Mitra.—In connexion with the programme of His Royal Highness on the night of illumination in Calcutta, the Bharat Mitra [Calcutta] of the 2nd December says that the Prince must have seen many English shops and English houses in his own country. Is the object of His Royal Highness's visit to India after having crossed seven oceans and many rivers only to see the English quarters of Calcutta? It is to be regretted that our ruler who has come to see us should not be allowed to do so on account of the carefully prepared programme of his trip which excludes the native quarters of the town.

Sandhya.—The Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 4th December writes as follows with reference to a recent note in the Bengalee newspaper to the effect that Mr. Allen, the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation, of his own motion wrote suggesting the Municipal address of welcome to the Prince had better be read out by a native gentleman, instead of by himself:—

We are amazed at this piece of news. If all feringhee officers of to-day had been endowed with good sense like this, then there would have been no end to our happiness and prosperity. The real fact, however, is that the Prince himself has made this suggestion to Mr. Allen. When a draft of the address was submitted to His Royal Highness for previous perusal, a note was sent along with it stating that it would be read out by Mr. Allen, the Chairman. Thereupon the Prince wrote back that he would be highly pleased if a native gentleman did the reading out of the address. It is at His Royal Highness's desire that Nilamber Babu has been selected to read out the address. The idea never suggested itself to Mr. Allen in his wildest dreams.

What wonderful magnanimity! His Royal Highness is the son of his father and hence the strength of his desire to please his [future] subjects. Such good-heartedness is only natural in one who is the son of King Edward and the grandson of Queen Victoria—King Edward, a Sovereign whose good-heartedness is incomparable, and Queen Victoria, a lady at the recollection of whose name it becomes impossible to stem the stream of reverence which spontaneously begins to flow from the heart.

Compare this large-heartedness of the Prince with the littleness of the King's officers here: and the difference is as great as that between heaven and hell. When His Royal Highness first landed at Bombay, the Chairman of the local Municipality, Sir P. Mehta, was not invited to attend the reception. The fault is that he happened to be a native. Though subsequently the point was yielded by the Government of Bombay, what meanness and littleness did it not indicate!

The Prince by his large-heartedness has protested against this littleness. On the soil of the metropolis of the Indian Empire he will show that as the English are his father's subjects so are the Indians equally. In order to please his subjects in this way His Royal Highness would rather accept his address of welcome from the native Vice-Chairman rather than from the English Chairman. Prince! at this exhibition of unfeigned love for your subjects our hearts overflow with reverence!

But how can we show this reverence to Your Royal Highness? How can we rejoice and make ourselves festive at your auspicious visit? Lord Curzon, the late representative of your father, has left the country after having wounded us to our heart's core. And now Messrs. Carlyle and Halliday, and Jack, Fuller and Company are holding unrestrained sway over the land. They will not permit us to lay bare our hearts before Your Royal Highness. That is why in the sorrow of our hearts we shall keep silent. Let not Your Royal Highness take offence on this account. All the fault lies with the Viceroy who has now left these shores, and Messrs. Carlyle, Fuller and Company. We received Your Royal Highness's father with our full hearts, but we shall not be able to give a similar welcome to you and your consort, because your father's officers have laid a heavy burden on our hearts. We shall welcome you in our hearts and remember your virtuous desire to please your subjects, but we shall not be able to make any public demonstration of these sentiments.

Sandhya.—The Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 30th November publishes a poem by a correspondent in which the writer says:—
Sisters, you are as flowers delicately preserved under a cover of purity and modesty. Do you preserve your sanctity and honour intact. Your modesty is the gift of the gods, and your lives are spotless like the silvery rays of the moon. What a pity that Mlechhas will touch your beautiful persons! Are you not the daughters and wives of Hindu homes that you will go to Belvedere to join a brilliant party? Mother Bengal has been ruthlessly sawn through, still you are going to fawn and flatter. Alas! Alas! O' forbear, don't create a scandal by shamelessly withdrawing your veils. The country is going to be ruined through the fault of the Hindus. Sisters, restrain yourselves and save the honour of the Hindus.

Daily Hitavadi.—The Daily Hitavadi [Calcutta] of the 2nd December publishes a long poem under the heading "Female jatra in Belvedere." This so-called jatra or dramatic piece is divided into three scenes. The first scene is laid in the house of a Judge, in which the Judge, called Judge Ghosh, and some of the grantees of Calcutta, among whom is a certain Mitra, a Premchand Roychand scholar, are represented as discussing the question of sending their pardanishin ladies to Belvedere for receiving the Princess of Wales. Eager to secure the favour of the lat, some of the gentlemen present consent to send their ladies to Belvedere.

The second scene is laid in the Bethune College in which the son of a certain Raja of Pathuriaghata is represented as selecting fair and beautiful girls from the students of the college for sending them to Belvedere on the occasion noted above.

The third scene is laid in Belvedere in which a number of pardanishin Bengali ladies are represented as being present for receiving the Princess of Wales.

The poem is written throughout in a sarcastic and condemnatory tone.

The Ratnakar [Asansol] of the 2nd December condemns the proposal to hold a party of pardanishin Bengali ladies at Belvedere in order to receive, according to the writer, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. What, wonder, remarks the writer, that those people who consider it their highest privilege to be slaves of Englishmen should send their fair ladies to the Prince to please His Royal Highness? When flattery has failed to achieve for these people to desire of their heart, what harm is there, it may be asked, in taking advantage of the present situation and trying as a last resource to gain their object by dedicating their ladies to the service of Englishmen? Ladies are greatly honoured by Englishmen. He must, therefore, be a great fool who will loose this opportunity. But are the Bengali ladies expected to dance with their white guest in a ball?

Sandhya.—The Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 2nd December greatly objects to the holding of a pardah party at Belvedere, and writes:—

Who advised Sir Andrew Fraser to launch a proposal in which the honour of the whole Bengali nation was involved? Fringis never deviate a bit from their own habits and customs when they come into contact with natives, as for example in feasts given by natives in their own houses. To give up Bengali customs and send Bengali pardanishin ladies to the house of one who belongs to such an uncompromising race would mean loss of honour for the Bengalis. Besides this, if to-day pardanishin ladies go to Belvedere for receiving the Princess of Wales, fringi kazis (judicial officers) will, on this precedence, ere long ask them to attend law courts to give evidence in cases. The writer advises the pardanishin Bengali ladies not to condescend to go to Belvedere at the request of their guardians men, that is, who can sacrifice everything for the purpose of showing themselves off to fringis and acquiring titles. Besides this, pardanishin Bengali ladies, with their natural shyness and modesty, are sure to suffer great disadvantage and embarrassment in the midst of European ladies who will consider them uncivilized and uncultured and laugh at their movements. The Princess should be received by pardanishin ladies in the house of one of them, and not at Belvedere. That will serve the purpose of both doing honour to Her Royal Highness and saving their own honour. Let the Hindus discuss and decide the point and save their society from a grave scandal.

Swadesh.—With reference to the proposed pardah party at Belvedere to meet the Princess of Wales, the Swadesh [Calcutta] of the 4th December writes that the majority of Hindus who observe the rules of their religion have objections to such a party. All are eager to greet the Princess, but many will object to send their ladies to Belvedere because it will run counter to their long-established family and social usages. The example of Bombay might be followed at Calcutta and the Town Hall chosen as the place where to meet Her Royal Highness. Better still would be the house of a Bengali of eminence and universally recognised position.

Sandhya.—In connexion with the proposed pardah party at Belvedere the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 4th December notices a rumour that those gentlemen, who find themselves obliged to send their ladies to this party against their will, intend getting out of their present difficult situation by catching hold of some quite distant and poor female relatives or dependents and sending them as representatives of their families.

Sandhya.—A correspondent of the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 5th December writes as follows with reference to the proposed pardah party at Belvedere:—

Everybody has heard the story of the fox without a tail. Nevertheless, it is a matter of no small regret that the distinguished Sovabazar Raj family are being beguiled by Mr. Mitra into tarnishing their family honour.

Raja Binay Krishna will have the title of Maharaja. To keep the Government in humour by any means whatever will now seem to him a higher duty than the worship of his own tutelary deity.

The late Maharaja Narendra Krishna used to be called the shahebraja by all—his usages at home had long been of the feringhi type—nevertheless we stand amazed to-day at the conduct of the well-educated Maharaj-Kumar.

The case of Kumar Girindra Narain Deb one is sorry to think of. He may be a Government servant, but why does he not always remember that he is the grandson of the late Raja Radha Kant Deb? Raja Radha Kant encouraged female education both in his own family and in other Hindu households, but Mr. Drinkwater Bethune could never persuade him to agree to send the girls of his family to a girls' school. What change has the course of time produced—to-day the grandsons of the same Radha Kant, in slavish forgetfulness of family pride, are feeling not a whit ashamed to send their own ladies to the Belvedere party. There are still left some spirited men among the members of the Raj family. Can they not bring these Raj Kumars to their senses and rescue them from the meshes of Mr. Justice Mitra and Raja Binay Krishna?

Let them know this, that if their ladies are sent to Belvedere to-day, to-morrow they will have to attend the courts also.

Utkaldipika.—The same paper gives a sympathetic account of the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in different parts of India, and presents portraits of Their Royal Highnesses to its readers.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE-OWNED PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE CENTRAL PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 9TH DECEMBER 1905.

Hari Kishor.—The Hari Kishor (Yeotmal), of December 4th, states that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (the future Emperor of India) has conferred a great boon on the people of this country by his visit, accompanied as he is by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, coming from a distance of 5,000 miles, to see the condition of the people of India. But from the magnificent arrangements made for his tour in India, with a fixed programme, it is not known whether the condition of the poor Indians will come to his knowledge whilst enjoying the grand hospitality of Native Chiefs. For in spite of famine being present in Rajputana itself and spreading to other Provinces the Prince has been touring through Udaipur, Jaipur, Bikanir and other places in Rajputana enjoying banquets and shikar. He does not seem to have as yet shown any pity for the famine-stricken people. He has given only empty thanks to the Maharaja of Jaipur for giving four lakhs of rupees to the Famine Fund, but the Hari Kishor has not heard that he has himself contributed anything towards the Fund. There are 23,000 persons on famine relief-work in Rajputana and famine has made its appearance in Agra, Gwalior, Bhopal and other places. Khandesh, Maharashtra and the Madras Presidency have also been suffering from famine to some extent. Under these circumstances it is very unfortunate for the people of India that their future ruler should display only empty sympathy whilst crores of their rupees are being expended in entertaining him.

SELECTIONS FROM ENGLISH PAPERS OWNED BY NATIVES OF MADRAS AND OF VERNACULAR PAPERS PUBLISHED IN MADRAS FOR THE WEEK ENDING 9TH DECEMBER 1905.

Svadesamitran, Madras.—The Svadesamitran, of the 8th December, learning that one of the resolutions to be passed at the forthcoming meeting of the Indian National Congress is that the President of this year with the ex-Presidents living in India should, as representatives of the Congress, present the Prince of Wales with an address of welcome, remarks that the Congress Committee will be extremely fortunate, if the Prince grants permission to these representatives to approach him. This paper, however, doubts whether the permission will be accorded, as the Prince will have to make some definite statements in regard to the grant of political privileges to the people of India, which he may not like, and as even though the Prince may be willing, the officials who feel no sympathy for the Congress will try to advise him not to grant such an unprecedented permission.

Vikataadutan, Madras.—The Vikataadutan, of the 9th December, suggests to the Madras Reception Committee that the following programme may be substituted in lieu of receptions, dinner parties, dances and other things which are now arranged in honour of the Prince of Wales's visit:—

- (1) that the Prince should, as soon as he comes to Madras, pay a surprise visit to some village and personally witness the miserable condition of its residents;
- (2) that he should visit some big temple for making inquiries in regard to Hindu religious questions and to the waste of temple properties;
- (3) that he should pay attention to the oppressing water-tax and the foul water at present supplied to the people;
- (4) that he should attend the High Court unperceived when second appeals are heard, so that he may find out whether the angry and disrespectful remarks passed by some of the Judges have any bearing on the subject of the cases;
- (5) that the magisterial courts in the mufassal should likewise be inspected by the Prince;
- (6) that he should also visit the Collector's offices to see when the Collectors go there; and
- (7) that he should grant an interview to those non-officials who wish to express publicly their impartial opinions regarding the condition of the people as was done by him in Australia.

Svadesamitran, Madras.—The Svadesamitran, of the 9th

December, is sorry to note that while arrangements were made by Lord Kitchener and his staff for the accommodation of the representatives of Anglo-Indian newspapers during their stay near Rawalpindi to witness the manœuvres, the representatives of the Indian papers, who also accompany the Prince of Wales, were not cared for; and remarks that Lord Kitchener probably thought that the black slaves need not be respected. This paper trusts that the editors of Indian newspapers will avenge this insult.

SELECTIONS FROM THE NATIVE NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES RECEIVED UP TO 9TH DECEMBER 1905.

Central Hindu College Magazine.—The Central Hindu College Magazine (Benares), for December, referring to the visit which the Prince and the Princess of Wales are going to pay to the Central Hindu College at Benares in February next, says:—In memory of this auspicious event, a Fund will be raised to erect the long-planned Technical Institute, for no better way can be found to commemorate the visit of the Prince and Princess than the building of an Institute to train some of their future subjects in knowledge which will enrich both the Empire and themselves. Donors of Rs. 5,000 and upwards will have their names inscribed in the list placed with the address in the Casket.

DECEMBER 10TH, 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—At a meeting of the Central Committee for the Prince of Wales's Memorial Medical College at Lucknow it was announced that the subscriptions already amounted to Rs. 9,15,350, and a further sum of Rs. 17,500 as a special donation for the women's branch college was also notified.

Madras Mail.—Leaving Rawalpindi a blaze of light last night and a most brilliant tattoo in progress, Their Royal Highnesses journeyed to Jammu, where they will be the guests of the Maharaja of Kashmir until Sunday evening, when they depart for Amritsar. This visit to Jammu will be very quiet and a pleasant rest after the strenuous days at the manœuvres. On arriving this morning Their Royal Highnesses were received with a fine display of the Imperial Service Troops for which the State is famous and are housed in the most perfectly arranged Camp they have yet seen. At 10-30 a.m. the Maharaja paid his formal visit to the Prince, which was at once returned at the picturesque Mandi Palace in Jammu, five miles away. There will be a State banquet this evening, followed by a Lama dance and fireworks.

To-morrow alms will be distributed to the poor of Jammu, the Prince having intimated his desire that the Ziafat or customary present of sweetmeats of the value of about Rs. 500 offered to His Royal Highness's party should be converted into food and sweets and given in alms to the poor.

Madras Mail.—Prince of Wales's Camp Satwari, 9th December.—At the Banquet at Jammu His Royal Highness spoke as follows:—

MAHARAJA SAHIB.—I thank you most warmly for the charming manner in which you have proposed the healths of the Princess of Wales and myself. We are both of us delighted to be the guests of this famous State of Jammu and Kashmir. Thirty years ago, my dear father enjoyed the hospitality of Maharaja Runbeer Singh and he has never forgotten the splendid and loyal welcome which he received at the hands of the Chief of the Dogras. In England, we are, perhaps, more familiar with the beauty and fair fame of the Vale of Kashmir than we are with the less known but not less honourable record of Jammu. I wish that circumstances could have enabled us to accept the Maharaja's oft-repeated invitation to visit Kashmir, but His Highness knows how difficult it has been to do all that we wished to accomplish. We should, however, have been truly disappointed if we had been obliged to forego the pleasure of a visit to Jammu for I wished to have an opportunity of doing honour to a Chief, who has, in a marked degree, thrown in his lot with the fortunes of the Indian Empire. I wish, on this occasion, to record the appreciation which is felt by me and my fellow country men of the brave and important services which His Highness and his Imperial Service Troops have rendered to our Empire on the distant frontiers of his State, and I am rejoiced to hear of the great public works which His Highness is so wisely undertaking. They will, undoubtedly, add to the prosperity of his State and his subjects, and are of a magnitude sufficient to make Kashmir famous even in this progressive age. I am glad, too, that the Maharaja is making efforts to give the advantages of higher education to his people, and am delighted to think that our stay here is to be associated with a College to be called after me. Our visit to Jammu happily coincides with a constitutional change in the Government of Jammu and Kashmir.

Ladies and Gentlemen, in asking you to join the Princess and myself in drinking the health of His Highness the Maharaja I feel sure that we shall all, most fervently, wish that the change to which I have alluded will bring to him honour and peace of mind and to his people security and happiness.

11TH DECEMBER 1905.

Englishman.—The Committee of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce declare that Friday, the 29th instant, which has been gazetted by the Government of Bengal as a holiday under the Negotiable Instruments Act, 26 of 1881, in honour of the arrival on that day of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, shall also be recognised by the Chamber, under Charter Parties and Shipping Orders, as a public holiday, according to the custom of the Port.

Englishman.—The Princess's Necklace.—The coloured pearl necklace, which the Corporation of Calcutta propose to present to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales on her arrival in Calcutta is on view at Messrs. Hamilton and Company's show rooms, in Old Court House Street, and rate-payers are invited to inspect it.

Pioneer.—Jammu was reached by the Royal party on Saturday morning. Durbars were held the same day and a banquet in the evening. In toasting the health of His Royal guests His Highness the Maharaja announced his intention of establishing a State College in Jammu as a memorial of Their Royal Highnesses's visit.

Pioneer.—Visitors who arrived here from Rawalpindi today state that the torch-light tattoo near Lord Kitchener's Camp was very successfully carried out. The Prince and Princess and Suite afterwards proceeded to the Railway station, the whole route being illuminated while the station itself was also brightly lighted up. The roads were thronged with people and also with sepoys who had obtained permission to leave the camps. All who were guests of Lord Kitchener, from the Royal party downwards, enjoyed his lavish hospitality most thoroughly, while the courtesy and consideration shown by the Staff Officers was very pleasant indeed. Everyone felt that he would have liked to have stayed many days in the camp.

The Royal party arrived here at 9-30 this morning, the train stopping at Satwari, which is a few miles short of the Tavi River, beyond which Jammu city is placed. The Maharaja of Kashmir, with his brother, Sir Amar Singh, and the principal State officers, was present on the platform and was duly presented by Colonel Pears, Resident in Kashmir. The Resident's Staff, with officers of the Imperial Service Staff and number of ladies and gentlemen, guests of the Durbar, were also in attendance. Mir Shahib Hari Singh, a charming little boy, son of Sir Amar Singh, now Prime Minister of Kashmir, presented a bouquet to the Princess, who pleasantly thanked him for his tribute of welcome. On the platform was a guard-of-honour from the Raghu Pertab Regiment, smart looking Dogras in khaki. Outside the station was a similar guard from the Bodyguard, composed of Gurkhas and Dogras. The Kashmir Imperial Service Lancers in scarlet furnished an escort for the Royal carriages, the Prince, with the Maharaja and Sir Walter Lawrence, being the first, while in the second was the Princess with Colonel Pears and Sir Amar Singh. A short drive along a decorated road lined with troops brought the party to the entrance of the camp spanned by a triumphal arch. The carriages drew up at what is known as Satwari House, a delightful villa in a garden sheltered by trees. Here a third guard-of-honour from the Bodyguard was in attendance and a second salute by the Imperial Service Mountain Battery announced that the Royal party had taken up their residence in the Maharaja's State. Satwari House has been beautifully furnished and the original water-colour sketches within it, from the hand of Mrs. Pears, are an artistic feature in the rooms.

After breakfast the Maharaja paid a formal State visit, the durbar being held in a tent made of Kashmir shawl work, some forty years old, while the shamiana in front of it was also of similar work. The tent poles were plated with silver and the dais was under a splendid canopy of green and gold cloth. The durbar tent and shamiana were lighted up with electricity as they were so large that daylight could not penetrate sufficiently through the doorways. Sir Bindon and Lady Blood, Major-General Walter Kitchener, the Bishop of Lahore, Mr. and Mrs. Finney and other ladies and gentlemen were among those present. The Prince took his seat on the dais and a moment later the Maharaja drove up with his retinue. He was richly, yet simply, dressed, wearing a large plain white turban and a lilac silk coat embroidered with gold and lined with the fur of the blue squirrel. Sir Walter Lawrence conducted him to the dais and after a few minutes' conversation with the Prince the presentation of durbars began. Sir Amar Singh and his son, with all the high officials and some local officers, were led up in turn by the Resident, each presenting his nazar. The military officers of the State including the Adjutant-General and the Major General Commanding the 1st Infantry Brigade, Imperial Service Troops, were very noticeable in the list,—fine, well set up men all of them. The ceremonial closed with the usual distribution of attar and gan. An hour later the Prince returned this visit driving five miles to the Mandi Palace and passing through the heart of Jammu city. The roads were again lined throughout with troops and the people gathered in crowd to see the Royal party, the students of the High School and other schoolboys cheering heartily as carriages went by. The Mandi Palace lies in a great square and its northern face overlooks the Tavi, now a small stream but a broad rapid river when the floods come down. The view from the balconies is a magnificent one as the snows of the Pir Panjal range can be seen and also the Trikotr, the three high peaks which watch over Jammu Foothills are on the far side of the river and the narrow valley is well wooded. The Durbar was held in a room, the walls of which, in their upper part, were panelled in lavender, pink and green picked out in gold. In a flowered alcove giving approach to a balcony the dais was placed with two silver chairs for the Prince and Maharaja. The ceremonial was exactly similar to that in camp and again the presentation of officials was made. The Princess watched the durbar from the balcony. In an adjoining room was almost a picture gallery of English Royalties, Indian Vice-roys and rulers of Kashmir and Jammu. A set of coloured prints sent by Queen Victoria were there and the Maharaja has also a solid silver statuette of the present King in the uniform of the 10th Hussars, a memento of His Majesty's visit as Prince of Wales in 1875.

The camp here is most beautifully laid out and is on a scale larger than any which the Royal party have seen, for there is ample space on the plain about Satwari House. There are a host of visitors here and all are accommodated in tents that are luxuriously furnished and have electric light laid on. The banquetting-hall in the rear of the durbar tent is a picture of comfort and gives accommodation for about a hundred persons. The Maharaja is generously hospitable and seeks to provide amusement for his guests. There is rifle shooting for ladies and gentlemen on the range, and on Monday for those who stay there will be pigsticking at Kaliana.

At 8 o'clock this evening a banquet took place in the banquetting-hall, which was brilliantly illuminated with electric lights suspended from the ceiling which was hidden by Kashmir cloth beautifully embroidered. At the conclusion of the dinner the Maharaja, accompanied by Sir Amar Singh and his son, the Raja of Poonch and the chief officials, entered the room and took his seat on the left of the Prince. The Maharaja proposed the health of the King-Emperor which was duly honoured, and then Colonel Pears rose and read a speech on behalf of His Highness. It was as follows:—

"Your Royal Highnesses, Ladies and Gentlemen,—Blessed is the land which feels the tread of Royalty and fortunate the happy possessor of that land who is permitted to enjoy a glimpse of the Royal countenance. Such is the belief of a Hindu. No wonder then that I should be transported with joy to-day when I am permitted to stand in the presence of Your Royal Highnesses. I am, Sirs, your hearty presence of Your Royalty. I heartily welcome on your arrival at the ancient capital of my State. Happy indeed am I to-day for the honour that is bestowed on my State now for the second time, for it is just thirty years since I was commissioned by my late lamented father to meet His Majesty the King-Emperor, then Prince of Wales, on the border of Jammu and to render personal homage. It was my good fortune on that occasion to be entrusted with the charge of all the arrangements connected with His Majesty's reception at Jammu and thus to enjoy opportunities of receiving marks of Royal favour and kindly consideration which have left a deep and enduring impression upon my mind. His Majesty's gracious interest in Jammu and Kashmir State since the occasion of his coming into personal contact with my father has ever remained fresh and undiminished, and it is to this that I ascribe the high honour that has been conferred on me by the inclusion of a visit to Jammu in the programme of Your Royal Highness's tour in India. What is it, I ask myself, at this moment that I can offer in return for all this sympathy and regard, this condescension and favour? I am fully conscious of my own insignificance, standing as I do in the presence of the heir to a march, over whose dominions the sun never sets, but whatever may be my imperfections in other respects, I am rich in possession of a heart that is firmly attached to the British Throne and is inspired with unflinching loyalty to the person of His Majesty the King-Emperor, and it is this loyalty and devotion that I venture in all humility to offer in return for the manifold marks of favour that I have received. I would beg of Your Royal Highness to assure His Majesty the King-Emperor that the ruling family of the State of Jammu and Kashmir is and ever will be ready to place its resources at the disposal of the British Crown to be utilised in whatever manner is considered necessary for the welfare of the Empire. (Applause.) It was my earnest hope and ambition that it might be found possible for Your Royal Highnesses to pay a visit to the valley of Kashmir during the course of your tour in India, for in that case the trouble and inconvenience caused to Your Royal Highnesses by honouring my State with your gracious presence would in some measure have been compensated by the charm of Kashmir's scenery and climate. I can, however, only express my sincere hope that I may yet have the honour on some future occasion of welcoming Your Royal Highnesses to my summer capital. (Applause.)

"During the thirty years that have elapsed since the visit of His Majesty the King-Emperor my State has, thanks to the kindly interest and attention bestowed on its affairs by the Government of India, made great strides in material prosperity and a marked improvement is discernable in the administration in all its departments. The resources of the State are expanding from year to year. Railway communication has already been extended to Jammu, and Kashmir itself is on the eve of being connected with the railway system of Upper India, an important electric project for utilising the waters of Jhelum has been taken in hand, and altogether the prospects of industrial expansion and the opening out of the natural resources of the country are bright and hopeful. The people are happy and grateful for all that has been done to better their condition and promote their welfare. Your Royal Highness's visit to the State therefore at such a juncture is most opportune and I am desirous of commemorating the occasion, with Your Royal Highness's permission, by a memorial of a permanent nature. I accordingly propose to establish a State College in Jammu which will benefit all classes and creeds ~~of my subjects by providing them the means of acquiring~~ the higher education necessary to enable them to fit themselves for a more extensive and important share in the administration than they at present aspire to. I earnestly hope that this proposal will meet with Your Royal Highness's gracious approval, and that I shall be permitted to associate the founding of the proposed College at Jammu with Your Royal Highness's name and call it the Prince of Wales College. (Applause.) In conclusion, I once more express my profound gratitude for the high honour done to me by Your Royal Highness's visit, which is rendered more gratifying by the presence of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales". (Applause.)

The Maharaja then rose and said:—

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—I now ask you to drink to the health, long life and happiness of my illustrious guests the Prince and Princess of Wales." The toast was drunk while the band played "God bless the Prince of Wales."

The Prince in acknowledging the toast said:—

"MAHARAJA SAHB,—I thank you most warmly for the charming manner in which you have proposed the healths of the Princess of Wales and myself. We are both of us delighted to be the guests of this famous State of Jammu and Kashmir. Thirty years ago my dear father enjoyed the hospitality of Maharaja Rumbir Singh, and he has never forgotten the splendid and loyal welcome which he received at the hands of the Chief of the Dogras. In England we are perhaps more familiar with the beauty and fair fame of the Vale of Kashmir than we are with the less known but not less honourable record of Jammu. I wish that circumstances could have enabled us to accept the Maharaja's oft-repeated invitation to visit Kashmir, but His Highness knows how difficult it has been to do all that we wished to accomplish. We should, however, have been truly disappointed if we had been obliged to forego the pleasure of a visit to Jammu, for I wished to have an opportunity of doing honour to a Chief who has in a marked degree thrown in his lot with the fortunes of the Indian Empire. I wish on this occasion to record the appreciation which is felt by me and my fellow-countrymen of the brave and important services which His Highness and his Imperial Service Troops have rendered to our Empire on the distant frontiers of his State. I am rejoiced to hear of the great public works which His Highness is so wisely undertaking.

They will undoubtedly add to the prosperity of his State and his subjects, and are of a magnitude sufficient to make Kashmir famous even in this progressive age. I am glad too that the Maharaja is making efforts to give the advantages of higher education to his people and am delighted to think that our stay here is to be associated with a College to be called after me. Our visit to Jammu happily coincides with a constitutional change in the government of Jammu and Kashmir. Ladies and gentlemen, in asking you to join the Princess and myself in drinking the health of His Highness the Maharaja, I feel sure that we shall all most fervently wish that the change to which I have alluded to will bring to him honour and to his people security and happiness."

Their Royal Highnesses and the company present then moved into the large shamiana, where the lamas from Leh danced in their weird masks and Chinese silk attire. It was not the real "Devil Dance", as there were no swords used, but none the less it had a grotesque and strange character. Chief among the lamas was the young Raja of Stok, who is crowned once a year. Following this dance was a display of fireworks with bonfires on the hill and the illumination of Jammu town. The camp was lighted up with thousands of Chinese lanterns, the triumphal arch being prettily illuminated in blue, and the whole effect was very striking.

To-morrow the Royal party will attend divine service in the Durbar tent, and in the afternoon Rs. 5,000 worth of food will be distributed as alms among the poor. This is the value of the ziyafat or customary present of fruit and sweetmeats offered to Royal visitors.

Jammu is a small town of some 20,000 inhabitants, and is picturesquely placed on a low ridge, about which the Tawi flows. The approach to it from Sattari is across a barren plain and over a narrow suspension bridge which spans the river. The railway has its terminus just short of the Tawi. It is never likely to be extended further, even on the narrowest gauge, for it is now practically decided that the route for an electric line to Srinagar shall be by way of Abbottabad. In fact, Major Joly de Lotbinière is now at Home arranging for the electric plant which will be worked by the water power running to waste in Kashmir. Jammu looks its best from this side of the Tawi, where one sees two distinctive long white walls running down on either side of the ridge, with a group of Hindu temples bright with gilded points in the immediate background. These rise from amid trees and are effective features in the view. Beyond are the houses of Jammu, its public buildings and palaces, while away to the right two straggling stone forts face each other where the river debouches from the hills. To the far north stretch the great mountain ranges, and the Pir Panjal already shows its snowy summits through the haze. Later on in the winter this view must be a magnificent one when the snow line has come down to a lower altitude. To the left of the city is the Ajaibgarh which was built to receive the present King during his visit here thirty years ago. Here we are in a land of the Mian Dogras, the bluest blooded of all. They live along the foothills that stretch eastwards from the Chenab. Beyond the Chenab to Bhimbar territory are the Chibs, or Dogras converted to Muhammadanism. In Kashmir the mass of the people are Muhammadans. One need not go into the past history of Jammu and Kashmir, for the story of the Dogra dynasty has been often told. Within the past few years the present Maharaja has had all his powers as a ruler restored to him, and thus he welcomes the Prince and Princess with a sense of prestige which adds to his gratitude for the honour shown to-day. He meets also in Sir Walter Lawrence an old friend who put the land settlement of the State on a sound basis, and thus materially increased the revenues of the Durbar.

In all the ceremonies this morning the Imperial Service Troops were much in evidence, and their appearance was that of men, who could move on service at short notice. As indeed most of them have done their tour of military duty at Gilgit and on the north-west border of Kashmir, and have come down in relief this summer, their fitness is not surprising. Many wear the old frontier medal with the Hunza Nagar clasp and the Kashmir bronze decoration. Others have the Chitral clasps, while among the mountain gunners is seen the reward for fighting in Tirah. The Durbar maintains for Imperial service purposes a squadron of Lancers, two batteries of mountain artillery and four battalions of infantry, each over 700 strong. With artillery and infantry depots the total is 3,600 men, of whom the majority are Dogras, though eight companies of Gurkhas and three of Dogra Muhammadans are in the infantry, while the mountain batteries are each composed of one section of Hindus and another of Muhammadans. At the present time a mountain battery is at Chilas, one infantry battalion at Gilgit and another at Bunji. Kashmir thus keeps guard for the Government of India along an advance portion of the frontier in the direction of the Pamir where formerly regular troops of the Indian Army had to be employed. This is Imperial Service of the most valuable kind and the progress of the movement is worth noting. In 1839 1,200 men were raised. In the following year a scheme of reorganisation was carried out, under which two batteries, a regiment of cavalry and six battalions of infantry were formed, half the artillery and infantry being detailed for the defence of the Gilgit frontier. In 1896 the present composition was ordered and it does not seem likely to be disturbed. The infantry have the Lee-Metford rifle and the mountain batteries will probably get the new 10-pounder gun in place of the screw gun, with which they are now equipped. Eight of our 10-pounders might well be spared, as the batteries have each only four guns. The record of war service is an excellent one. In 1891 the 1st Raghu Pertab and 2nd Bodyguard distinguished themselves in the capture of Nilt Fort, Sepoy Nagdu scaling the precipice at night in order to find the road on which Manners Smith on the 20th December won his Victoria Cross. Aylmer the Sapper, and Boisragon, of the 5th Gurkhas, also won their V. C.'s on that day and Badcock his D. S. O. It was a tough bit of fighting in the Hunza Nagar, and Colonel Algernon Durand, commanding the force, was among those wounded in this little hill campaign. In 1893 there was the affair of the 5th March at Chilas when 270 men of the Bodyguard held their own for 24 hours against thousands of tribesmen, and eventually routed the enemy by a counter-attack. The casualties were heavy; no less than two British officers, four Native officers, and 47 rank and file, but seven Orders of Merit rewarded the survivors. In 1890 came the outbreak in Chitral, and there the 4th Raghunath showed the stuff they were made of. They had 52 casualties in the defence of Chitral fort and Subadar Badrinath Singh and twelve men received the Order of Merit for their devotion in bringing in Captain Baird, who was mortally wounded. At Mastuj and at Reshun the 6th and 7th behaved right well, while No. 1 Battery shared in Kelly's march over the Shandar Pass, when the guns had to be dragged through the snow at a height of 12,300 feet. This battery was on the Samana during the Tirah campaign. One need not say much more than that the standard of efficiency is a very high one, and that every one, from General Sir Amar Singh downwards, strives his hardest to maintain it. A single glance at the officers and men is sufficient to show their quality, and the Prince of Wales must have been gratified to see the way in which they turned out to-day. The British Officers now here are Major J. L. Rose, Inspecting Officer of Kashmir Imperial Service Infantry; Captain Stulpnagel, Inspecting Officer of Artillery; Captain James Craik, Inspecting Officer of Cavalry; and Captain Bogle, Assistant Inspecting Officer of Infantry. Captain Sweet is on duty at Gilgit.

The arrangements for the Royal visit are most elaborate. The Royal train arrives at 8-30 A.M. on the 16th instant. The invited guests will be in their places at the Railway station at 8 A.M. The Lieutenant-Governor and General Gaselee will reach the station at 8-20; presentations will be made by them. Their Royal Highnesses will then proceed to the booking hall where the Municipal Address will be presented. At 12 (noon) His Royal Highness will receive visits from certain gentlemen at Government House. At 3-15 Their Royal Highnesses will go to the garden-party at Sikandra and will be met at the gate by the President and members of the Committee of the Agra Club and conducted to marquée, where presentations will be made. Next day the Royal party will attend divine service at Cantonment Church, and in the afternoon visit Imdad-ud-Doulat's tomb, Chini-ka-roza and the Taj. On Monday they will visit the Fort in the morning and in the afternoon His Royal Highness unveils the Queen Victoria Memorial statue here. The Royal party will be received by the President and members of the Memorial Committee and conducted to their places. The President will read an address to which His Royal Highness will reply. The Prince will then unveil the statue, the band playing God save the King. At night His Royal Highness will give a dinner, followed by a reception at 9-30. On the 19th, the Royal party will visit Fatehpur Sikri, travelling in motor-cars and returning to Agra in the evening. Their Royal Highnesses will leave for Gwalior at midnight, their departure being private.

The Burma Railways Company have determined to be second to no other railway system on which Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales will travel during their Indian tour in the matter of providing suitable accommodation. The Royal train will consist of fourteen coaches and will be 500 feet long. Seven of the coaches will be bogie saloons. After the fourth saloon will come Her Royal Highness the Princess' saloon, and coupled to it His Royal Highness's saloon. The Princess of Wales's saloon is a new one built for the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma, and is 49 feet long, with large sleeping apartments and lavatory newly and very richly upholstered and carpeted. The furniture is of the very best and everything possible has been done for the comfort of Her Royal Highness. A portion of this saloon has been set apart for the use of two maids of the Princess. His Royal Highness's saloon is coupled to that of the Princess by a gangway and vestibule. The saloon bears the Royal coat of arms on the panel of the body of the carriage in gold and red with the Prince of Wales's plume and coronet on the sunshade. The tender next to the Royal saloon will carry three valets of His Royal Highness.

Arrangements for decorating the railway station at Rangoon, Mandalay and other places on the Burma line where the Royal train will stop are being made with all expedition.

Mr. Carnell, Officiating Traffic Manager, intends to eclipse the picturesque decorations on the occasion of the last Viceroy's visit three years ago. It is proposed to have an archway at the gate representing a bridge with a train passing over it of nearly actual size.

Times of India.—We are so apt to regard Kashmir as the state which owns the Happy Valley—the loveliest sanitarium in the world—that we forget that it is a great frontier state as well, and that it has big frontier responsibilities in Gilgit as well as more peaceful relations with Yarkand via Leh. But the State to its credit has never forgotten these responsibilities. It maintains the largest body of Imperial troops of any Native State in India. There are the two Mountain Batteries, the only Imperial Service Artillery in the country, each with its 186 men, and screw-guns which it is hoped to replace with the new pattern weapon; there are the State Cavalry of 150 lances, and there are the four battalions of Infantry built up of such good fighting stuff as the Dogras and Gurkhas, all well armed, well equipped, and commanded by that good soldier Sir Amar Singh, and making the useful contribution of over 4,000 men to the defences of the Empire. In war they have nobly done their part. The Gunners bear on their colours the honourable marks of good work in the Hunza, Nagar, Chitral, Punjab Frontier, and Tirah Campaigns, whilst the Infantry also did good service in the Chitral war. In peace they are the only Imperial Service troops who take their regular turn of garrison duty. A Kashmir brigade, now composed of the 4th and 5th Infantry and the 2nd Mountain Battery, garrisons the remote frontier post of Gilgit with the outlying posts of Chalt, Gupis, and Chilas. Every two years the reliefs march up the long three hundred miles of road to this lonely outpost of the Empire, and there are many hearts which beat the lighter when this duty is safely accomplished. Indeed, from the military aspect, no state has better risen to the height of the responsibilities.

The reception of Their Royal Highnesses, on arriving from Rawalpindi, was of a distinctly military character. The Maharaja, recently restored to full ruling powers, wore the uniform of his Imperial Service Troops. The Guard-of-Honour, the smart escort, and the Artillery which fired the Royal Salute were all part of the Imperial Service system. The road from Satwari Station to the camp was lined by sturdy Gurkhas and stout fighting Dogras. Even the camp is pitched on the wide maidan on the borders of the Imperial Service Troops lines, and the majority of the officers presented to the Prince wore the handsome blue and gold, with the large white pugaree which is the uniform of the State. This was the most distinctive note struck in the visit, for Jammu is a city of much promise but meagre performance. Viewed from a distance it is a joy to the eye, a vision of glistening temples, brass sheathed pinnacles, and picturesque irregularity wrapped in a gleaming wall and clinging to the outer spurs of the hills whose snow-capped peaks are faintly seen on the horizon. Within it is a city of mean streets and uninteresting progress with few character than any centre visited by Their Royal Highnesses since they left Indore.

Has it been generally noticed that the taste of the Indian peoples is governed by their environment? In Central India and Rajputana the Durbars held by His Royal Highness induced a bewildering display of primary colours. The blues and reds, greens and yellows, seen at Indore, Udaipur, and Jaipur were indescribable in their vividness and crudeness, yet grouped under that hand of blazing sunshine there was nothing incongruous, nothing garish in their use. In these northern cities and in Peshawar, and more particularly at Jammu, where the atmosphere is soft and grey, almost wintry, we see none of those hard colours which would be singularly out of place. The yellow of the "poshteen" is the brightest hue worn and the prevailing tones are neutral which perfectly suit their medium. This was especially noteworthy yesterday when the Prince of Wales received the Maharaja in the State "shamiana" constructed some sixty years ago. This "shamiana" is lined with the most exquisitely hand-embroidered cloth in the softest and most restful shade of red, the embroideries being of a school fast dying out owing to the change of taste. These were supplemented by hangings of an equally grateful tone, and beautifully worked, whilst a blazing long fire added just one other touch of warmth to the scene. A durbar conducted with grave solemnity amid these surroundings possessed a quiet gravity of its own which was singularly inviting after the bustle of the last few days.

The return visit at the Mandi Palace suffered a little by comparison. An Indian crowd can never be uninteresting, but the complexioned placid persons who gathered on the housetops and in the narrow streets of Jammu came very near it. Nor does the Mandi Palace, that vague rambling pile built up by the Maharajas of Jammu to whom we hold Kashmir, command much respect. The doors of painted silver and the decorations of beaten gold are curious rather than beautiful, while the drawing room, which was arranged for the Princess to view the ceremony, embraced an even more than usually bizarre collection of incongruities. From the walls of the Darbar room a fine portrait of old John Lawrence looked down upon the scene, and photographs of a dozen Anglo-Indian rulers were scattered over the ante-room, but the most attractive view, as the Princess soon found, was that from the verandah of the hall. There lay the bed of the Tawi at your feet, the stream, shrunk to a mere rivulet, meandering through a wide expanse of soft grey stones. Looking down on the old palace from the opposite bank of the river, was a stout bastioned fort, the guardian of the ford, resting against a hill-side clothed in verdure. All this needed to be seen in the pellucid atmosphere of the Jammu to understand the grace and beauty of the scene.

One thought that the high water mark in camping efficiency was reached in Lord Kitchener's splendid arrangements at Rawalpindi, but even Major Cowper, who was Lord Kitchener's lieutenant, must yield pride of place to the officers who designed this beautiful camp at Jammu. It is not only that the camp is distinguished by its perfect arrangement, its smooth red roads, its stretches of velvety turf, and its electric lighting, but that a distinctive Jammu touch has been preserved throughout. The entrance arch is the most successful yet seen because it is purely Hindu, and the Banqueting Hall which opens out of the Durbar shamiana has its brick walls, which were run up in a few weeks, veiled beneath a ceiling and draperies of the most finished Kashmir embroideries.

The scene last night at the State Banquet when the Hall was softly lighted by electricity, crowded with ladies in pretty frocks, men in brilliant uniforms, the Prince in evening dress, and the Princess in a magnificent costume of rose velure, was one of remarkable grace and animation. After dinner the Maharaja joined his Royal guests and having proposed the health of the King-Emperor stood whilst Colonel Pears, the Resident, read his speech proposing the health of the Prince and Princess of Wales. In this the Maharaja referred to the fact that he was commissioned by his late father to make the arrangements for the visit of the King-Emperor to Jammu and avowed that the State of Jammu and Kashmir is, and ever will be, ready to place its resources at the disposal of the British Crown to be utilised in whatever manner is considered necessary for the welfare of the Empire. He referred to the expanding resources of the State and mentioned that Kashmir is on the eve of being connected with the railway system of Upper India. An important electric project for utilising the Jhelum has been taken in hand, and the prospects of industrial expansion and the opening out of the natural resources of the country are bright and hopeful. In commemoration of Their Royal Highnesses' visit he proposed to establish a State College in Jammu to benefit all classes of his subjects, and he craved permission to call it the Prince of Wales' College in memory of the occasion.

Of the illuminations and fireworks that followed there is no need to write, but the brief devil dance by monks from Ladakh was a most characteristic episode. As a spectacle it was disappointing. What we call the devil dance is divided into two parts, the religious and the secular. As the surroundings were secular only the former part could be given. Half a dozen weird figures of the strong Mongolian type, clad in robes of Chinese silk and disguised in hideous masks, postured for a few minutes whilst a solemn old Lama in a long yellow cap looked gravely on. The meaning which lay behind this strange exhibition was this:—The pure Buddhism of Ladakh has become overlain by a revival of the old superstitions, and these devil dances indulged in every year by the Lamas of each of the Ladakh monasteries are revivals of the pre-Buddhistic practices of witchcraft and sorcery. The people believe that after death the spirit on its way to the next world is beset by demons whose features resemble those portrayed in the masks, and if he has not been rendered familiar with them in life he is likely to be frightened out of the proper path.

Sunday was the usual quiet day of rest. In the morning the Bishop of Lahore conducted a simple earnest service in the shamiana at which Their Royal Highnesses were present.

There was no State ceremony. There was, however, one very pleasant duty in the early afternoon. At the request of His Royal Highness the customary offering of five thousand rupees was diverted to the purpose of feeding the poor of the district, and the great feast was held at the Hazaribagh to-day. It was a most pleasant sight. Twenty thousand poor of all ages, castes, and creeds assembled and were arranged in serried lines. None was excluded if only he had the claim of being hungry. The adults received their sweetmeats in packets, the little ones had their generous portions of delectable stickiness tossed into their little cloths. Their Royal Highnesses, who were accompanied by the Maharaja and all the principal officers of the State, were intensely interested, going a short way down each one of the lines and lending by their presence and gracious manner an importance to the treat which will never be forgotten by the poor of Jammu. There has been no more pleasant episode in the Royal visit.

Their Royal Highnesses left privately for Amritsar in the evening.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Arrangements for decorating Phayre-Street Station, Rangoon, Mandalay Station and other stations on the Burma Railway line where the Royal train will stop are being made with all expedition. Mr. Carnell, Officiating Traffic Manager, intends to eclipse the picturesque decorations on the occasion of the last Viceroy's visit three years ago. It is proposed to have an archway at the gates representing a bridge with a train passing over it of nearly actual size.

Daily Chronicle.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Amritsar was specially designed out of compliment to the Sikhs, who stood by the British cause so loyally at the time of the Mutiny, and who still furnish our Native Army with its most valuable recruits. The Sikhs are not a race but a religion. A man is born a Hindu, and only becomes a Sikh by baptism; and one brother may be a Hindu and another a Sikh. Thus it becomes a matter of Government policy to encourage a people, who of all the races of India are most friendly to our rule.

The two State functions which have marked the Prince's visit here were devoted to the two institutions which are intended to maintain in its virility the Sikh faith. The first of these to be visited in the morning was the Khalsa College, which was founded by the great Sikh Chiefs of the Punjab in order to impart instruction in the Sikh faith, and to prevent it from being submerged by the vastly greater numbers of Hinduism, as well as to educate backward Sikhs for Government employment. The college and school contain five hundred boys, a number which will be doubled when the buildings which are at present under construction are completed.

In the afternoon the Prince drove to the Golden Temple which is the centre of the militant religion that knits the Sikhs together into as fine a fighting race as any the world has seen.

The Golden Temple is a small, rather squat structure, with a copper dome covered with gold-leaf, and situated in the midst of a tank, which adds greatly to its impressiveness by reflecting the golden dome on every side. The temple is approached by a marble causeway inlaid with cornelians, agates, and similar precious stones, and contains the sacred copy of the Granth, or Sikh Bible. The Prince did not enter the temple itself, but viewed the scene from the platform of the clock-tower, which stands on the edge of the tank. The scene was strikingly picturesque. Upon one side he looked on a semi-circle of white houses packed with happy people, and hung with phulkaris, chuddars, carpets, and similar decorations; while upon the other side lay the tank, with the temple in its midst filled with priests, and the causeway and the pavement surrounding the temple thronged with pilgrims from all parts of India. On the platform of the temple were stationed a bank of Akalis, or religious ascetics, the strictest sect of the Sikhs, in towering turbans hung round with steel quoits; while horn-men were blowing weird conch-like blasts.

Amongst those present to receive the Prince were all the great Sikh chiefs of the Punjab, Patiala, Jind, and Nabha and many Sikh veterans from the Indian army. The Prince and Princess were greatly fascinated with the scenes in the streets of Amritsar, which besides being the religious capital of the Sikhs is a thriving centre of the carpet-weaving industry. The streets are extraordinarily interesting, hung with embroidered cloths, and packed with cheerful people, who show every sign of prosperity and loyalty. We leave here to-night, and arrive to-morrow at the great Mogul capital of Delhi.

Daily Telegraph.—For the first time since the beginning of the Prince's tour the weather to-day was overcast and chilly even at midday. Amritsar, which the Royal train reached at breakfast-time, has done its best to welcome the Royal visitors, and the reception of Phulkian chiefs in the Khalsa College this morning was made the occasion for a general decoration of the town with triumphal arches and hangings, rugs, daries, and every kind of coloured cloths.

Odd adornments were freely used—shields of the arms of the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, re-coloured after native prejudices; quaint, stiff figures on horseback; pasteboard statues, whose arms moved to the salute as any salut passed; overhead cloths of gaudy colour, and mottoes of even greater quaintness than usual.

The only difficulty that presented itself was the actual visit to the Golden Temple. This famous building the Prince and Princess did not enter, as the Sikhs refused to relax the rule by which the main entrance to the Temple, that facing the causeway, is only used by Sikhs, all others being compelled to enter by the side door. The Prince, therefore, forewent closer inspection than that obtained from the side of the tank. His Royal Highness will, however, be able to study the exquisite finish and beauty of Amritsar's famous building from a very fine model in silver-gilt and ivory which has been made locally as a casket for the address which was presented on his arrival this morning.

The Royal party drove through the town and visited the remains of Ranjit Singh's palace here. No stay will be made, as the Royal party is travelling on again to-night to Delhi.

An address presented by the Municipal Committee of Amritsar, was replied to.

Immediately afterwards Their Royal Highnesses drove, escorted by the Patiala Lancers, to the Khalsa College, where the students and professors were assembled in the shamiana.

The President read an address explaining the work of the College, and the Prince replied.

Before the Prince left, the headmaster of the school recited the Sikhs prayer, invoking the names of the ten Gurus—spiritual advisers. He prayed for the King and Queen, and called for blessings on the British Raj.

Englishman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales will arrive at Howrah railway station at 3-24 local time on Friday, 29th December. They will be received on the platform by the Commissioner of Burdwan Division, the Magistrate of Howrah, the Commissioner of Police and the Agent and officials of the East India Railway, who are concerned in the arrangements of their journey. They will then proceed on board the Howrah where they will be received by the Vice-Chairman of the Port Commissioner, the Port Officer of Calcutta and the Deputy Conservator of the Port. A salute of 31 guns will be fired by His Majesty's ships in the river as their steamer leaves the Howrah pier.

On arrival at Prinsep's Ghat the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal with his staff, the Chief Justice of Bengal, the Bishop of Calcutta, and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Forces in Bengal will proceed on board, and will be introduced to Their Royal Highnesses by Sir Walter Lawrence.

The Prince having replied to the address Their Royal Highnesses will proceed to Government House. The Lieutenant-Governor will conduct them to their carriage and a guard of Calcutta Volunteer Rifles will be in attendance.

Their Royal Highnesses will be accompanied by a full escort and will proceed to Government House via the Ellenborough Course, south of Havildar's Tank, the Red Road, Government Place East and Old Court House Street, entering Government House by the north-east gate. The route will be lined with troops.

A guard-of-honour of British Infantry will be drawn up at Government House, where Their Royal Highnesses will be received by the Viceroy and his staff, the Commander-in-Chief, Members of Council, the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's Naval Forces in the East Indies, the Chairman and Members of the Railway Board, the Secretaries and Deputy Secretaries of the Government of India, the Head-quarters Staff of the Army, and Heads of Civil and Military Departments, and other officers of the Government of India entitled to be present ruling Chiefs in Calcutta other than those of Bengal and Assam will also be present at Government House. A salute of 31 guns will be fired from Fort William. The Viceroy with his staff will meet Their Royal Highnesses at the foot of the stairs of the grand entrance, and at the head of the stairs will present the Commander-in-Chief, the Members of Council, the Naval Commander-in-Chief, the Chairman and Member of the Railway Board, and the Secretaries to the Government of India. The Commander-in-Chief will present the senior officers of Army Head-quarters Staff, and the Foreign Secretary will present the Native Princess and Chiefs.

The following, subject to minor alterations, will probably be the programme at the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial at Calcutta on the 5th January at 4 p.m. :—

The ceremony will be attended by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, with his staff, by any other heads of local Governments with their staffs, and also by the ruling Chiefs who may be in Calcutta, the Commander-in-Chief and staff, the Chief Justice and Judges of the High Court, the Metropolitan in India, the ordinary and additional members of the Viceroy's Council, the Naval Commander-in-Chief and his staff, the Chairman and Members of the Railway Board, the Secretaries to Government, and the principal officers of the Bengal Government. Ruling Chiefs will be met at the entrance at 3-40 p.m. by special officers, and conducted to their seats.

The Viceroy will arrive at 3-55 and be received at the entrance by the Trustees. All other persons will be requested to be in their seats at 3-30, and the public entrances will be closed at 3-35.

Their Royal Highnesses will leave Government House at 3-50, accompanied by a full escort, including the Imperial Cadet Corps, and will proceed via the Red Road, Outram Road, Chowringhee and the Cathedral Avenue.

On arrival at the site of the Memorial Hall they will be met by the Viceroy, the Trustees and the Superintending Architect. The audience will rise and the Prince of Wales Standard will be hoisted at the dais. A procession will then be formed in the following order :—

The Imperial Cadet Corps.

The Viceroy's staff.

Staffs of their Royal Highnesses.

The Trustees.

Their Royal Highnesses accompanied by the Viceroy.

A flourish of trumpets will be sounded as the procession approaches the dais by trumpeters stationed at the dais.

After Their Royal Highnesses and the Viceroy have taken their seats, the Lieutenant-Governor will address His Royal Highness on behalf of the Trustees and request him to lay the foundation stone. The audience will rise as the Prince and Princess, accompanied by the Viceroy, proceed to the front of the foundation stone where the working tools will be presented by the Superintending Architect. The band will play the National Anthem and the guard-of-honour will present arms.

Their Royal Highnesses will return to the dais, and the Prince of Wales will graciously reply to the address. A procession will be again formed, and then Their Royal Highnesses and the Viceroy will leave with ceremonies similar to those of the arrival.

The route will be lined with troops and a guard-of-honour of native troops will be drawn up outside the Memorial Hall enclosure at the entrance. A guard-of-honour of British infantry will be stationed near the foundation stone. On arrival at the dais the members of the Imperial Cadet Corps will take their seats on the right and left of the dais and will accompany His Royal Highness to the platform where the stone is to be laid. Spectators will remain in their seats until after the departure of His Excellency the Viceroy, and are requested not to leave until the ruling Chiefs and the high officials have departed.

Englishman.—To the good people of Amritsar is due the credit of arranging a more distinctive reception of Their Royal Highnesses than any city in India yet visited. There was the inevitable red cloth at the station, but it was overlain by a grand display of the beautiful carpets, for which the city is famous all the world over. The platform and the ante-room were carpeted with the most artistic products of the Amritsar looms, reds, greens and yellows of eastern design, and the most finished workmanship. In the roads leading to the town no general attempt was made to disfigure avenues of fine trees with tawdry bunting. Along a part of it the highway was lined with characteristic phulkaries, and though the effect as scores of eager faces peered through the hangings when the Royal cortege approached was quaint, the scheme was soundly conceived. A little later the irresistible tendency to bunting broke into eruption, and one recognised a few of the monstrous newspaper contents bills from Lahore, but the disease was kept well under control.

Although the searching cold of the Manœuvre Camp and Pindi has been left behind, it was chilly enough to make His Royal Highness glad of an overcoat, and Her Royal Highness of her furs, when they alighted at Amritsar, after breakfasting in the train. To the usual official ceremonies at the station, where Sir Charles Rivaz was present, as the head of the Punjab Government, was added the presentation of an address from the Municipality. This, like all urban addresses, spoke of the growth of this city in wealth, trade, in education and in sanitation, since the visit of the King-Emperor thirty years ago; a rather marked contrast to the doleful tale which comes from many of the agricultural districts, especially in Northern India, where rain is urgently needed for the winter crops.

The address was enclosed in a casket of the most perfect Upper India workmanship, a model of the Golden Temple at Amritsar. This most sacred fane of the Sikhs was in silver gilt and inlaid ivory. It was a marvel of delicate craftsmanship. Each detail of the wondrous temple was faithfully reproduced both inside and out, sometimes on a scale so small as to be inappreciable to the naked eye, and the citizens of Amritsar could have designed no more valuable memento of this second Royal visit.

Englishman.—One of the most interesting exhibitions which will take place on the occasion of the Royal visit to Calcutta will be the performance of the Tibetan ghost dancers under the direction of Rai Bahadur Sarat Chandra Das, C.I.E. It may be remembered that this unique entertainment was given before His Royal Highness's brother, the late Duke of Clarence, on the occasion of his visit to Calcutta fifteen years ago, and we believe that the Duke was so delighted with it that it was specially repeated for him on another occasion.

Indian Daily News.—Their Royal Highnesses, who arrived at Amritsar at 8-30 this morning, did not leave the train until after 10 when they were received by Sir Charles Rivaz, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, the Commissioner of Lahore and a number of local officials. The station was very prettily decorated, and the West Yorks furnished a guard-of-honour. The presentation of the Municipal address took place in the entrance hall of the station, which had been converted into a Durbar Hall, with two thrones upon the dais covered with gold cloth, a Royal canopy surmounted by the Imperial Crown covering the thrones. The address was read by Mr. Whaggi Yesuf, a member of the Municipality, and was enclosed in a beautiful casket of silver gilt and ivory of the exact model of the Golden Temple of Amritsar.

The address stated that the news of Their Royal Highnesses' intention to visit India was received with unbounded joy. After referring to the visit of the King thirty years ago, the address proceeded :—"Since your august father's visit this city has made great progress in wealth, trade, education, and sanitation, which results we attribute, under the blessing of God, to the British Government. It is needless for us to enumerate the many benefits we have received. Not the least of these are the improved means of communication which have made Your Royal Highnesses' extended tours possible, and which will, we hope, lead to other visits from Your Royal Highnesses in future.

We humbly desire that Your Royal Highnesses will be pleased to convey to our Emperor an expression of the sincere loyalty of all classes to His Majesty's throne and Royal person and our thanks and gratitude for the blessings of peace and prosperity which we enjoy under his benign rule. In conclusion, we pray that He who is the ruler of all things may vouchsafe to Your Royal Highnesses the blessings of a long and happy life."

His Royal Highness, in his reply, said :—Gentlemen,—I thank you on behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself for the kind words in which you welcome us to this celebrated city. We were both most anxious to see as much as possible of the famous centres of India, and we could not leave the Punjab without alighting at the place which is so dear to those good soldiers, the Sikhs. If time had allowed, we should gladly have prolonged our stay in Amritsar, but even our short visit here will add to those lasting impressions which we shall carry away with us. Here as elsewhere there has been great progress since my dear father visited you thirty years ago, and we rejoice to hear of the increase in your wealth, trade, education and sanitation. It would seem to be most appropriate that the Khalsa College should have been instituted in this city so sacred to the men of the Khalsa. Renowned as is Amritsar for its commerce, it may be that some day it will be equally renowned as the great centre of Sikh education. It will please the King-Emperor to whom I shall gladly tender your loyal expressions to receive your acknowledgment of the peace and prosperity which you enjoy under his rule. We both of us hope that these blessings may long attend you and your city.

On the conclusion of the ceremony at the railway station, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the Khalsa College, escorted by the Patiala Lancers. The decorations outside the station were very effective. The drive to the College was for a part of the distance along an avenue of trees, and approaching the College several triumphal arches were met bearing Sikh mottoes, while the road was bordered with Amritsar cloths enclosing the route. It was a strikingly effective scene that was arranged at the College, and the ceremony which took place was no less striking. Shamianas had been erected in front of the College of warm hued fabrics, and there was a large gathering of brightly-dressed people. Sikh sardars and officers of the Imperial Service Troops occupied the space on each side of the dais, and in front was massed a throng of white turbaned men. Behind them were the students of the College, wearing bright yellow turbans, forming a most effective background of vivid colour. Four of the Phulkian Chiefs wore robes of pale green, heavily embroidered with gold and turbans of pale yellow and gold. The Chief of Nabha was in pale blue, with a white headdress. His Highness of Jhind wore a red covered dress with design of gold brocade, and the Maharaja of Kapurthala was in plain European morning dress, with a cream tinted turban. As the Royal carriage drove up, the students and others gave forth the Sikh's salutations, "Wahi guruji ka Khalsa, sri wahi guruji ki fategi," which may be freely translated, "The Khalsa is from God, and victory is through Him." The Lieutenant-Governor, who received Their Royal Highnesses, presented Mr. Justice Rattigan, President of the Managing Committee of the College. The Prince and Princess next greeted the Chiefs, and on Their Royal Highnesses taking their seats, the boys on each side of the shamiana began a shrill hymnal chant in the vernacular, each set of singers responding to the other. Thereafter

Mr. Justice Rattigan read the address, setting forth the history of the College.

Mr. Justice Rattigan delivered an address explaining the history of the College.

Mr. Justice Rattigan, in welcoming the Prince to the Khalsa College, Amritsar, said : May it please your Royal Highnesses,—On behalf of the Khalsa College Council and Managing Committee, I venture to offer Your Royal Highness and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales a most loyal and hearty welcome to this national educational institution of the Sikhs, and with the gracious permission of Your Royal Highness to explain briefly the history of the college and school and the objects for which they were established. It is now some years since it was realised by those who had at heart the well-being of the Sikh peoples that the very nation that had by their martial instincts and acknowledged valour in the field of battle proved themselves on every occasion the inferiors of none were, owing to lack of education and assuredly not from want of intelligence or capacity, daily losing more and more ground in the strenuous though peaceful contests of everyday life, and were becoming less and less able to compete successfully with their neighbours and fellow subjects in the struggle to obtain employment in the Civil Service of that Government to which they and their fathers have ever been devotedly attached. That this was their case was recognised by none more clearly than by the Chiefs of the Sikh States, and the true and deep interest which those Chiefs have always taken in the happiness and welfare, not only of the Sikhs of their own States, but also of the whole Sikh nation, was conclusively and splendidly proved when the proposal to found an educational institution for Sikhs was put forward in a practical form. This was in the year 1890, and thanks to the munificence of those Chiefs, to the sympathetic and active support of the then Viceroy, Lord Lansdowne, Sir James Lyall, the Lieutenant-Governor of this Province, Lord Roberts, the Commander-in-Chief, and many other European gentlemen and officials and to the enthusiasm and zeal in this behalf of a large number of leading Sikh nobles and sirdars, it was found possible to forthwith take in hand the building of the premises which Your Royal Highness now sees before you. The foundation stone of these buildings was laid by Sir James Lyall on the 5th of March 1892, and we rejoice to say that to-day the total number of boys on our rolls is 518, of whom 104 are boarders on the premises, a number which, large as it is, could be doubled without difficulty were it not that the accommodation is at present unfortunately very limited. The reason of this is that the main block of the buildings is not yet completed, a circumstance which we regret the more in view of this most auspicious occasion. It will ever be a matter of the deepest sorrow to us that it was not in our power to show Your Royal Highness anything more than the beginnings of what will be the most important and imposing part of the Khalsa College. We trust, however, that the day is not now far distant when the whole of the buildings of which this institution is to consist will be complete and ready for use, and for this happy result we owe our grateful thanks to the present Lieutenant-Governor at whose instance and by whose wish and advice a most successful conference in aid of the college and schools funds was held here in March 1904. On that notable occasion a magnificent and enthusiastic response to our appeal for funds was made by the Sikh Chiefs and Sirdars, and the Sikh community in general, with the result that the Managing Committee was enabled to undertake building operations without further delay. It but remains for us to crave leave to tender to Your Royal Highnesses our heartfelt and loyal thanks for the great honour which this visit here to-day has conferred not only upon the Khalsa College and School, but also upon the whole Sikh nation of which this institution claims to be representative, and to assure Your Royal Highnesses that the memory of this most auspicious occasion and of Your Royal Highnesses' condescension will ever live in the annals of the Khalsa College and Schools.

His Royal Highness replied as follows:—"The Princess of Wales joins with me in sincerely thanking the Khalsa College Council and Managing Committee for the kind sentiments to which their address gives expression. We are glad to have the opportunity to-day of visiting this College, which may indeed claim to be representative of the Sikhs supported as it is by all classes of that community. I appreciate highly the manly qualities of the Sikhs, their loyalty and devotion, and it affords me sincere pleasure to find that they have realized the importance of education in the present age and have taken steps to promote its spread among themselves. The future success of the movement depends on their steadfastly maintaining the effort they have initiated with the continuing interest of the venerable Raja of Nabha, who has done so much for the institution, and with all ranks co-operating success should be ensured; and I earnestly trust that the hopes expressed in your address for the completion of the buildings may speedily be fulfilled."

At the conclusion of the Prince's reply the members of the Managing Committee and the staff of the College were presented. Their Royal Highnesses inspected the plans and design of the institution as it will appear when the whole of the buildings are completed. The Head Master of the school next offered fervent prayers in which, after reciting the names of the ten gurus, he invoked blessings from the Almighty upon the King and Queen and Their Royal Highnesses. The invocation to the gurus and the close of the prayer were punctuated by loud toned responses by the gathering. As the Prince and Princess prepared to depart, the students gave forth the Sikh cry, "Sat Sri Akal," or "God is truth and is eternal," several times repeated with remarkable effect. Their Royal Highnesses returned to the station, where they lunched in the train.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The visit of Their Royal Highnesses to Jammu has been most successful, the arrangements being of the most complete and admirable character. The reception this morning was in its way as brilliant as many of the scenes which have preceded it, while the recent restitution of full administrative powers to His Highness the Maharaja gives the Royal visit an interest peculiarly its own. The gathering at the railway station this morning was a vivid vignette of chromatic effects in a setting of the brightest and most artistic decorations.

The Maharaja and his brother, Sir Amar Singh, the able Prime Minister and Commander-in-Chief of the State, wore military uniforms, His Highness wearing that of a British Major-General. An interesting figure was that of the young Mian Sahib, a bright looking boy, the son of Sir Amar Singh, who is the heir-presumptive to the gaddi. The members of the lately dissolved Council of Administration were present, and among others were Sir Bindon Blood and Major-General Kitchener. The Prince of Wales wore his naval uniform. Colonel Pears, the Resident, made the introductions, and the Prince, attended by Sir Amar Singh, inspected the guard-of-honour composed of the Imperial Service Troops, many of whom had medals for frontier service. The Kashmir Lancers, who formed the Royal escort, belong to the States Imperial Service Contingent. Imperial Service Troops line the roads, and the salutes announcing the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses at the station and at the Royal camp were fired by the Kashmir Imperial Service Mountain Artillery. Seven State elephants in most gorgeous trappings, their foreheads painted in rich decorative designs, formed the beginning of the line along which Their Royal Highnesses drove from the station.

After their arrival at Satwari House the usual ceremony of mizaj parsi, or visit by the State nobles to inquire after the health of the Royal visitors, was observed. The Prince received a ceremonial visit from the Maharaja at 11-30 in a durbar tent erected in the camp. The durbar tent was a shamiana which was made sixty years ago. It was built and decorated with the finest Kashmir stuffs which are now beyond price, the art of producing these special materials and designs having been lost. The two durbar thrones placed beneath a golden canopy upon a dais of cloth of gold were made of solid silver with massive gold lions as arm rests. The Maharaja arrived attended by Sir Amar Singh and the States Sirdars, and the customary ceremonial was observed. The Sirdars, who also hold active official position in the State, each tendered nazzars to the Prince, attar and pan being afterwards presented to the Maharaja and his nobles. The whole ceremony occupied scarcely half an hour, and immediately thereafter the Prince prepared to pay the return visit to His Highness at the Mandi Palace in Jammu, a distance of five miles from the Satwari Camp. The drive thither was one of the most delightful experiences of the Royal tour. The road passed through country thickly grown with vegetation until the city was reached. Passing by the white walled fort perched on a low hill thronged with humanity and over a bridge spanning the broad bed of the river, the town was entered by a triumphal arch flanked by the glistening gilded spires of richly sculptured temples.

The whole spire of one fane was covered with sheets of gold.

The buildings throughout the city were thronged with sight-seers, and mottoes expressive of the most profound loyalty and offering the most cordial welcome were prominent and numerous. A bright patch of colour was revealed by the boys of the Sri Ram High School massed together, and wearing turbans of varying tones of saffron and scarlet.

It was a very bright scene that presented itself when the Mandi Palace was reached. The Palace buildings form a great quadrangle of white and dull red with gardens and fountains in the centre of the courtyard. The durbar hall in which the Prince was received is lavishly decorated and is a splendid apartment. The two thrones for the Prince and the Maharaja were placed in front of an alcove, the arch of which is moulded with gold. The numerous doors to the hall are of silver covered with lacquer in gold and purple. Behind the throne is a full size portrait of the late Queen Victoria and portraits of the late Maharaja and of distinguished British officials who have been in the hall. The great charm of the palace, however, is the wonderful view of hill and valley which is revealed from the verandah behind the durbar hall. The Prince was received at the entrance by the Maharaja, who conducted him to the dais. His Royal Highness wore his Vice-Admiral's uniform, and the Maharaja, a short stout figure, wore a coat of lilac hued silk, heavily embroidered with Kashmir gold work, the garment being fringed with Kashmir squirrel fur. He also wore a large white turban and tight white trousers and displayed the insignia of a K.C.S.I. After a brief conversation between the Prince and His Highness, Colonel Pears presented Sir Amar Singh, who tendered his sword in homage to the Prince. The presentation of the other State dignitaries followed, each offering tribute which was touched and remitted. The young Mian Sahib was the third to be presented, and performed his ceremonial obeisance in a manner perfectly composed. His small figure and dignified demeanour were remarkably distinctive and his raiment contributed to distinguish him from the rest of the assembly.

The illumination of the Camp to-night has been in keeping with the lavish and effective display which His Highness the Maharaja has made in all the arrangements to indicate his great appreciation of the Royal visit. It has been a vision of fairyland that has been revealed in the softened splendour of myriads of delicately hued Japanese lamps utilised as the central feature of the illuminations. The roads and distant points have been transfigured by the soft cloudy glow of the small earthenware chirags holding the naked flame, and the arch of the main entrance to the Camp was a lovely piece of work in emerald, jewels of pale green lights, relieved only by the combination of green and white in the Prince's plumes and in the dates 1875—1905 which mark the two visits of the British heirs-apparent to this State.

The illuminations were in full glow when the guests proceeded to the State banquet held in the hall adjoining the durbat tent. There was a large and brilliant gathering, over hundred guests being present. The Princess was escorted in to dinner by Colonel Pears and the Prince took in Mrs. Pears. The Maharaja, Sir Amar Singh, and the young heir accompanied Their Royal Highnesses to the dining hall and after dinner they returned, the Maharaja taking a seat beside the Prince. His Highness proposed the health of the King-Emperor, and the toast was loyally and cordially honoured.

At the close of His Royal Highness's address the Prince and Princess and the other guests proceeded to the durbat tent where the Lamas from Ladakh performed a weird and symbolic devil dance.

The Lamas had been specially brought from a monastery at Leh, and were accompanied by a priest. There were about a dozen of them attired in loose vari-coloured robes and their heads covered by grotesque animal or devil masks. Two of them, brandishing swords the while, performed a slow dance, now swaying on one foot, then on the other, and slowly circling round to the weird droning of pipes and the clashing of cymbals by other members of the Tibetan party. The dance was a composition of hop, skip and individual waltz. In the dimly lighted tent, hung with the richest stuffs showing up sombrely in the halt lights, and before an assembly of modishly dressed European men and women fronting the thrones of gold and silver, the grotesque corybantes gave strange impressions.

As a salutatory exercise the dance was interesting only in its symbolism of combating animals and the rude elements of nature, but one performance was enough, and the Royal party went out to see the fireworks. These were very successful, showers of gold and jewels of flame producing the lovely effects.

There was a profusion of rockets and bombs which exploded in reverberating salvoes, and the beauty of the set pieces compelled frequent applause. During the display the Prince of Wales had the Maharaja's young nephew beside him for some time. The Prince, who will in the natural course of events one day become the ruler of Jammu and Kashmir, has excited interest, and give promise of being a worthy son of his capable father Sir Amar Singh, who for many years has been the Chief Minister of the State. Somebody to-day asked this boy of ten or eleven years, for whom destiny has much in store, why, with all his bright raiment of satin and silver, he was not wearing his pearls. The answer he gave may be a revelation of the future. "Pearls," he said, "do not make a Prince. A Prince is no less a Prince without them."

Sunday has been observed in the Royal camp with the customary quietude. At 8-30 this morning the Bishop of Lahore held Communion Service in the durbat tent. Their Royal Highnesses attended service at 11 conducted in the tent by Reverend C. H. Milney, the Bishop of Lahore preaching. This afternoon a distribution of alms to the poor of Jammu took place, food and sweets to the value of Rs. 5,000 being thus given by the desire of the Prince instead of the offering of fruit and sweetmeats to Their Royal Highnesses usually presented by the durbat on the occasion of a Royal visit. This custom of offering sweetmeats and fruit to Royalty is known as the zijaat ceremony. Service was again held in the durbat tent this evening, and after dinner the Royal party leave for Amritsar. There is general regret that time has not permitted a fuller view of the beauties of Kashmir than the glimpse of the hills and the distant snow-clad peak under whose shadow Jammu charmingly nestles.

At Amritsar to-morrow Their Royal Highnesses will receive a municipal address at the station, thereafter driving to the Khalsa College, and visiting the Golden Temple. In the afternoon they start for Delhi at 10 p.m.

Their Royal Highnesses will leave the Circuit House at 3-50 and drive through the Park to the Pili Kothi, whence they will follow the Strand Road, turning to the left before reaching the Fort and entering the Park by the Victoria Gate. Their Royal Highnesses will be received at the steps in front of the Memorial by the President and Members of the Executive Committee of the Queen Victoria Memorial Fund, and will be conducted by them to the dais. By His Royal Highness' command the President will read an address praying His Royal Highness to unveil the statue. His Royal Highness will then unveil the statue. The guards-of-honour will present arms, the bands will play the National Anthem, and a Royal salute of 31 guns will be fired from the Fort. His Royal Highness will then graciously reply to the address. Their Royal Highnesses will then proceed to view the Memorial, after which they will be conducted to their carriages by the President and Members of the Executive Committee. The Royal procession will return to the Circuit House by the same route.

Full dress will be worn for the unveiling ceremony.

There will be a small dinner party in the reception tents at 8 P.M., followed by a reception at 9.

Mess dress will be worn.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Numerous enquiries having reached us regarding the Lucknow programme during the Royal visit, the details may be repeated briefly. Their Royal Highnesses arrive publicly at 8-30 A.M. on 26th December, and will be presented with an address by the Municipality at the railway station, the draft of which was approved at the last meeting of the Board. The Prince and Princess will then drive along Station Road, Abbott Road and the Mall, with a full Royal Military escort, to Government House. It may here be noted that the authorities hope that the decorations along this route and others to be traversed by the Royal party will do credit to Lucknow. The Prince will subsequently receive visits from the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri. The laying of the foundation stone of the Medical College at Shahmina takes place in the afternoon, and the Prince and Princess will thereafter pay a visit to the Residency, where the Mutiny veterans will be present. In the evening Their Royal Highnesses will attend the entertainment and illuminations to be given by the Talukdars in the Kaiser Bagh. On the morning of the 27th Their Royal Highnesses will receive visitors, and the Prince will return the visit of the Nawab of Rampur. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess will attend a garden party given by the European residents of Lucknow in their honour at Husainabad. In the evening a State dinner takes place at the Chattr Manzil followed by a reception. On the morning of the 28th Their Royal Highnesses will drive round cantonments, and will leave the same evening for Calcutta, the departure being private.

The principal function of the Royal visit to Lucknow will be the laying of the foundation stone of the Medical College, towards which the people of the United Provinces have subscribed so liberally. The Prince has performed only one other ceremony similar to this during the Royal tour, and that was the laying of the foundation stone of the Bombay Museum. The funds for the Bombay Museum were contributed partly by the Government and partly by the public, whereas the movement to commemorate the Royal visit to the United Provinces was one which originated with the leaders of Indian public opinion in these provinces, and its success has been due to the hearty co-operation of the public. There will, it is true, be one other ceremony of a similar character later on in Calcutta—the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial, but this is a Memorial raised by the whole people of India rather than of any one particular province, and while it is fitting that the ceremony should be performed by the Prince, it is not a memorial of the present Royal visit, but in memory of the Prince's illustrious grandmother. Practically, therefore, Bombay and Lucknow stand alone among the provincial capitals of India in having provided worthy and abiding memorials of the Royal visit. The funds for the Medical College are growing daily, and the interest in the movement has spread to all classes of the community. Not the least remarkable of the recent contributions have been those from the leaders of the Shia and Sunni sects in Lucknow, who have expressed their loyalty in a manner worthy of the highest praise. The Central Committee have chosen Mr. S. Johnson, in the absence of the Hon'ble Mr. A. McRobert from India, to represent the European community of Cawnpore on the Reception Committee. At the meeting of the Central Committee in Lucknow last week, Mr. Johnson said that Cawnpore had not at that time identified itself with the Medical College scheme, but he thought, as soon as the public were aware of its objects, a substantial sum might be expected.

Morning Post.—The nearest road to Indore, which branches at Khandwa from the main line, has gradients steeper than the Royal train could face, so we crept northward up the coast by Surat and Baroda, then turned due east into the Central India Agency and again almost due south to Indore. There is nothing to lure any one to Indore, and we were there only because scarcity of water upset the previous arrangements for meeting the Central India Chiefs. About it are sandy tracts like the plains of Northern Germany, covered with rough grass, scantily wooded with pipal, babul, and mimosa, scarred by occasional parched water courses, like the bleached bones of a river, and with here and there the steep abruptness of a hill, which seems to have thrust its head violently through level country. Out of this aridness the little station leapt, a sudden rainbow blaze of colour. On the open platform, with red carpet in front of them, all the glory of Central India was seated like a bed of monstrous zinnias flaming in the sun the glare of their purples and reds and greens actually tempered by the silver and gold which overlaid them.

The Begum of Bhopal was there, the only Muhammadan woman in the world who rules in the strictest purdah, a very small figure, her head shrouded in a lilac and silver embroidered burka reaching nearly to the knees with two dark slits where eyes should have been showing, and a fantastic crown perched on top of all. Beside her was the young Maharaja Holkar, the ruler of Indore, with half a dozen Maharajas more, and double as many Rajas, Raos, and Nawabs, against the scarlet tunics of British officers, like peacocks and flamingoes mixed.

They had in all their splendour, partly perhaps because of it, a certain wasted air, set down there on the flat bare station with Royalty still fifty miles away.

In the dusty space beside the track their retainers sported. Footmen, all in crude gamboge, and ochre, and carmine, looking as if they had been dipped bodily in a pot of dye, carrying big-mouthed blunderbusses, long-stocked jezails, pikes, and halberds; and horsemen, in moss green and silver and mauve, in buff, gold, and crimson, in bronze and purple, in rose and white, with inlaid iron helmets and armour bristling on their chargers' foreheads and clinging to their flanks, the long penons of their lances fluttering, many hued, above them like a torn field of flowers.

Camp life in India is more completely organised than anywhere in the world. Ten days before we come to Indore the ground outside the Residency compound was a sandy waste covered with rough, tangled grass and a few trees. When we arrived there was a town of close upon a hundred tents, from the big mess marquee, with comfortable drawing-room, ante-room, and smoking-room about it, to the shouldari of the hospital assistants; all pitched beside wide, grey-shingled roads, lit with dazzling Kitson lamps, while before each tent was a little garden, edged with dog-toothed bricks, where the ground had been cleared and grass sown, and already, in exchange for unstinted water, an emerald film had formed over the light earth; such magic, given water only, can the sun and the soil work here between them; while, just within the brick work, planted ferns made the white town look rather like a permanent cantonment than the resting place of a caravanserai which came yesterday and will be gone to-morrow. Yet those responsible for this luxurious air of permanence express regrets that the season of the year prevented so much else being done. November comes between the last flowers that belong here and those that are brought from home to play their excited masque of its being England during the cold weather. There remain still the pale yellow flowers of the tree mallow, the feathery hibiscus, oleanders, scarlet poinsettias, dusty mimosa, and wreaths of the pale magenta bougainvillea. But except for the last they make no great show of colour; it is a land of autumn, of things over and gone. But into it the English flowers are feverishly coming, straining up their thin green heads as though they could never grow fast enough; and the roses, whose anxiety to bloom the whole year through it is so hard to hinder, are just opening their retarded buds.

At Indore the first darbar of the tour was held. A tent draped in red, pale blue, and gold had been pitched on the parade ground behind the Residency, a square heavy building which still shows the scars of Mutiny bullets, and thither all the ruling Princes and their suites gathered for presentation to the Prince of Wales. Their queer barbaric splendours mixed with modernity—armoured horses following a Twentieth Century barouche—made their arrival worth watching, the Lancers of their escorts galloping up in clouds of dust, out of which the strong hot colours of their trappings grew as the dust subsided. At one end of the tent was a platform carrying the crimson and silver chairs which were used for the King's visit 30 years ago, and of which every curve proclaims the taste of the Sixties. They probably look thereby additionally delectable to the native eye, whose taste is for the worst that Europe can offer it. From the centre of the platform a broad carpeted passage led to the entrance, and on each side of this, row above row, the resplendent Chiefs and their retinue were seated, in order of precedence, which was also the order of arrival, attention to such details being essential in order that each should get his proper complement of guns, which kept up an almost deafening uproar till the proceedings began.

The ceremonial of a darbar is simple and rather dull: at least it would be dull in European dresses. There is such an intolerable amount of doing the same thing; such a profusion of bowing and backing and coming forward again, all in a decorous and unstimulating silence. But in India a nothing can be dull that is done in its best clothes. The mere humble wonder with which one watches the gorgeousness of Maharajas would rescue any function from monotony. To the splendours of native uniforms one can grow accustomed, since they are controlled, or are said to be, by regulation. But there is no restriction to the splendour of a Native Chief. He has no court nor darbar costume, he is unhampered by precedent, by his own station, or by that of the man for whom he is arrayed. He has to consult only his revelry in colour, which, fortunately, is still unaffected by the modernising of his taste. So he uses his person as a canvas and his wardrobe as a palette, and many of the things he wears are obviously rather parts of a colour scheme than of a costume. Then when he has reached a pitch of lustrous intensity which stirs your despairing envy and admiration, he takes a shawl of scarlet, violet, gold, and green, or of any other combination that takes his fancy, and wraps it about him from his waist to his knees. And the mystery is that he looks the better for it, even though his waist seldom inclines to slimness and his carriage is no more impressive than that of any other portly gentleman. At the Darbar, which interposed many impediments even in the way of grace, one realised that it was his colour that saved him. He was led from his seat up the central aisle between his political sponsor and an aide-de-camp who bowed when they rose, bowed when they announced his name, bowed when they presented him, and bowed as many times after before they returned him to his chair. He carried in his hand his nazar, or tributary gift, which generally takes the form of a gold mohar wrapped in a handkerchief, and the presentation of which signifies that all his revenues are at his Suzerain's disposal. He held it out, the Prince extended a hand to touch it, the proffered revenue being thus remitted, and then he retired backward the length of the aisle, an operation the evident difficulties of which won him all one's condolence. Thus all the assembled Chiefs were presented, from the little burka-covered Begum, who seemed as self-possessed as any, but who made no offering of nazar, to the least Raja of them all.

Then the Prince made a short, well-worded speech, which Major Daly—whose father's name is so bound up with the history of the Central India Horse—translated. After this the Chiefs advanced again in turn, with the same deliberate formalities, for the ceremony of attar and pan, which corresponds to the traditional offering of bread and salt, the Prince sprinkling the one upon their extended hands from a silver vinaigrette and handing them the other—which is betel nut, chunam, and other spices wrapped in a green leaf—from a silver bowl. After the last of the nineteen headmen had received his portion and retired, the Political Officers, moving down the gay ranks of their retainers, completed the distribution.

The Prince stepped down from the platform, the waving of the chowries of white yak's tails behind the Royal chair ceased, the gilded fans were raised by the scarlet-coated chobdars, the blazing golden sunshade followed, the Royal procession re-formed, and the Darbar was over.

Times.—The Prince and Princess of Wales had a typical Sikh reception to-day at the Khalsa College here. Hymns of welcome were sung and prayers were offered on behalf of the King-Emperor, Their Royal Highnesses, and the British Raj, all the Sikhs present joining in the responses. The Royal party left the college amid an enthusiastic demonstration.

Even in this land of picturesque and romantic cities, Amritsar, the sacred city of the Sikhs, takes a very high place. There are few more beautiful spots in India—provided one turns his back upon the brummagem Jubilee Clock Tower, a monument of British bad taste, which desecrates it—than the "Pool of Immortality." Rising on a white marble platform in the middle of a small lake, at the end of a white marble causeway flanked with golden lamps, the Golden Temple, the shrine sacred to the Sikh Scripture, seems to float on the water which reflects every line of its marble base, and fretted walls sheathed in gilded copper and graceful cupolas overlaid with burnished sheets of the same metal. All round the lake stately buildings of marble and sandstone rise from the water's edge—the bungahs, half hostels, half shrines, of the great Sikh chiefs and their retainers who come to worship here, reminding one, as to their conception and purpose, of the ancient auberges maintained at Malta for the use of the different "provinces" of the Knights of St. John. Nor is this the only point of resemblance between the Sikh "brotherhood" and the old militant orders of mediæval Christendom.

Amritsar makes another and stronger claim than that of mere picturesque interest upon the Heir-Apparent to the British Crown. It is the sacred city of a people who, alone among the peoples of India, have come to look upon British rule as the fulfilment of prophecy foreshadowed more than two centuries ago by one of their inspired leaders.

The Sikh brotherhood, which ultimately developed into one of the most powerful fighting organizations in India, had its origin in a movement of purely religious reform, quietistic rather than militant. Just about the time when Luther was raising the standard of revolt in Europe a holy man known as Baba Nanak, the fit guru, or spiritual teacher, of the Sikhs or disciples, began to preach in the Punjab denouncing the idolatrous superstitions of Hindu priestcraft, the greed and bigotry of the Brahmins, and the fictitious restrictions of caste. The seclusion of women, female infanticide, and the living cremation of widows were as abhorrent to Nanak as the mendicancy and asceticism of the sanyasis. There are passages in the Sikh scriptures which recall not only the spirit, but almost the words, of Christ's own teachings:—"Worship the Lord, take pity on all living things, subdue thy pride. Know God thyself, and cause others to know him. Thus shalt thou become a partner in Heaven." "Impurity of the heart is greed, impurity of the tongue is falsehood, impurity of the eyes is lustfulness, impurity of the ears is listening to slander. Pure are those who know God." "The custom of the world is to return good only for good, but the holy man returneth good for evil."

Gradually, however, as the Sikh brotherhood grew in numbers and influence it aroused the jealousy and suspicion of the worldly Powers, and itself learnt in turn that self-preservation required force to be opposed by force. Especially, under the fanatical rule of the Emperor Aurangzeb, the hand of the Moguls was heavy upon the Sikhs, but they had sworn loyalty to his great forebear Akbar, and to release them from the obligations of that oath the sacrifice of a life was necessary. According to Sikh tradition, it was his own fondly-loved son Govind, a child of tender years, who pointed to his father Guru Tek Bahadur, the ninth in succession to Nanak, the thorny path of duty. Guru Tek Bahadur delivered himself up to Aurangzeb at Delhi, where bribes and torture were equally vainly employed to induce him to accept Islam. One day he was brought up before his persecutor on the frivolous charge of having turned his eyes up to the latticed windows of the Imperial zennana. It was then that the Guru replied in prophetic words:—"My eyes gazed not, O Emperor, upon thy private apartments or upon thy queens, but far beyond them into the West upon the fair-haired hosts who shall come from beyond the seas to tear down thy purdahs, and destroy thy palaces."

Many decades were to pass, and the Sikh Confederacy, after establishing its own power at Lahore on the ruins of the Mogul Empire, was to be shattered in turn by British arms on more than one stricken field before they interpreted the meaning of Tek Bahadur's prophecy. Now, however, it has become almost part of their creed, and one of the most striking incidents at the Delhi Durbar of 1903 was the solemn gathering of the Sikh chiefs at the shrine which commemorates Tek Bahadur's martyrdom, where on the anniversary of his death they renewed in each other's presence their vows of fealty to the King-Emperor beyond the Western seas. Upon none is the sanctity of such vows more binding than upon the Sikh, for loyalty, or, as it is termed in India, fidelity to one's salt, is a virtue specially and constantly inculcated upon them by their religious teachers. "Let him who eateth another man's salt become his slave, grind, and draw water for him." "Whoever eateth another man's salt, let him be cut to pieces on the battlefield in his service." "The sinner who is untrue to his salt ruineth his life and dieth an evil death."

The Sikhs of the present day have unquestionably lost much of their religious fervour; many of them have relapsed more or less into the practice of Hinduism, and but very few are familiar with their own Scriptures, written for the most part in an archaic tongue known only to their pundits. But their martial qualities and their spirit of loyalty still endure, and this small people of barely two or three millions continues to contribute a large and valuable quota to our Indian Army, with whose records it has splendidly identified itself on every battlefield for more than half a century, and not least during the fiery ordeal of the great Mutiny.

In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses drove through the city to the Golden Temple, and were acclaimed by the largest crowds seen since they left Bombay. They were greeted at the Temple approaches by Sikh akalis blowing brazen horns, and immense concourses of people again gave them a great welcome. The Prince and Princess viewed the Temple from a platform overlooking the pool. The interior of the building was seen crowded with devotees, the whole sight being most impressive.

13TH DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Their Royal Highnesses came to Amritsar because it is the quondam capital of the Sikhs and still the home of the militant religion which made the Sikhs the staunchest fighting men as well as the finest peasantry in the East. It is one of the many complexities induced by the long Pax Britannica that there is in the new system no quite adequate place for the purely fighting races, who are the salt of India. Freed from the pressure of the Moghals and content with British rule, the Sikh was falling back from the purely martial faith of the last of the Gurus, and like all reforming sects in this country was in danger of being engulfed in the all-absorbing mass of Hinduism. Entirely given to soldiering and agriculture, he was being elbowed aside in these days when the race is rather to the nimble-witted than to the strong and brave and loyal. But India cannot afford to lose the Sikh. He is hard, dour—qualities which are not perhaps attractive in a superficial age. But he lends to India some of those stiffening qualities which the Covenanters and the Puritans wrought into the fibre of the British people. He is a giant in battle, tenacious as a bull-dog. He is loyal and staunch to the core and a grand peasant. The main purpose of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to Amritsar, then, was to visit the centre of the faith which made the Sikh the first-class fighting man he is and the institution where that faith is being kept alive.

To the superficial gaze there was not much to attract in the first of these ceremonies, the visit to the Khalsa College. The College buildings are modest, though not ungraceful, and not half-completed. The scene which met Their Royal Highnesses as they sat in the state chairs on the dais in the shamiana was just this. On their right hand and on their left were the Chiefs of Patiala, Jhind, Nabha and Kapurthala. A little further off the representatives of all the Sikh regiments and the feudal retainers of the Chiefs. In front five hundred boys and youths, the boys in yellow and the latter in white. Yet for those who had eyes to see this unpretentious gathering was more pregnant with meaning, more full of importance to India than the most pompous Darbars. For these Chiefs represented the fighting houses of the Punjab who were staunch to the Raj in the hour of its greatest trial and whose Imperial Service Troops passed before the Prince in faultless array at Lahore. Those sturdy bemedalled warriors represented the grand Sikh regiments which have conferred imperishable renown upon the Indian Army. And those youths represented the rising generation who by special instructions, more particularly in the principles of their faith, it is hoped to fit to bear their part in the governance of their country and to be worthy of their martial ancestry.

An excellent beginning has been made. On its two sides the Khalsa College has five hundred students, and, when the buildings now in course of construction are completed, the number will be doubled. The Sikh Chiefs have been closely interested in the work and fully recognise its importance. And the quiet little ceremony was imbued with this distinctive Sikh flavour. On entering Their Royal Highnesses were received with the Sikh salutation the "Khalsa is from God, and all victory comes from him." Then shrill-voiced boys sang a hymn of welcome, taking up the music first on one horn of the crescent, then on the other.

The Royal visit to the Khalsa College was for the elect. The afternoon drive to the Golden Temple of Amritsar was the people's festival. And not since they left Bombay have Their Royal Highnesses seen so many happy faces crowded into a narrow space. The native town of Amritsar, with its high and balconied houses, its straight streets and flat roofs, has a character of its own. It was so packed that the wonder was how the balconies stood the strain or if another person could have been wedged into that dense throng by the wayside. But even these attractive features were dominated by the happiness transparent in the faces of the people. It was not that they were boisterously demonstrative, but that a cheerful hum rippled up and down the throng, the shrill laugh was always heard, and a word or gesture from the police was enough to restrain the most unruly. This joy in the presence of the Prince and Princess broke out in some strange ways. The paintings on the triumphal arches were quaint beyond words; the figures which were jerked into a salute as the notabilities passed, most amusing; but the continuous hangings of embroidered cloths amends for all.

Who is not familiar with the Golden Temple of Amritsar and its environments. The great tank or pool of immortality surrounded by the marble pavement; the miniature temple in the centre of the pool, half of gilded copper, half of inlaid marble, which protects the holy Granth or sacred scripture of the Sikhs; the arched causeway which connects the shrine with the great gateway, with its memorial of the work of the thirty-fifth Sikh regiment in the Chitral expedition; the red clock-tower which looks down on all from a lofty platform, a tower not unworthy in itself but as out of harmony with its atmosphere as would be a sacred bull in Piccadilly. But to-day the tower gazed on the town side upon a crescent of white houses swarming with bright faces: on the other, on to a temple crowded with Sikh priests in white, on a causeway thronged with people, and on a pavement crowded with pilgrims from all parts of India. And on the platform itself were akalis, or the old religious ascetics, with their conical quoit-ringed turbans, nakas with their conch-like horns wagging after the fashion of E. T. Read's "Prehistoric beasts," and a great gathering of leading Sikhs. Their Royal Highnesses were deeply interested spectators and spent some time admiring the chief points of the scene.

Driving from the Golden Temple Their Royal Highnesses had tea with Mrs. Younghusband, the wife of the Commissioner of Lahore, and returned to the train which has been their head-quarters during the day. They leave to-night for Delhi.

Daily Chronicle.—At Delhi the Prince and Princess are surrounded by the evidences of great historical events; for modern Delhi stands on the site previously occupied by six great capitals, whose ruins strew the country for twenty miles around, and whose rise and fall occupy a great place in the history of the world. During the chequered course of its history Delhi has been sacked by the Moguls under Timur, the Persians under Nadir Shah, and the Afghans under Ahmed Shah; while its capture during the Mutiny of 1857 forms only the latest page in its long history. In addition to all these memories it contains the finest collection of historical buildings of any city in India with the exception of Agra.

On arriving here to-day the Royal party drove under the shadow of the Jumma Masjid, the great Muhammadan mosque, to the Chandni Chowk or Silver Street of Delhi, which is said to have run with blood no fewer than seven times in the course of its history, but which was filled to-day with the largest many-murmuring throng that has been seen there since the Delhi Durbar of three years ago. Nowhere have the Prince and Princess been received with greater marks of enthusiastic loyalty than in this city, which formed the nucleus and rallying-point of the great Mutiny, and which is full of the graves of martyred Englishmen. After the municipal address of welcome the Prince drove up the Chandni Chowk, through the Mori Gate, to the Flagstaff Tower on the Ridge, which was held by the British army before Delhi in 1857, and thence to the Circuit House, where the Prince is staying during his visit here.

In the afternoon the Prince drove up the Chandni Chowk and visited the palace with its two famous halls, the Diwan-i-Am and Diwan-i-Khas, the latter of which claims to be "a paradise upon earth," and once held the famous Peacock Throne of the Moguls. Thence he went to the Jumma Masjid, the largest mosque in India, whose main gateway is only opened for the representative of the King, as previously only for the Mogul Emperor.

To-morrow the Prince will drive along the Ridge and visit the historic scenes of the Mutiny. On Thursday he will drive in a motor car to Humayun's tomb, down the steps of which one Emperor fell and broke his neck, and where the last of the Mogul Emperors surrendered to Major Hodson in 1857; thence to the Kutab Minar, a great monument some eleven miles from Delhi; and will return by Sardar Jang's tomb, another of the architectural wonders in the environs of the city. In order that the Prince may better appreciate these historical monuments, his visits will be private.

We have now traversed the Punjab from Lahore north to Peshawar, and from Peshawar back again through Lahore and Amritsar to Delhi, the southernmost city in the province. The transition from Amritsar to Delhi has brought vividly to our minds the change wrought by the Pax Britannica; for Amritsar is the centre of Sikhism, which strove successfully against the Mogul power, while Delhi is the capital of the mighty State which failed to beat down the Sikh Confederacy; and yet the Royal party received just as warm a welcome in one city as in the other. We leave here on Friday, and arrive at Agra on Saturday.

Daily Mail.—"Hue!" The mahout dug the iron into the thick hide, and the elephant moved through the sandy scrub. Ranji was cross, for he had not broken his fast, and that was already twelve hours old. "Hue!" Four pillars of legs shuffled along, and the howdah swung like a temple in an earthquake. I was on my way to Cheetor—the cradle of the Rajputs, the citadel of siege and sacrifice, the home of the Helen of Hindus. It was not in the Royal itinerary, but the shadow of its ramparts fell across our path and drew me on with strange enchantment.

Across the desert, over the dry river bed, through the hive that clings to the slope of the hill, is the rock of Cheetor, an island in the sandy sea, a mountain solitary on the plain. Girt by stone rampart—loop-holed and pierced with massive gates—a knightly belt about palace and temple and tower, bathed with the blood of the bravest, wet with the tears of the fairest of the Rajputs. This is Cheetor. When Alla-u-din, fired by report of the charms of Pudmani, turned aside from the Deccan and laid siege to Cheetor, he bartered victory for a glimpse of the fair Helen. Bheemsi, her husband, escorting the infatuated warrior to the foot of the hill, was ambushed and carried a prisoner to the Tartar camp. Here begins the history of the Hindu City of Troy. Pudmani was to be the price of her husband's life and the safety of the citadel. Seven hundred litters were to bear her and her maidens to the arms of the ravisher. These were the wooden horses of Troy, for out of them issued, not hand-maidens and the lovely Pudmani, but a chosen band of heroes sworn to die for the honour of their queen and the citadel.

Years sped, and to the lust of Alla-u-din was added vengeance. Again the Tartar host filled the plain at the foot of Cheetor and the Rana, sore pressed, had a vision. To his troubled couch came a goddess demanding Royal victims. "Unless twelve who wear the diadem bleed for Cheetor, the land must pass from the line!" Now, the ruler of Cheetor had twelve sons, and he loved the second more than all his children. Each claimed the right of years to die first, but at his father's entreaty this Joseph was spared to the last. For three days each reigned a crowned king and then sallied forth to die.

Throw open the sally port to the men who have donned the saffron robe of death or victory! Down the ramp they pour like a torrent, and carve a path through the barbarians. One by one the throne and the tomb claim their victim. The crimson pillar of stone by the gate marks the spot where a king spread a carpet of slain and slept the sleep that knows not waking. Eleven sons had fallen, and the favourite made ready to ascend the throne and to gird on his armour. But the love of a father finds a way. Jacob insists on taking the place of his Joseph, and the anger of the goddess is appeased. Open the gate once more for the Rana, but first let all that is sacred and loved be made safe from the hand of the spoiler. Where are the daughters and wives and mothers of the Rajputs. Let them to the cavern beneath the palace where funeral pyres await them. Seven thousand of them enter and the last is the fair Pudmani, whose hand closed the tomb and lighted the torch that saved the women of Cheetor from the lust of the slayer.

We enter the city of desolation along a path strewn with ruin, and come to the grim bones of a palace all ghostly and silent. "This," says the mahout from the neck of the elephant, "is the palace of Pudmani, and that is the door of the cavern." Superstition guards the entrance with a serpent whose venomous breath extinguishes the lamp of the mortal who would cross the threshold of the place of sacrifice. Foiled in his lust, Alla-u-din gave the citadel to rapine and ruin, for not a living thing remained on whom to wreak vengeance. The palace of Pudmani and the tower of fame alone escaped the fury of his barbarians. But the promise of the vision was fulfilled. Half a century later Cheetor was retaken by the Rajput, who raised the tower of victory, and was slain by one of his house whom history knows as "The Murderer." Two centuries went by, and the citadel on the hill was again the quest of the conqueror, Bahadur Shah, against whom the queen mother led the last rally. Once more the women of the Rajputs chose death before dishonour, and the explosion of the magazine tore them from the grip of the ravisher. Recovered a fortnight afterward, the citadel was besieged by Akbar, founder of the empire of the Moguls. The Rana of those days—Udai Sing—was a man of no great courage, and the defence of his capital devolved on his chieftains. Saloombra, the brave, died at the gate of the sun, and was succeeded by Putta of Kailva, a boy of sixteen, whose Spartan mother robbed him in saffron and armed his young bride with a lance. Together they descended the rock, and died facing the foes of their race. Jaimul of Bednore went on with the fight till famine had weakened the garrison and a ball had wounded his leg. Scorning to die in his bed, he was borne on the shoulders of a clansman to the foot of the hill, and fell leading 8,000 Rajputs who had vowed themselves to death. A third time the women sacrificed themselves—nine queens and five princesses showing the way to their sisters. The gods had deserted Cheetor and the rock of the Rajputs was riven asunder.

Akbar spared the monuments and erected a shrine to the gallant Putta and Jaimul, but the glory of Cheetor had departed, and though recovered soon afterward it ceased for all time to be the capital of the Rajputs. Ruin reigns where the fair Pudmani held court, where Miran Bai—the Mirian of the Rajputs—sang and the priests bowed before the images of their gods. Wall and bastion echo no more with the clamour of battle, and no light shines from the window of the palace. It is a city of the dead—a wilderness of stones and jungle haunted by ghosts of the past—gaunt walls, shattered tower, the maimed remnants of human habitation. "Hue!" The elephant grows impatient. Night is at hand, and over the plain stretching out like the sea hangs a veil of crimson that descends on the ramparts. In the glowing twilight rise the towers on which are recorded the fame and the victories of the race of warriors who stemmed the torrent of Mussulman invasion and gave to the world an epic. Slowly and reluctantly we retrace our steps, and pass once more the palace of Pudmani. Is that her shadow at the window beckoning us to the black cavern below whence rises the smoke of her sacrifice? We must hasten, for this city of shades is thronged with mysteries that multiply in the twilight. "Hue!" The elephant gropes his way through the darkness, and from the plain we take a last look at silent walls and shattered towers that saved India from the Moslem and wrote in letters of blood the heroism of the Rajputs and the devotion of their women.

Indian Daily News.—We have been requested by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab to state that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been pleased, as a memento of his visit to the Golden Temple at Amritsar, to give a present of Rs. 1,500 to the Temple authorities.

Indian Daily News.—This afternoon the Prince and Princess viewed Amritsar and its glory, the Golden Temple. They drove on at three o'clock, passing through the bazar, the roads and buildings being thronged with immense numbers of people. That Amritsar was the centre of the carpet manufacture and production of rich fabrics was amply indicated by the opulent display of costly materials in the decoration of the route. The crowds were the largest that have been seen since the earliest start of the Royal tour, and were full of bright colours. Masses of school children with vivid head dresses and waving bright flags and groups of musicians mingled with the crowd, which was unusually animated. Before viewing the temple, Their Royal Highnesses visited a carpet factory. The interest that the Princess has evinced in the art crafts of the country should increase the stimulus which has been recently given to Indian industrial arts. Their Royal Highnesses reached the point whence the Golden Temple was seen a little after four o'clock. The spot was the clock tower terrace, overlooking the lake, in the centre of which the temple stands. It was a marvellous picture that was here revealed. The bazar buildings behind the Tower were packed with masses of picturesque humanity, and the buildings adjacent to the temple were thronged with people. Below the terrace, on the tessellated marble fringe of the lake, were large crowds waiting to see the face of Royalty. On the terrace itself the scene was one of never failing and extraordinary interest. The clock tower, its arches adorned with marigolds, was the centre of a decorative scheme of green and purple velvet, carpets and scarlet cloths with splendid hangings in richest colour silks and gold. The gathering here included a number of Akalis or religious fanatics, followers of the tenth Guru. They were towering and extraordinary head-dresses circled by numbers of bright steel quoits and coated with marigolds. Some of them had belts bristling with knives; other Akalis had smaller and plainer turbans of dark blue, undecorated, but even these wore garlands. Another set of interesting personalities were twelve Udasi Sadhus—followers of the Guru Nanak—who were equipped with large antique swords of serpentine shape.

When the Prince and Princess arrived, they were received by Sir Charles Rivaz and the Maharajas of Patiala, Jhind, and Kapurthala and a number of Temple attendants. The trumpeters blew a fanfare, and the horns of the Udasi Sadhus emitted weird sounds, while the crowd were moved to great animation. After seeing the Akalis, the Prince and Princess were conducted to the front of the terrace, where golden chairs were placed under a canopy, and whence they obtained a full view of the temple. The day was dull and overcast, and the old gold of the temple, where worship ceases only for a few hours in the twenty-four, was less effective than when lighted up by the sun. The appearance of Their Royal Highnesses at the end of the terrace aroused the liveliest interest among the numbers of people on the marble pavement below. After a while the attendants of the temple presented trays containing Sikh emblems to the Prince and Princess. In each case were included two miniature books representing the sacred writings of the Sikhs, a silk cloth, a handkerchief, a garland of arrows, large and small quoits, iron bracelet and miniature single and double edged swords. These emblems are used in the ceremony of initiation into the Sikh community. In former times they were always presented to the ruler of the Sikhs when he visited the Golden Temple. In this sense they were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, who shortly afterwards left the terrace, the Akalis and Sadhus cheering and sounding their horns, while the fanfare of trumpets was repeated. The Prince and Princess drove to Ram Bagh, which was privately rented, and thereafter returned to their train. They leave to-night for Delhi.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Delhi this morning. They were received at the station by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, the General Officer Commanding the Seventh Division, the Commissioner of Delhi, and the Chiefs of Sirmur, Khalsia, Pataudi, Loharu and Dujann, and a number of European officers and Delhi residents. From the station they drove by the Queen's Road, Lothian Road and Chandni Chowk to the Town Hall, where an address was presented by the Municipal Committee. Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses drove to the Circuit House, where they stay while in Delhi.

The ceremony of presenting the municipal address this morning was witnessed by an immense gathering of people, the throng crowding the roads in front of the Town Hall and stretching away along the route of the Royal procession in dense masses. Facing the bronze statue of the late Queen-Empress, erected as a gift to Delhi from the late James Skinner, in front of the Town Hall was constructed a dais covered by a large and effectively designed canopy in cream and gold and hung with curtains of silk in delicate pale green tints. Burnished cuirasses, brass helmets, circular shields and spears were arranged on the supporting pillars and gave a strikingly finished effect to the decoration. Their Royal Highnesses were received by the President, Mr. R. Humphreys, and members of the Municipality ranged on the dais, and took their seats on silver chairs. The address was read by Sri Krishan Dass, Senior Vice-President of the Municipality. The address recalled the fact that twenty-eight years ago the assumption of the Imperial title by the Throne was proclaimed from Delhi to all India, and that three years ago the succession and coronation of his present Gracious Majesty was also proclaimed to all India from this spot. The address added that apart from its historic and imperial interest, Delhi has of recent years made rapid commercial development. Mills and factories have sprung up, and whereas in 1876 when His Majesty visited Delhi, only three lines of railway entered the city, now no less than seven converge upon it, to which will be shortly added an eighth, when a most important and most direct line from Bombay, now under construction, is completed. Delhi City has all the advantages which peace, civilization and railway enterprise, making it a most important centre, can bring about, and for these advantages and blessings its citizens rendered true gratitude to His Majesty the King-Emperor and his benign rule. The address, beautifully illuminated, was enclosed in an ivory casket of exquisite Delhi workmanship.

The Prince in reply said:—"Gentlemen,—Both the Princess of Wales and I have been looking forward with much pleasure to seeing your historic city, and we thank you heartily for the reception which you have given us and for the kind words of welcome which you have used in your address. The beautiful city which is in your keeping has been the scene of many stirring incidents and splendid pageants. She seems to have the power inherent in some great capitals of attracting and compelling attention, and to the Princess and myself this visit will be rich in reflections on the past and in thoughts of the future. That the proud position of Delhi is still unshaken is proved by the very material and important fact of the many railways which now run to her walls. They do not come to your city for any other reasons than those of trade, and it seems to me that you are as fortunate in your great commercial future as you have been in your distinguished political past. I shall gladly inform the King-Emperor of your gratitude for the advantages of peace, civilization and railway enterprise, and I have no doubt that you will make the best of these undoubted advantages. It is in the power of you and your successors to maintain that position which Delhi has always held in this great Indian Empire."

Thereafter, the members of the Municipality were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, and the ceremony was at an end. As the Prince and Princess entered the Royal carriage a fanfare was sounded, and cheers were raised.

The visits of Their Royal Highnesses to the Fort and Juma Masjid this afternoon were of a private character, but the route was lined by large numbers of people. The Fort was first visited, the Royal party spending a considerable time viewing Dewan-i-Am and Dewan-i-Khas. It was 4.30 when they reached the great masjid built by Shah Jehan and saved from destruction by the artillery during the Mutiny by Baird Smith. The road in front of the main entrance of this high cathedral of Islam in India where the historic State procession of three years ago passed along in wondrous splendour was now lined by masses of school children wearing the brightest of head gear. Their ranks were backed by the banks of colour of the picturesque holiday multitude; a scarlet carpet and delicate festoon of greenery and marigold marked the Royal path in the ascent of the great steps to the main entrance to the masjid. At the top of the steps Their Royal Highnesses were received by the trustees and the Mullahs of the mosque and conducted within the historic fane. Besides the beauties of the building itself they were shown the relics which are preserved in the Masjid. These included Arabic writings said to be copies of the Koran or portions thereof in the printing of Ali, the Prophet's appointed successor, and of Hussain, a hair of the Prophet's ruddy beard, a desiccated slipper, and a stone slab with the impress of a large foot imprinted at least a quarter of an inch deep. The holy man in charge of these sacred remains solemnly informs the misbelieving visitor that the imprint of Mahomed's foot was miraculously sculptured upon the hard stone on which he had walked. The visitor is further told that the relics were brought from Medina and Mecca and passed to the Emperor Jehangir and afterwards to Shah Jehan, who built the mosque in which they are now preserved. Their Royal Highnesses stayed in the masjid for about half an hour, and then returned to the circuit-house by way of the Chandni Chowk, which was thronged with people and brightly decorated. The school children were given sweetmeats, brass platters and handkerchiefs, commemorative of the occasion.

Although four days will be spent in Delhi, the programme is concerned chiefly with visits to the historic sights in the city.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—With the picturesque and the historical side of the Prince's visit to Udaipur the telegram published in the Times of November 20th has dealt fully. But there is still something to be said regarding the existing political conditions of Rajputana and the relations of its chiefs to the British Government during the Mutiny of 1857 and since. If Central India still shows in its patchwork of States the marks of Mahratta or Pindari ravages, of the rebellious Viceroy and the successful adventurer, it is otherwise with Rajputana. There a territory more than half as large again as that of over 70 Central India States is divided between only 19, of which 16 are held by the ancient Rajput aristocracy of India. Two more—Bharatpur and Dholpur—belong to Jat Princes. Tonk alone has a Mahomedan ruler, the descendant of Amir Khan, the famous Pindari leader, who when he submitted to the British in 1818 was settled in a kingdom largely quarried from the territories of his ally Holkar. The larger part of it belongs to Central India, and the State owes its place in Rajputana chiefly to the position of its capital. The inclusion in it of the Nimbahara district was unfortunate, as Udaipur looked upon that as its own, and the Maharana was again disappointed when it was decided, in 1858, that he could not be allowed to re-occupy it. During the eventful days of 1857-58 the British incurred a great obligation to Maharana Sarup Singh of Udaipur, and to the other two great Rajput chiefs, Maharajas Takht Singh of Jodhpur and Ram Singh of Jaipur. With one or other of the great houses represented by these three names are intimately connected all the remaining 13 Rajput States. To them the smaller principalities look for guidance, and the pre-eminence of Udaipur, at least in point of nobility of descent, is recognized by all Hindu India.

In Central India; as a rule, the governing race is alien from the bulk of the people. In Rajputana, on the other hand, the ruling chief occupies rather the position of the acknowledged head of a homogeneous population, mostly connected by the ties of a common descent. There are great feudal nobles, a few of whom took the opportunity of troublous times to push their own claims, though, generally speaking, they followed the chief to whom they owed allegiance, and from whom they expected guidance. When mercenary Hindustani troops in the service of the States joined the great revolt, they felt that Rajputana was a country where they could have little hope of prospering without the support of Governments whose strength lay in their alliance with the bulk of the people, not, as in the case of Mahomedan and Mahratta States, on the force represented by these troops themselves. Therefore, the disaffected from Rajputana streamed off to Delhi and Agra when they saw that the general sympathy of the country was against them. There was no need for a Rajputana Field Force like that of Central India to quell rebellion, and 400 British soldiers sufficed as a European reinforcement. It would have been very different had the three great Rajput leaders not distinguished themselves by the most conspicuous loyalty. It has already been shown how Udaipur offered a harbour of refuge to the refugees from the Central India garrison of Nimach, in the re-occupation of which place the loyal troops of the State under the guidance of English officers played a notable part. Jodhpur loyally assisted in the suppression of the Thakur of Ahwa whose rebellion was directed as much against his own immediate Sovereign as against the British. The Raja of Kotah was a prisoner in the hands of his own rebellious mercenaries and was unable to prevent the massacre of the British Resident and his sons. Yet there was no suspicion of his personal loyalty. In the clash of arms around Delhi and Lucknow, attention was diverted from events in Rajputana. That those events never became prominent or serious is due mainly to the unswerving loyalty of the Rajput chiefs. At the same time, it would be unjust to ignore the part played by the aboriginal Mers and Bhils despised by Hindu and Mahomedan alike, who stood steadfastly by the race from which they received toleration and recognition. A troop of a rebel Bengal cavalry regiment was disarmed by the Bhil corps at Kherwara. As they moved to Udaipur, intent probably on further mischief, the Bhils of the wild hills, acting on a hint from their comrades of the Bhil corps, are said to have wiped out the disaffected troopers.

In a country so distinguished by its loyalty to the British, the Prince's reception will certainly be one of peculiar enthusiasm amongst people with whom the traditions of personal sovereignty are specially strong. It may be asked why the British should have succeeded in awakening a loyalty which Mahomedan and Mahratta alike failed to enlist. Towards the Mahomedan Emperors, to whom they submitted after a noble struggle for freedom, the Rajput chiefs could feel no real affection. They had suffered oppressions and cruelties from them the recollection of which could not be wiped out by any attempts at conciliation, and even those States which, unlike Udaipur, yielded their daughters as wives to the conquerors did so with a bad grace. The Mahrattas at least had the tie of a common religion, and would fain have established a blood connexion. Sivaji claimed a Rajput descent, and Mahratta princes of much later date have sought in vain for recognition of family ties with the reigning houses of Udaipur or Jaipur. But if Rajputana suffered at the hands of the Mahomedan conquerors, it suffered still more from the Hindus of the Deccan.

With the British the case was different. They came into touch with the great chiefs of Rajputana at a time when their great object was not so much annexation as settlement of the elements of disturbance in Central India and Rajputana. They sought no social alliances, and, if they did not offer a restoration of what had already been taken by Mahomedan or Mahratta, they at least held out a guarantee against future aggression. The Rajput, a man of honour himself, soon recognized that he had met another whom he could trust, and on confidence increasing year by year is built his friendship. When in 1857 it came to a question of adhesion to his new friends or support of their enemies he never hesitated.

Since then the British Government has had many opportunities of showing its good-will towards the Rajput and Jat rulers. Only a few years ago one had to be deposed for persistent misgovernment, but there was no thought of forfeiture of the State, which was restored, in accord with native sentiment, partly to the State of which it was an offshoot and partly to descendants of that State's great Minister to whom it had been granted. So, too, the possessions of a chief who was found guilty of murder were preserved and restored to order for his infant son.

Unfortunately, drought presses heavily on Rajputana this year, and last week's telegram announces the declaration of actual famine in Jodhpur and in Dholpur. Every chief would have welcomed a visit from the Prince, but many of them are poor, and the tour has wisely been curtailed. The Prince will visit Jaipur, as his father did 50 years ago, but he will only pass by train through the enclave of British territory of which Ajmir is the capital. In the Maharaja of Jaipur he will meet again a ruler whose figure, clad on State occasions in the quaint costume so characteristic of his part of the country was a very familiar one in London three years ago. Anyone who could be dropped down suddenly in Jaipur might well imagine himself in a city in which some American had been experimenting in the arrangement of Eastern houses in the regular parallelism of Philadelphia or Chicago. Yet, when Jai Singh laid out his city the Pennsylvanian capital had been founded but a few years, and the great commercial centre on Lake Michigan was undreamed of.

In population Jaipur stands first of the Rajput States, though in area it falls far short of Jodhpur, which also enjoys a larger revenue, not, however, in proportion to its excess of area, much of which is sandy waste. Jodhpur falls outside the line of tour, as does far-off Jaisalmer. The former is probably connected in the minds of most Englishmen with that typical Rajput soldier and gentleman, Sir Partab Singh, now head of the Idar State, lying further south amongst the Bombay States but intimately connected with Jodhpur.

In Bikanir will be seen a good example of one of the minor States. The young Maharaja came of age some seven years ago.

Of the same stock as that of the Jodhpur family, he is typical of the Western chiefs governing States much of which is but poor country, lying as they do on the borders of the desert, and even in their best parts not comparable in fertility with the States of Malwa. One product of a sandy country he has been able to offer for the service of the Empire in the camel corps, in which he has taken so much personal interest, and which has proved itself so useful.

Amongst the States to which a visit is impossible are Kotah and its offshoot Jhallavar, Tonk, the one Mahomedan State, and the group of principalities represented by Dungarpur and Banswara, whose rulers belong to the same clan as the Maharana of Udaipur. Alwar lies off the route, as does Bharatpur. Dholpur, with its famine on hand, could not afford the expense entailed by a visit, but the inhabitants of its capital will at least have a chance of seeing the Royal party as they pass, next month, from Agra to Gwalior.

The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Delhi this morning (December 12). They were received at the station by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, the General Officer Commanding the 7th Division, the Commissioner of Delhi and the Chiefs of Sirmur, Kalsia, Pataudi, Loharu and Dujana, and a number of European officers and Delhi residents. From the station they drove by the Queen's Road, Lothian Road and Chandni Chowk to the Town Hall, where an address was presented by the Municipal Committee. Thereafter their Royal Highnesses drove to the Circuit House, where they stay while in Delhi.

It is now announced that the Viceroy, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Principal officials will receive the Prince on his arrival at Calcutta at Government House instead, of as was expected, at the landing stage at Prinsep's Ghat, as has been done on previous occasions of a similar nature, including those of the arrivals of the present King and also of the Duke of Clarence at Calcutta.

Madras Mail.—Delhi, 12th December.—Their Royal Highnesses saw Amritsar under a wintry sky and with every sign of the fall of rain, which is required to save the agricultural population of the Punjab from great distress. When they arrived in Delhi, a light frost was just breaking out of the ground. The air was clear and crisp. Indeed, it was the perfection of a Delhi December day. From the moment of their alighting at the station, the Prince and Princess moved amid scenes rich with historical associations. They drove under the shadow of the Jumma Masjid, up the Chandni Chowk, which literally ran with blood during Nadir Shah's great sack of Delhi; then, from the Chandni Chowk they passed through the Mori Gate the Nicholson Cemetery, the Tomb of the Lion of the Punjab, and by the Flag Staff Tower, which was one of the hard-held British possessions during the siege, to the Circuit House, which is their head-quarters during their stay in the Imperial City.

In the progress of this tour, there have been many striking illustrations of the revolution brought in Hindustan by the Pax Britannica, but none quite so remarkable as this short transition from Amritsar to Delhi. At Amritsar, the Prince and Princess were in the head centre of that strong, fierce, military religion which knit the Sikhs into as virile a fighting caste as the world has ever seen—a caste against which the Moghul Power beat as fruitlessly as did the might of Spain against the Netherlands; of the Cavaliers against the Puritans. At Delhi, they were in the old stronghold of the Moghul Empire itself. Yesterday, they were honoured guests at the Golden Temple, the most famous shrine of Sikhism. To-day, they were the equally honoured guests at the Jumma Masjid, the finest Mosque in the world. Yet, in each of these powerful religious centres, typifying creeds wide as the poles asunder—fighting creeds, which, not so many years ago, were in the bitterest antagonism—they were received with every mark of popular acclaim, loyalty and respect. Could there be any more remarkable evidence of the unifying influence of British rule or of the confidence inspired by unbroken policy of religious toleration?

In the afternoon, Their Royal Highnesses visited, in the course of a short drive, some of the most fascinating memorials of Delhi's greatness. The route lay first to the Kashmir Gate with its memorial to the heroic Salkeld and his comrades, who, in the portal on that fateful day, drove the rebels out of the city and administered the first serious check to the Mutiny, and close to the breach through which the little storming columns advanced. Then past the church founded by the father of the Skinner who raised Skinner's Horse, who still wear the yellow which was Scindia's livery. The story is that old Skinner, lying wounded on the field, determined to make sure of his future and so built three memorials—a church, a mosque and a temple. In the little churchyard still lie the cross and ball which were the target of the mutineers' fire, but which they never succeeded in dislodging. Next by the arch of the old Magazine defended by those nine gallant Englishmen who held out until the mutineers were over the walls, and then blew it up with all who were within it. Leaving these eloquent memorials of the Great Epic in English History, the Prince and Princess moved on to the fort with the Dewan-i-Am and the Dewan-i-Khas, those splendid emblems of the greatness of the rule of the Moghuls. Thanks to Lord Curzon's loving care of the relics of India's mighty past, much has been done in their skilful restoration, and now, wandering through the exquisite inlaid marble halls of the Dewan-i-Khas and looking over the ruins of the once beautiful garden to the broad Jumma it is possible to realise the spirit in which Shah Jehan had written round the walls of his beautiful creation—"If there is a Paradise on earth, it is this, it is this, it is this." Thence their itinerary lay to the Victoria Zenana Hospital and to the Jumma Masjid, that stateliest of Mosques. Very wisely, the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to these magnificent monuments was quite private, and, so, under able ciceronage, they were able to study their glories free from distractions. The Princess is an especially keen observer of everything good that India can show, and, on many occasions, has surprised her guides by the extent and variety of her knowledge of Indian affairs.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses and Suite attended Divine service in the durbar tent this morning. The Rev. C. H. Milvey read the lessons of the day and a sermon was preached by the Bishop of Lahore, who took for his text "Fret not." In the course of the sermon the Bishop referred to the death of Archdeacon Spence Gray in terms of deepest sympathy and regret. A collection was made in aid of soldiers' institutes. This afternoon the Prince and Princess drove to the outskirts of Jammu and witnessed the distribution of alms to the poor, Rs. 5,000 being devoted to this purpose, instead of it being practically wasted in the customary present known as Ziafat. This is a new departure, which it is hoped will be generally adopted in Native States hereafter.

Their Royal Highnesses have accepted a small collection of leopard and bear skins, ibex and other horns and stuffed birds found in Kashmir. This an excellent collection as it was mostly made by Colonel A. E. Ward, than whom there is no better shikari in India. The Mountain Battery now here paraded for the Prince's inspection as he drove to the city. The appearance of men and mules more than bore out the high reputation which the two Kashmir Imperial Service Batteries have gained on service. The medals worn were eloquent of the good work done in the past, some of the native officers having five. The sooner the new 10-pounder gun is given to these Batteries the better, as their efficiency will thereby be greatly increased.

This camp is one that could not have been better planned, the wide stretch of turf at its upper end being one of its pleasant features. Artificial water channels have been made, and thus the grass has been kept green and the roads free from dust. The sanitary arrangements are admirable, no water except that which has been filtered or boiled being allowed to be used in the tents. The Imperial Service Hospital, close at hand, has allotted twelve beds in case of sickness among the hundreds of servants and followers gathered together, the medical arrangements having been made by Dr. Sawney, Chief Medical Officer of Jammu, under the instruction and supervision of Major W. R. Edwards, Residency Surgeon. The comfort of the Maharaja's numerous guests has been secured in every way and they have enjoyed excellent music by the State band. Their only regret in fact is their short stay here. Colonel Pears, the Resident, and his Staff, consisting of Major Windham, Captain R. E. A. Hamilton, Captain S. B. Patterson, and Major Edwards, Residency Surgeon, have conducted all the official and ceremonial duties falling to them in a manner that ensured the complete success of these functions. The Maharaja and his officials have been unremitting in their efforts to make the Royal visit a memorable one, and the Prince and Princess will have nothing but pleasant memories of Jammu just as they have had of the other Native States already seen.

Times.—The Prince and Princess of Wales received here, as at Amritsar, a great popular welcome, the Chandni Chauk being packed with an enormous crowd during the reception of the municipal address. The people were very demonstrative along the route, while the continuous roar of voices in the vicinity of the town-hall made the Prince's reply to the address almost inaudible.

So much was written about Delhi less than three years ago, at the time of the great Coronation Durbar, that the scenes which the Prince of Wales is now visiting must be fairly familiar to most of your readers. Yet to none can these scenes appeal so powerfully as to the Heir-Apparent to an Indian Empire far more extended and more solidly established than was ever that of the Mogul Sovereigns who reigned in this city. What might have been the destinies of the Mogul Empire had Akbar's successors persevered in the broad and liberal statesmanship he laid down for them, or whether, had they done so, a British King would ever have been proclaimed Emperor of India within sound of the splendid palace and fort built by Shah Jehan, must always remain an interesting subject of speculation. History, however, is there to show that the Mogul Empire fell because the example of generous tolerance and even-handed justice towards all races and creeds which Akbar vainly set, having been born perhaps too soon into the world of Asia, was neglected and, by Aurangzeb at least, deliberately set at naught and that the British Empire in India has hitherto grown and thriven because, and in so far as, British rule has revived and extended the principles which inspired that great and enlightened Sovereign.

To the virile qualities of the race upon which British rule—the rule of a mere handful of Europeans barely a quarter of a million in number, scattered about this great sub-continent amongst a native population of nearly three hundred millions—must in the last resort be conditioned, Delhi bears equally eloquent testimony. For in the annals of our history nothing, perhaps, quite equals, for sheer audacity and heroism, the prolonged struggle on the slopes of the famous Ridge during the Mutiny, when, amidst pestilence and hardships of every kind, throughout the fierce heat of an Indian summer, almost cut off from the outer world, a small force of less than 10,000 men altogether, less than half of them British, confronted the flower of the revolted army, more than 40,000 strong, and ultimately wrested from them by storm the immense fortified city which was the hotbed of rebellion and the symbol of victory.

Times of India.—Their Royal Highnesses saw Amritsar under a wintry sky, and with every sign of the fall of rain which is required to save the agricultural population of the Punjab from great distress. When they arrived in Delhi a light frost was just breaking out of the ground, the air was clear and crisp, indeed, it was the perfection of a Delhi December day. From the moment of their alighting at the Station, the Prince and Princess moved amid scenes rich with historical associations. They drove under the shadow of the Jumma Masjid, up the Chandni Chowk, which literally ran with blood during Nadir Shah's great sack of Delhi. Then from the Chandni Chowk they passed through the Mori Gate, the Nicholson Cemetery, the tomb of the "Lion of the Punjab," and by the Flag Staff Tower, which was one of the hard held British positions during the Siege, to the Circuit House, which is their headquarters during their stay in the Imperial City.

But Delhi has another side; in addition to its historic importance, it is growing into one of the greatest commercial emporia of India, and it was this side of its activities that first came officially before the Royal Visitors in an address from the Municipal Commissioners at the Town Hall. Not since the great Durbar has the Chandni Chowk presented so fair a sight as it did this morning. One side of the tree divided avenue was reserved for the Royal Procession, up and down the other side the people might move freely. But they had no desire to move. Cheek by jowl they sat, on the roadside, on the emerald green balconies, and on the flat house tops. From all this vast throng there went up one continuous buzz of cheery talk. Why is it that the Indian has the reputation of being a dull, taciturn fellow? In far northern cities, like Peshawar, where no man can confidently reckon seeing the morrow, he is on these holiday occasions as lively a soul as you would wish to see. There was a brief hush as the head of the escort of the 31st Lancers came round the Jumma Masjid, indicating the approach of the Royal cortege, but the joyous cry broke out again as soon as their Royal Highnesses halted under the Clock Tower, and took their seats in the state chairs which faced the fine bronze statue of her late Majesty Queen Victoria. His Royal Highness wore the full dress uniform of a General, and the Princess was attired in a handsomely embroidered dress of a cream coloured cloth. A sea of faces lined the circus, of which the Tower is the centre. The address read drawing attention to the fact that it was at Delhi, 25 years ago, that Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India, and that apart from its historic and imperial history, Delhi has of recent years made rapid commercial development. Mills and factories have sprung up, and whereas in 1877, when the King-Emperor visited it, only three lines of railway entered the city, now no less than seven converge upon it, to which will be shortly added an eighth, when the Nagda-Bara line to Bombay is finished.

Their Royal Highnesses then drove to the Circuit House, which has been specially prepared for their reception. In the afternoon they visited in the course of a short drive some of the most fascinating memorials of Delhi's greatness. The route lay first to the Kashmir Gate, with its Memorial to the heroic Salkeld and his comrades, who blew in the portal on that fateful day which drove the rebels out of the city, and administered the first serious check to the Mutiny; and close to the breach through which the little storming columns advanced. Then past the Church, founded by the father of the Skinner who raised Skinner's Horse, who still wear the yellow which was Scindia's livery. The story is that old Skinner, lying wounded on the field, determined to make sure of his future and so built three memorials—a church, a mosque, and a temple. In the little churchyard still lie the cross and ball which were the target of the mutineers' fire. Next by the arch of the old magazine which was defended by those nine gallant Englishmen who held out until the mutineers were over the walls, and then blew it up with all who were within it. Leaving these eloquent memorials of the great epic in English history, the Prince and Princess moved on to the Fort with the Dewan-i-Am, and the Dewan-i-Khas, those splendid emblems of the greatness of the rule of the Moghuls. Thanks to Lord Curzon's loving care for the relics of India's mighty past, much has been done in skilful restoration, and now, wandering through the exquisite inlaid marble halls of the Dewan-i-Khas, and looking over the ruins of the once beautiful garden to the broad Jumna, it is possible to realise the spirit in which Shah Jehan had written round the walls of his beautiful creation:—"If there is a Paradise on earth it is this! it is this! it is this!" Thence their itinerary lay to the Victoria Zenana Hospital, and to the Jumma Masjid, that stateliest of mosques. Very wisely the visit of their Royal Highnesses to these magnificent monuments was quite private, and so under able chaperonage they were able to study their glories free from distractions. The Princess is an especially keen observer of everything good that India can show, and on many occasions has surprised her guides by the extent and variety of her knowledge of Indian affairs.

* The following portion of our Special Correspondent's message from Amritsar was received too late Monday night for publication in our yesterday's paper:—

His Highness the Nawab of Bahawalpur and the Regent of Malar Kotla State have intimated their desire to be present at the National College at Aligarh to receive their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and will join the lunch party which will be given to the Royal visitors on behalf of the College. The Regent of Maler Kotla has also expressed a wish to send to Aligarh the Maler Kotla Lancers and Sappers as an escort to their Royal Highnesses.

Calcutta is now in the throes of preparation for the Christmas holidays and the Royal visit and the city promises to be fuller than ever. Hotel accommodation for this period is practically unobtainable and ticea garis are already being engaged at high rates. The Calcutta and Tollygunge Races and Polo Tournament and Amateur Golf Championship will play prominent parts in the amusements to come, while the programme of the Royal visit is very full and varied.

The improvements on the maidan in front of the new Military and Foreign Offices are very marked. The paddocks on the race course have been greatly beautified and enlarged; the famous Dalhousie Square is being rapidly brought into order, and the city promises to be at her best when the Prince and Princess of Wales arrive.

14TH DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on their visit here saw the well-known carpet factory of Messrs. Devi Sahai Chamba Mal, a name with which they may be already familiar to some extent, as many of the carpets now in use in the Royal household in England were manufactured at this factory, which was given a certificate by His Majesty when he visited Amritsar years ago. The Royal visitors were received by R. B. Lala Gargar Mal, the proprietor, and his son, Lala Ram Saran Das, an honorary magistrate, and spent three quarters of an hour in watching the processes of manufacture of pashmina and woolen carpets. Their Royal Highnesses made a few purchases of carpets and shawls, and signed their names in the visitors' book.

Englishman.—To say the right thing, at the right time, in the right place, to the right people, has been, in a most remarkable degree and for several generations, one of the happiest attributes of the beloved Royal Family of this Empire. Throughout her long reign, the published letters and messages of Queen Victoria always, without a single exception—and more particularly when they were messages of kindness or sympathy—bore this fortunate character; while the superb tact and the instinctive kindness of our King have long ago won all hearts both at home and abroad, and have contributed not a little to the success with which he has enacted the part of the Royal Peacemaker. All the world remembers the striking speech of the Prince of Wales to the people of London on the occasion of the return of Their Royal Highnesses from their great Colonial Tour. Two memorable words then used—Wake Up!—have been quoted a thousand times as a typical instance of the aptitude of which we are speaking. And we think that all of our readers—who are doubtless following from day to day the reports which our special correspondent enables us to give of the numerous and varied speeches that are being made by the Prince at the most important points of his tour—will agree with us that they demonstrate the possession of this great gift of appropriate speech in quite an unusual degree.

These thoughts are suggested to-day by the altogether admirable speech made by the Prince of Wales on Monday in reply to the address of the Amritsar Municipality. Both the place and the occasion were inspiring. The son of King Edward could not fail to remember the visit paid by his Royal father to the capital of the Sikh nation some thirty years ago; and the grandson of Queen Victoria could not fail to remember that nearly fifty years before that loyal and martial race had rallied to the flag of their Queen with enthusiasm, and thousands of Sikh sabres had leapt from their scabbards to punish rebellion against her. Nothing could be better, nothing more touching to all hearers, nothing more gratifying to Sikh martial pride, than the very simplicity of the Prince's reference to those days of stress and strain. "We could not leave the Punjab without alighting at the place that is so dear to those good soldiers the Sikhs." His Royal Highness went on to speak with pleasure of the great progress made, in wealth, in trade, in education, in sanitation, in all the amenities of civilisation, since the visit of the King. And then he returned to the subject of the Khalsa. "It would seem to be most appropriate that the Khalsa College should have been instituted in this city so sacred to the men of the Khalsa—renowned as Amritsar is for its commerce, it may be that some day, it will be equally renowned as the great centre of Sikh education." The same kindly and generous tone was maintained throughout the speech, and also in a subsequent speech delivered in reply to an address from the Khalsa College Council. Mr. Rattigan was quite right when he observed, in this latter address, that the Royal visit would live for ever in the hearts of the loyal Sikh race.

Englishman.—Before visiting the Mutiny Memorials there were certain official ceremonies to be observed. In the morning His Royal Highness received visits from the Raja of Sirmur, the Sardar, of Kalsia and the Nawabs of Pataudi, Loharu and Dujana, and at noon returned the visit of the Raja of Sirmur. In the evening a reception was held in the grounds of the Circuit House, after a small State banquet, which was attended by these Chiefs and many of the English gentlemen present in Delhi. But in view of the absorbing interest of the historical surroundings of Delhi the Royal programme was kept very free from official functions, and so the Prince and Princess of Wales were able to study these fascinating memorials without the distractions which must usually accompany a Royal Progress.

This afternoon Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales spent in a quiet excursion to those memorials of the mutiny, which hold so dear a place in the hearts of all Englishmen. Leaving the Circuit House they drove to the Flagstaff Tower, which was one of the four great posts to ridge during the siege and was held by a strong infantry picket. Thence to Hindu Rao's house, the centre of the hardest fighting of those heroic days. The enemy knew that this quondam residence of a Mahratta nobleman was the key of the British position and made desperate attempts to capture it, but all endeavours to dislodge Major Reed and his gallant Gurkhas were made in vain. Thence the Royal route lay to the mutiny memorial, near which the besiegers had the heavy gun position known as the right battery, twelve hundred yards from the city wall. The memorial is the one feature of the ridge that jars. It is so entirely out of harmony with the scene that one I wonders how it ever came to be erected. From its steps, however, can be gained a view of great beauty. The broken ground dotted with trees stretches to the city walls. Within lies the great city with its matchless mosques and minarets, and the graceful white dome of the Jamma Masjid. But the growth of the trees has been so rapid that the scene is fast losing the character it bore in the days of the mutiny. The purple walls are half concealed and many of the relics of the epic siege cannot be discovered with close search.

Having studied the scene of the siege, with the aid of Mr. Gordon Walker, Their Royal Highnesses passed to the Mow gate and by way of the old magazine, with its tablet Willoughby and his gallant comrades, who blew it up, and the old church with its shot-torn wall, to the Kashmir gate. Here the memorial to Salkeld and those who cleared the way for the attack was studied, and His Royal Highness climbed the adjacent breach in the wall, through which number one storming column advanced. The sites of the breaching batteries in Ludlow Castle Gardens and the Kudsia Gardens were examined and Their Royal Highnesses also paid a visit to the tomb of the heroic Nicholson. In this way they saw under informed guidance all the principal points in the siege and the storming of Delhi.

Indian Daily News.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales has aroused such great and universal interest in this country, that the progress of Their Royal Highnesses through India will be followed with the keenest possible interest by all races and creeds in the Peninsula. The ceremonies in the various States and at the various Courts are being carried out on the most magnificent scale and will cause much excitement and general curiosity. Comparatively few persons will be able to see even a portion of them, but both those and the far greater number not so privileged will welcome the pictorial record now appearing in our illustrated contemporary, The Graphic (London six pence weekly). The special artists of The Graphic will follow the Royal Party throughout their journeying, and when we remember the admirable manner in which the visit to India of King Edward, when Prince of Wales, was pictorially chronicled by The Graphic, there can be no doubt that the illustrations in our contemporary of the present Royal Tour will form a valuable historical record of one of the most noteworthy events in British history.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince this morning received State visits at the Circuit House from the Raja of Sirmur, the Sardar of Kalsia and the Nawabs of Patandi, Loharu and Dujana. This afternoon His Royal Highness drives along the Ridge. To-night a banquet will be held at the Circuit House followed by a reception of Indian gentlemen.

The drive of the Prince and Princess along the Ridge this afternoon was in the nature of a private visit to the scene. The course of the fighting there 48 years ago was explained, the position of the artillery being marked out in order to make the situation clear.

The reception of the provincial darbaris after the State banquet to-night was held in a shamiana in the grounds of the Circuit House. It was attended by a number of European officers and civilians, and was an interesting and brilliant function. The gathering included the Raja of Sirmur, the Sardar of Kalsia, and the Nawabs of Patandi, Loharu, and Dujana. It was 9.45 when the Prince arrived, accompanied by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and passed through the tent to the dais, preceded by the staffs of His Royal Highness and His Honor. The presentation of the darbaris was made by Mr. A. H. Diack, Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, and each darbari tendered a nazar of one gold-mohur, which was touched and remitted. Homage having been done, the Prince mingled with the gathering conversing with a number of those present, shortly afterwards departing in State.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Royalty has come and gone, and we are now as it were lying low after all the many festivities of the august occasion. The chief incidents of the Royal visit have already been specially recorded by the numerous special correspondents who followed in the train of their Royal Highnesses. One has waxed rather satirical over the "bunting" with which the city was bedecked. As Lucknow will also possibly come in for its share of similar criticism, it may not be amiss to remind correspondent that these decorations are after all but a matter of form. For instance, Peshawar City is in its way one of the most interesting spots in India—not to say in Asia. Its streets are ethnologically a living museum of all the races of Central Asia. The Anglo-Indian perhaps never sees the East of his childhood as he conceives it from his "Bible," and the "Arabian Nights," till he arrives in Peshawar. Forty dhotied dacoits, duly convicted, would not recall to his mind the forty thieves of Ali Baba in the same vivid way, as would a similar number of even the most respectable Afridis to be seen perambulating the city at any hour of the day. But "nobles oblige," and it is one of the disadvantage of Royalty that they are not permitted to see our cities as they are naturally, but only through the "bunting" with which loyal municipalities consider it their duty to disfigure their streets. Nor are the municipalities to be blamed. Something must be done to show the masses that Royalty is in their midst. After all, these decorations are only meant to amuse the people and to stimulate their sense of loyalty, and both Royalty and the municipalities have merely to put up with them for the good of the public—it is in short the "dastur."

The greater part of the garrison is now away at Pindi for the manœuvres, but the station is in good hands. We have the Black Watch and the 83rd Cavalry to look after us, and so feel comparatively safe. Of course the place is a trifle dull, but we have nothing really of which to complain, having during the last week had more than our fill of excitement. This brings me back to Royalty.

The Prince and Princess have left a very favourable impression behind them; not that this is surprising to any one. Most of the functions which they attended were necessarily fatiguing, yet their Highnesses found time not only to visit the sick in hospital but also to honour the garrison by a personal visit to the senior regiment. The Prince of Wales, with unflinching tact also, marked his appreciation of the services rendered by the several local officials associated with his visit, with presents of plate, tie pins, etc., etc. I need scarcely tell you how pleased the recipients were with these gracious tokens of His Highnesses' approval.

The weather is getting gradually but decidedly colder, and fires are now a necessity. It does not look, however, as though we were going to have the extreme cold of last year, but as yet we have had no rain and Peshawar is literally smothered with dust. Water is also very badly wanted for the crops, and the irrigation canals are quite dry. A shock of earthquake was felt here a few nights ago. It was a very slight shock, but after the experience of last April, people are apt to be rather nervous, and the slightness of the shock in question did not prevent some of us from getting up and rushing into the compound.

Our friends the Pathans have been on their good behaviour of late, but if report is true, not a few of them became the guests of the City Kotwal during the last week: a not unnecessary precaution. These gentlemen were naturally the chief anxiety of the authorities during the Royal visit, and in the circumstances the dreaded Khyber was quite safe when compared with the city, not that Peshawar is behind the rest of India for its loyalty, but with half the inhabitants of Borderland thronging its streets, special precautions are of course necessary.

Lady.—Amongst the many places in India visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales, few can surpass in interest those of which illustrations accompany this short article. The Gateway of Ala-ud-Din, a splendid specimen of early Pathan work, is a portion of the great mosque at Lalkot, or old Delhi, some miles from the present city. Lalkot was a strong Hindu fortress, conquered by Mohammed of Ghor, whose race became its rulers for a number of years. It contains buildings which it would be difficult to equal, perhaps impossible to surpass, for amongst them are the Kutub Minar, "the glory of Delhi," all in nobly-carved red stone, towering to a great height, and tapering from a diameter of nearly fifty feet at the base to nine at the top, the mosque of Altamsh, and several very lovely tombs. To Altamsh, who died in 1236, we owe one of the most beautiful buildings in India, the best and most exquisite work of the conquered Hindu having been utilised by him in adorning his Mosque. The followers of the Prophet are in their architecture distinguished by loftiness of conception; the worshippers of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva by delicacy of detail, this building combining the best work of both peoples. To it was added, some seventy years later, the beautiful gate-way shown in the illustration, which is in very good preservation, though the mosque itself lies roofless now, only its lofty arches, its noble entrance-gate, its carven passages, and columns remaining to tell what once it was. The whole spot is redolent of charm, a leafy oasis in a wilderness of dust and sand, and from the slight elevation to the north an extensive view over the surrounding country, and a distant glimpse of the mighty fortress of Tuglukabad rising lone and desolate four miles away, is obtained.

The second illustration shows Benares, the most revered of the seven holy cities of India, as it can be seen across the Ganges. On this spot the hopes of all devout Hindus are fixed, and thither when it seems as though death were within measurable distance, they seek to crawl, weak and toothless, trembling and emaciated, so that their ashes may mingle with the sacred waters of the river—the beloved Mother Ganga of their aspirations and their dreams. The huge mosque towering over the adjoining buildings seems rather out of place in the great stronghold of Hinduism. It was the work of Aurungzeb, the iconoclast and tyrant, who had none of the tolerance of his noble-minded forefather Akbar. But notwithstanding Aurungzeb's efforts to stamp out Hinduism by fire and sword, by the axe laid to the root of the tree, by ruined building and burning homestead, it is as rampant to-day as it was in the time of the great destroyer. And close to the foot of his mosque the people throng the ghats in order to wash away their sins in the sacred waters flowing by, and the smoke rises from funeral pyres where the dead bodies of the devout are stretched, each on his narrow bed. A row down the river, past all these miles of ghats thronged with brightly-clothed men and women, is a sight not soon to be forgotten, being picturesque to a degree.

"The Royal Palaces at Lucknow are without exception the worst specimens in India." So said one who knew the country well, and most people of any taste will probably agree with him, though, leaving its buildings out of consideration, Lucknow, the capital of "the Garden of India," is a charmingly pretty city, being fresh and green with luxuriant foliage and well-kept avenues, where so many others owning greater architectural triumphs are dusty and sun-baked. But it is not its beauty which interests us, but rather the memory of one of the most heroic and pathetic struggles of the few against the many which history records. Think of it a few hundred English soldiers with their wives and children, aided by a mere handful of the native troops who had remained true to "their salt," besieged in the Residency, a frail two-story building, in the very heart of a populous city, and with more than 80,000 pitiless, armed foes surrounding and attacking them by day and night.

"Ever the labour of fifty, that had to be done by five:
Ever the marvel among us that one should be left alive;
Ever the day with its traitorous death from the loopholes around.

Ever the night with its coffinless corpse to be laid in the ground.

Heat like the mouth of a hell, or a deluge of cataract skies.
Stench of old offal decaying, and infinite torment of flies."

This was not the least part of the misery, since the siege began in the burning summer heat, lasting till the 16th of the following October, though Havelock had brought in the meantime an addition to the fighting forces which gave a little respite to the weary soldiers, fighting-men by day, sentinels through the long, weary night. How many proud, though saddened, thoughts rise in our minds as we stand beside the grave of one of the greatest English subjects whom India ever knew, wise as he was brave, brave as he was wise! "The difference between the two greatest of the Lawrence brothers," said one who in his youth knew them well, "was that every one respected John, whilst every one both respected and loved Henry." In the touching Indian phrase, "his grave is still green," and young soldiers flock thither to read over and over again how Henry Lawrence "tried to do his duty," which is, at his own request, the simple inscription on his simple tomb. Other graves there are of touching interest, one of them of a young wife shot down whilst attending the wounded in the open courtyard.

Ah! it is a touching story but yet our hearts beat with pride, remembering how nobly the soldiers of England fulfilled the command of their lost leader as he lay on the deathbed. "Never surrender; rather let every man die at his post."

Madras Mail.—The Royal Saloon cars, which were built by the South Indian Railway Company for the accommodation of the Prince and Princess of Wales, arrived at the Egmore Station yesterday morning, and bear out the elaborate description given by a Negapatam correspondent in our issue of October 26th last. No expense has been spared in the construction of the cars, and it must prove disappointing to the S. I. Railway authorities that Their Royal Highnesses will not travel in them on any of the S. I. R. lines, though they will utilise them on their journey over the Southern Mahratta Railway, the cars having been lent to that line by the S.I.R. The building of the cars has cost Rs. 70,000, but they will be utilised by the Company for special purposes, such as the Governor's and Viceroy's tours in South India.

Mr. W. B. Reynolds, Locomotive and Carriage Superintendent of the S. I. R., travelled up with the cars from this morning and kindly showed our Negapatam representative over them, pointing out the excellent accommodation provided. No detail has been overlooked in any of the compartments, and Their Royal Highnesses will doubtless appreciate the trouble and expense that has been incurred so as to ensure every degree of comfort. The work reflects the greatest of credit on the designers, builders and furnishers, and if they convey the Royal Visitors as smoothly and noiselessly as they are running at present, the S. I. R. Coy. should feel pleased at the fact that, although the Prince and Princess will not actually travel on their own line of railway, they will enjoy the comfort of the S. I. R. carriages on the lines of another Company.

Madras Mail.—The Government of Madras have declared Wednesday, the 24th January, to be a public holiday throughout the Presidency in honour of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Morning Post.—The sun was down when we left Indore, but the way was lit for us out of the State by sentinels on either side of the line with aromatic torches flaming above their heads. By day gay galloping horsemen had guarded the railway, but these rigid bronze figures, white robed, crimson turbaned, with fire dripping from the scented wood, set along the jungle darkness each in his space of light, seemed as the older part of India to push us back into feudal ages with their pretty prodigal ways of courtesy. The sense of feudal days remained when dawn showed us across the waste plain, half desert, half jungle, over which we were toiling, the filling of walls and forts and bastions in every gap by which a road entered through the rampart hills of Udaipur. The city itself—City of Sunrise its name means, but as the wonderful City of Sunset one remembers it—was still miles away, and these barriers in its outermost defences are now but memories of the old strife between Hindu and Muhammadan, between Rajput and Mughal, which began with the driving out of the Rajputs of Chitor by Akbar into the deserts of the Indus, and only ended with the shrinking northward of the Mughal Empire.

The Rajputs of Chitor, of all rulers in India, have the right to produce feudal impressions, since they still gravely trace their descent from the sun, and can boast that they alone of all the Rajput stock were too proud, even in their most desperate days, to give a daughter in marriage to a Mughal Emperor. The very shape of the city also favours the feudal sense, climbing, as it does, from the huts of the sweepers and the dust of the bazaar, up by devious streets and zigzag alleys, with houses hoisted on each other's shoulders, till the great white Palace stands on the heads of them all. That is one way of seeing it; not the most striking, but perhaps the most suggestive. From the lake the Palace seems folding the whole town under its heavy white wing, to put it aside with a sort of disdainful intolerance. But seen from the city it seems uplifted with a kind of triumph. As you climb the steep glaring streets you cannot see it, you have only the sense of its mass above you, the knowledge that up to it only everything chafes, till your way is barred by massive granite walls, and passing through the Great Gate you cross the court where the Royal elephants trumpet, under whose arches past Maharanas have been weighed for largesse against gold and silver and mounting still, enter by a further archway to find at last the white height of it rising beside you into the sky. White and almost blank its walls are—mercifully empty of ornament in a country which never knows where to stay its decorating hand—all the tracery being kept for the topmost storeys, which lie, exquisitely chased, like a crown of old carven ivory, above the front of its best colourless determination. Coming upon it so, aloof, silent, impenetrable, it seems to breathe the haughty spirit of Rajput valour, which six hundred years ago, at the first Mughal capture of Chitor, caused a Rajput queen and thirteen thousand of her women to seek death by burning that their men should be free to fight their way through the foe.

But for a certain overpowering picturesqueness it is from the lake that the Palace should be seen, if only because there is nothing quite to match it in all India. Where on the land side was the climbing town here is only a sheer precipice of wall; wall of shorn granite and of in-built marble, with its foot set deep in the lake water, and all of it washed to one dazzling whiteness, so that there is no telling masonry from the solid rock. From this, the oldest part, the rest leans back from the lake, rising by bastions, terraces, and winding stairs to the crest of the hill, which is crowned by the Palace along the whole lifted length of it. It is all of marble—whitewashed; and yet one does not wish the whitewash away. Marble would have taken the grave elegance of age, it would have owed its charm to the tenderness of a thousand seasons, it would have grown mellow with the whole hillside. But one feels that this proud thing will owe time nothing; she will wear no sort of beauty which is not herself. She washes from her face, as though it were a defilement, the soft tint of the ages, she hides even the marble of which she is made. She will so insist on having nothing but her splendid shape and carriage as to make even her simplicity arrogant; but she will be incarnate youth as well, she will only be seen as she was in the day when her builder looked back and wondered how he had made her. And so she faces you at midday in her insolent whiteness, like some haughty beauty, daring you to look at her; indeed, to look at her in that hour is not the part of wisdom, for she not only does her best to blind you, but to look as unlovely as she can. It is only hours later that you learn the wisdom of her audacious whiteness, when she wraps herself in the sun's splendid yellows, and then when he is down, and the sunset faded, seems to let his colours slip off her into the water, and stands therein a tired pallor, dead white, almost pathetic, as though wearied already with her pretence of youth. But when above that cold, clear wash of air in the west the after-glow rises, you turn suddenly to find her all flushed with rose, shy, tender, almost appealing, with her ivory crown like the blossom of peaches, and a deep amethyst dyeing the fringe of her skirts.

Anyone who wishes to see things as they are should of course avoid Royal progresses. One is already looking forward to Bikaner and the desert, after little more than a fortnight of finding every place either in a flurry of preparation or complacently looking its bedizened best. Now and again we gain; we see in one short morning what we might seek in vain for months: we receive a single wonderful impression from what dispersed would fail entirely of its effect. But our gains are not worth being set beside our losses. Our gains we would not have missed because we had not looked for them. But our losses are whole cities, and all the special things of beauty that we hoped to find.

In Udaipur we may be reckoned fortunate, for the depressing daytime decorations scarcely penetrated within the city and the illuminations carried considerably forward one's conception of the effects to be obtained from them. But for that, too, one paid dear; for the Udaipur illuminant is a small clay saucer filled with oil in which a cotton wick is laid. Used by the hundred thousand, its tiny flames give a delicate twinkling line of light of itself delightful. The saucers are stuck on little dabs of mud, and can so be placed safely on the slenderest bamboo, or are hung vertically on wires. They are filled usually by a native, who talks excitedly over his shoulder during the operation, and the lake-side reeked of and ran with oil for two days before the lamps were lighted. So completely, too, was the idea carried out that not an outline was left along the shore unspoiled by its rows of brown butties. We had in return quite as fine a spectacle as probably of its kind could anywhere be seen. There were miles of the delicate trembling lines of fire. They flickered like golden crowns round the high hill forts with the pale stars of heaven about and beneath them, and in those unlooked—for and unthought-of places they were really lovelier than words can say. Every building along the line of lakes by which we were rowed to the State banquet was outlined by those slender threads of flame, which climbed by wall and roof from house to house, up the sloping town till they reached the Palace, and they hung across the lake to every pillar, minaret, and cupola in the White Islands, their long reflection from either shore making the water like gold work about the oars. One paid it the tribute of a child's admiring wonder; one could really imagine nothing more complete; decoration of the sort could go no further.

Yet it was only as we were rowed back at midnight from the Palace, with the lights growing fainter and failing here and there, that one learnt how shallow is the pleasure that such things bring. As the boat came to shore in the dark water beneath the Guest House, so gray and still after the roar of bombs and rockets the glory of the risen moon was unveiled before us. Then one knew.

Pioneer.—Those who knew the country lying between the Mall and the Taj (Agra) a few years ago would never recognise it now. The bleak ravines, with their flinty and unfertile soil, their scanty covering of "Karcel" and "Pealoo" bushes and stunted grass, have given place to one of the finest parks in India, a rolling expanse of grass and trees and shrubs, green and pleasing to the eye in the hottest months. It is here, in the Circuit House, that the Prince and Princess of Wales will stay while in Agra. The Princess's sitting-room has been artistically decorated with things entirely Indian, chiefly in shades of blue. Adjoining the Circuit House a large camp has been skillfully pitched and the grounds are already bright with phlox, verbenas and nasturtiums. The site is an ideal one, commanding as it does a lovely view of the Taj, the Fort, the river and, immediately in front, the new horse-shoe lake. It is difficult to describe the camp in detail as one gets bewildered wandering through the numerous tents. The large reception tent is very imposing with its blue wall and blue and white ceiling. In it are three large glass chandeliers (made in the Roorkee workshops some sixty years ago) and it is intended to use candles only for lighting this tent. Not far off are the Police camp and the camps of the escorts, the 15th Hussars and Hodson's Horse, all models of neatness. The whole encampment has a most picturesque appearance, the tents shining white as snow in the sunlight, the garden all ablaze with flowers, and the Taj,

Fort and the river Jumna making a magnificent background. The news of the Royal visit has spread to every village. The natives are as keenly interested and enthusiastic as the Europeans and nobody has need to ask:—

"Whose are the gilded tents that crowd the way,
Where all was waste and silent yesterday,
Princely pavilions, screened by many a fold,
Of crimson cloth, and topped with balls of gold, Steeds, with their housings of rich silver spun,
Their chains and pottrels glittering in the sun,
And camels, tufted over with Yemen's shells,
Shaking in every breeze their light-toned bells."

At the Fort Railway Station (where Their Royal Highnesses will arrive at 9-30 a.m. on the 16th, not 8-30 a.m. as previously arranged) most elaborate preparations have been made. The station itself is bedecked within and without, the roof being covered with flags and bunting. Outside, the rising ground between the station and the Fort has been terraced, a garden made, fairly large trees planted, and, as at the Circuit House, chrysanthemums and many kinds of annuals are blooming in all their glory. Every precaution has been taken here to prevent accidents in the large crowds which are sure to assemble at this point. The dangerous moat of the Fort has been walled in at some places and fenced at others, and strong barricades have been built to keep the crowds off the line of route. From the station to the Railway Bridge, along the Strand Road to the Pontoon Bridge and from there along the Muttra Road for some considerable distance the roads have been profusely decorated, the most noticeable part perhaps being between the Railway and Pontoon Bridges. Here, with the river on one hand and the city on the other, bunting and flags are displayed in lavish profusion, and numerous and quaint stands have been erected. Several arches are also nearing completion. Seats at this part of the route are in great demand, as not only is it a good position from which to see Their Royal Highnesses, but the display of fireworks will take place in the bed of the river between the two bridges on the night of the 16th. A pleasing feature of the arrangements that are being made for the Royal visit is the whole-hearted manner in which the natives have entered into the spirit of the thing. Rich and poor alike have done their utmost to make the occasion a success, in some instances at no small personal sacrifice; and it is sincerely to be hoped that the wish "Auspicious be your visit," which is painted in large letters on the house of a native banker in the city, will become a reality. We all know what "Queen's Weather" means, but we want no fine weather in this part of the world at present, and, if the Royal visit be followed by ample Christmas rains, it will be auspicious indeed and a blessing to millions of the King's subjects.

On Monday next before the ceremony of unveiling the Victoria Memorial Statue at Agra, the Prince and Princess of Wales will lunch with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers, of which regiment His Royal Highness is Colonel-in-Chief.

Vanity Fair.—An Indian Pilgrim writes:—

The Royal tourists are enjoying themselves tremendously, if one may judge from a telegram which the Prince has just sent off to the King. It was in private cipher, but when recorded it read: "Am having a high old time." For this I can stand a personal guarantee. But though the Prince is well satisfied with India, I am sorry to say that India—the native part of it—is not altogether pleased with the Prince. There is no community in the world more punctilious of etiquette than the native Princes, and any breach of customary observance gives the direst offence. There are two points which have annoyed our dusky potentates: the first, the receiving of the Chiefs in a bunch instead of in order of precedence, and the omission to return their calls; and the second is the refusal to receive presents. Their point of view is that they are degraded in the eyes of their subjects by this innovation.

Lord Curzon has a pretty wit. His answer to a suggestion that his administration of India was mainly characterised by Commissions, which were always sitting, but whose eggs were never hatched out, was "I held my peace, but sat all the harder." An answer fully justified by the results. The Prince of Wales has been doing great things in the sporting line, both with rifle and shot gun, and his good shooting has made a great impression on the natives, who like to see a Chief better than the best at any pursuit which he takes part in.

Existence in the East is relieved by the unconscious humour occasionally afforded by our native friends in their wrestles with the English language. A native gentleman—a Mahomedan—lately petitioned Government regarding an allowance he received, and, as a reason for an increase of his pension, stated that "I am a brigamy." He has evidently manufactured a new and very useful portmanteau word, as it is supposed that he meant to convey the information that he had more than one wife: the component parts being half bigamy and half Brigham (Young).

15TH DECEMBER 1905.

Globe.—The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to the tomb of Humayun in a motor car is sufficiently striking juxtaposition of the old and the new, without the addition of a mistake as to the identity of Humayun himself. He, of course, was the second Emperor of the Mogul Dynasty, but we observe that in some quarters he is confused with Hanamen, the Monkey God, whose existence is purely mythical, and under whose protection lies the great langars, or grey apes, seen all over India. The correction is worth making because the supposed presence of the Prince and Princess at the Shrine of the God might give rise to a misunderstanding in England.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—To-day (December 14th) is being given up by their Royal Highnesses to a visit to the Kutab Minar, the Prince and Princess going out after breakfast and visiting first Humayun's tomb, about five miles out of Delhi. Their Royal Highnesses lunch at the Kutab, and return this evening by Safdar Jang's tomb. The excursion is being made by motor car, the entire round covering a distance of close upon thirty miles.

Indian Daily Telegraph (December 13th).—The drive of the Prince and Princess over the Ridge this afternoon was in the nature of a private visit to the scene. The course of the fighting there forty-eight years ago was explained, the position of the artillery being marked out in order to make the military situation clear.

The reception of the provincial Durbaris after the State banquet to-night was held in a shamiana in the grounds of the Circuit House. It was attended by a number of European officers and civilians, and was an interesting and brilliant function. The gathering included the Raja of Simru, the Sardar of Khalsia and the Nawabs of Patandi, Loharu and Dujana. It was 9.45 when the Prince arrived accompanied by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and passed through the tent to the dais preceded by the Staffs of His Royal Highness and His Honour. The presentation of the Durbaris was made by Mr. A. H. Diack, Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, and each Durbari tendered a nazar of one gold mohur, which was touched and remitted. Homage having been done, the Prince mingled with the gathering conversing with a number of those present, shortly afterwards departing in State.

Madras Mail.—To-day was spent by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in visiting those tremendous monuments of past greatness, with which the environs of Delhi teem. After breakfast, they motored through the Delhi Gate, past the ruins of Old Delhi to Humayun's Tomb. Thence to the Kutab Minar, where lunch was served, and after lunch, to the tomb of Safdar Jung and back to the Circuit House in the cool of the evening. With the wisdom that has characterised all the arrangements in Delhi, the excursion was quite private, Their Royal Highnesses being accompanied only by the smallest of Staffs and by those who, well versed in the history of the Imperial City, could acquaint them with the significance of the monuments they visited.

Not since they arrived in India have the Prince and Princess passed in a few hours through scenes so amazingly rich in historical associations, nor will they behold their like again in the course of their long tour. From the summit of the graceful minarets of the Jumna Masjid, the eye looks down upon a panorama which cannot be paralleled outside Imperial Rome. In the distance are just discernible the perfect proportions of the Kutab Minar, which dwarf the insignificant iron pillar set up by the Aryan monarchs who founded the kingdom of Endra Prastha on land torn from the aboriginal peoples. Deeply graven in Sanskrit characters on the metal column is the proud boast of the Hindu monarchs:—"As long as I stand so long shall the Hindu kingdom endure." The Kutab set up by Kutub-ud-din, the polestar of religion, the first of the Mohamedan invaders, is the Moslem's proud retort. Between the Masjid and the Tower lies that amazing tangle of ruins, fort and temple, wall and mosque, which rose and fell as invasion succeeded invasion, draining the land of its substance until Baber, placing his foot in the stirrup of recollection and his hands on the reins of confidence in God, marched against the hosts of Hindustan to found the Mogul Empire.

And at the foot, Modern Delhi, the city Shah Jehan created, enriching it with the noble Fort enclosing the Diwan-i-am and Diwan-i-khas and the Masjid, the grandest of Mahomedan fairs, from whose slender minarets the call to prayer still goes forth crowding the courtyard with white-robed figures bent in devotion; the Delhi, which like a vampire sucked the life-blood from the older cities to its own nurture; the Delhi, which witnessed the first agonies of the Mutiny, the heroism of the small band of brave men who courted it, bringing down the last frail remnants of Moghul Sovereignty in its collapse; and the Delhi, too, revealed in the expanse of flat-roofed houses, the streets pulsating with life, and the smoke of a dozen chimneys, which is bursting into new life. For, is not this the greatest wonder of all, that, through sack and storm, the loss of the Court favour which was once the breath of its life, the rise of great cities and seats of Government elsewhere, Modern Delhi is, by sheer virtue of its incomparable position, growing in a potent commercial and industrial capital? Whilst other cities, like Amritsar and Cawnpore, may increase with it, nothing can rob Delhi of its birthright as the Mother City of Northern India.

Through scenes vibrating with these recollections, Their Royal Highnesses drove through the Delhi Gate over the shady road strewn with the relics of a mighty past to Humayun's Tomb. They paused on the way to note, one of two stone pillars of Asoka—the Purana Kila—with its lofty South Gate, the Mosque of Sheer Shah and the Sher Mandal. Humayun's Tomb itself crystallised two of the greatest names in Indian history. For Humayun was so beloved of his father Baber that he cheerfully offered his life for that of his son. When Humayun was apparently sick unto death, the stern old warrior king three times walked round the dying prince—a solemnity similar to that used in sacrifices—and prayed God to accept him as a substitute. The tomb was erected by Humayun's son Akbar, the greatest of Moghul Sovereigns, and, in the simplicity and chasteness of its design, typifies the highest qualities of Mahomedan Art. An octagonal mass of white marble and soft, red sandstone, rising from a lofty platform crowned with a perfect Persian dome and cunningly varied with cupolas, it is a monument entirely worthy of the builder. Through all these ages, it has preserved an amazing freshness. The walled enclosure is in spotless order, the paths smooth the shallow ponds, of the fashion of the Taj Mahal, filled with water, and the trim hedges a vivid green. Save for the erosion of the stone here and there, it might be the creation of a few years since, instead of the heritage of centuries. Here was enacted the final scene in the tragedy of the decline of the Moghul Empire, when the frail old monarch, called from his obscurity by the arrival of the mutineers from Meerut, delivered his sword to the strenuous Hodson and went forth to die in exile in Burmah.

From the tomb, Their Royal Highnesses passed to the shrine of Sheikh Nizam-ud-din Aulia, one of the places of Mahomedan reverence in India, and were much interested in seeing men and boys dive into the tank which goes by the name of the "Heart-alluring Spring."

Her Royal Highness specially admired the tomb of Jahanara Begum, the daughter of Shah Jehan, who shared his captivity and had grass planted over her tomb with the inscription. "Let green grass only conceal my grave. Grass is the best covering of the grave of the meek."

From the tomb, a broad shady well-metalled road led to the Kutab Minar, where lunch was served in the little bungalow, which is hallmarked with the utilitarian ugliness of the Public Works Department. We have done much to beautify Indian scenery by the avenues of stately arborescence which shade the principal roads, much to disfigure it by the utter tastelessness of most of our Government buildings. On judgment, to which side will the balance incline. The wonderful freshness which distinguishes Humayun's Tomb is even more marked in the Kutab Minar. The mosque which once stood at its foot is now a mere heap of ruins, through which can with difficulty be traced the outlines of the buildings which in their prime had no equal for beauty or extent. But the Kutab—that exquisite shaft of sandstone, red and purple and orange, rising nearly two hundred and fifty feet into the clear blue Indian sky—is as beautiful as on the day of its completion more than six centuries ago. Its impressiveness, coming from perfection of proportion and grace of outline, will endure as long as it weathers the earthquake shocks which more than once have shaken its very foundations. Their Royal Highnesses climbed the 397 steps to the top of the Tower and thence enjoyed a superb view of the country.

The Kutab Minar illustrates the beginning of the Moslem Architecture which has enriched India with so many priceless monuments; Humayun's Tomb, that art in its simplest and most dignified form; the tomb of Safdar Jung, "The Piercer of Battle," marks its decline. For here Their Royal Highnesses saw the same spacious courtyard laid out with shallow ponds now quite dry, the same smooth walks and the same fashion of plinth, and dome and minaret. But the grace and simplicity of Humayun's Tomb have departed, the minarets are spoiled by over-elaboration, the crispness and patient labour of the earlier workers have gone. By way of compensation the last part of the excursion was made in the full glory of the declining day, when all things in India are beautiful and when, against the splendid amber and emerald of these winter skies, the noble creations of the Moslem builders are revealed in their full perfection. Truly, the only time to see the Imperial City is when the sun has passed the meridian and the land is wrapped in the subtle softness which fore-shadows the decline of day.

In ordinary circumstances, such a motor journey as Their Royal Highnesses made to-day would not be without its serious drawbacks, for the road to the Kutab has anything but a good reputation. But it was thoroughly repaired, the rough places made smooth and the worst sections remade. As a consequence the surface was like a racing track and the motoring ideal. Not a flaw marred the indefectibility of the day.

As a memento of his visit to the Jumma Masjid, His Royal Highness has given a present of Rs. 1,500 to the institution.

Military Mail.—The most striking feature of the Royal Tour so far has been the want of emotion on the part of the native population.

You at home are used to hearing the cheers of the populace heartily given, as some Royal visitor passes.

Not so with the inhabitant of India, and instead of hearty cheers the faint resemblance of one is all I have heard. Stolid and stern the natives greet their Sovereign's representative, and yet one cannot help noticing that after all enthusiasm abounds, but is shown in a different way.

When I learned the morning after the great night of the illuminations that the beautiful officers of the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway were on fire, I hastened to the scene, expecting great crowds to block my way. This was my object lesson. Here was one of India's stately buildings a dozen or more fire engines playing on the building, and no one worth speaking of in this great city rushing to see it. I was astonished, and a few enquiries from long residents soon put me right, when it was explained that to the native he looked upon this as a "will of God" business, and went about his usual daily avocations as if nothing was happening. As a matter of fact, when the messengers and Sepoys of the officer arrived and found the place on fire, they simply retired to the greensward and promptly went to sleep.

To those unaccustomed to India this may be interesting. When you read it in your papers that the Royal party were received with great cheering, you can take it from me it was a tame affair to what would happen when a Royal visitor visited your shores. Yet the reception, with its graveness, is just as sincere to Eastern eyes.

What a feasting the Royal party have had of ceremonial functions in Bombay! I was rather inclined to think the Prince of Wales looked tired towards the finish. Certain events in the programme were dropped, but whether it was the trying temperature of Bombay, or other reasons, I cannot say. I know this Bombay weather was on its worst behaviour during their stay. Dull and hot, just that nasty sort of heat, with plenty of dampness, making everything depressing. Sunday, of course, was a quiet day, and in the evening Divine service was attended by the Royal party at the Cathedral, the edifice being crowded with Europeans and Christian natives. Monday morning, November 13th, was given up to returning the visits of the Native Chiefs, and at 4-30 p.m. the Prince of Wales laid the foundation stone of the new dock.

Just a word of praise for the smart guard-of-honour provided by the Railway Volunteers. They certainly did credit to themselves. There was no confusion, and the coolness displayed was certainly a pattern to some of the other guards-of-honour I have seen since I arrived in India. Tuesday, the 14th, was occupied interviewing and receiving minor Chiefs, but the drive through the children's fête to the landing stage, and by steam launch to Elephanta Caves, as well as the drive through the City to view the illuminations, was cancelled. Certainly the crowded state of the streets would have hindered the Royal progress, but what I do hope is I trust their Royal Highnesses saw the illuminations as well as I saw them from the roof of Watson's Hotel, one of the highest buildings in Bombay. The illuminations in London for the Diamond Jubilee, the Coronation, and other big festivals, were not in the same street as they were.

Pioneer.—Formal visits to the Prince of Wales were paid this morning by the Raja of Sirmoor, the Sardar of Kalsia and the Nawabs of Pataudi and Dujana. Each Chief was accompanied by a small escort and was received at the Circuit House in the customary way. At noon the Prince, escorted by a squadron of the 31st Lancers, paid a return visit to the Raja of Sirmoor, who is occupying a house not far from the Flagstaff Tower and who had a guard-of-honour to receive His Royal Highness. In the afternoon the prince and Princess, unaccompanied by an escort, drove along the Ridge, visiting the Flagstaff Tower, Hindu Rao's House and the Mutiny Monument. They afterwards proceeded to the Mori bastion, the old Magazine, the Church and through the Kashmir Gate to the cemetery where they visited Nicholson's tomb. They also saw the site of the great camp formed here during the Coronation Durbar, but where there was then a multitude of tents there is nothing now but a bare plain with trees in the background. Near at hand the new lines for the 18th Tiwana Lancers are being built, while on the Ridge itself parties of workmen are quarrying stone. The Flagstaff Tower, Hindu Rao's House, the Observatory and other posts which have a history attached to them since 1857, stand solitary on the Ridge, and so thickly wooded now is the country between them and the walls of the city that one has difficulty in marking down the breaching batteries and the advanced positions occupied by the five columns when they were drawn up for the assault. Still a good idea can be obtained of the position as a whole and of the tremendous difficulties that had to be overcome both in holding the Ridge and eventually in storming Delhi.

After the drive along the Ridge the Royal party proceeded down into cantonments without an escort and saw various places of interest there, going quietly about in their carriage and alighting from time to time. These were absolutely informal visits.

During their visit to the Fort yesterday the Prince and Princess saw not only the beautiful Dewan-i-Khas, the Dewan-i-Am and other of the old Moghal buildings but noted the excavations that have been made under Lord Curzon's orders with a view to restoring and beautifying some of the structures that have been so long neglected. The restoration of the mosaic work has been begun, but it will take three or four years to carry out the plan of renovation laid down. The Dewan-i-Khas needs the least work upon it, as many of its rooms are intact with all their wealth of marble carving and elaborate ornamentation, but elsewhere the labour of the Florentine workmen brought out specially by the late Viceroy, will have to be long continued. The throne in the Dewan-i-Am is at present railed off as the panels in the rear of it are being restored. It is understood that certain of the British barracks will be dismantled so that the grounds may be laid out as gardens and the tanks and water channels be reproduced in their original form. Some old buildings which were devoted to common place purposes in connection with the garrisoning of the Fort will be cleared of the excrescences that hide their true architectural features and their interiors will be restored. The damage done by the earthquake of last April will also be repaired and generally the palaces, pavilions and halls will in the end be made as perfect as circumstances will permit. Delhi Fort and the historical buildings within it will, like the Taj and Fatehpur Sikri, benefit by Lord Curzon's generous policy.

This evening a reception of provincial durbars of the Delhi Division took place in a large shamiana pitched in the Circuit House grounds. Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, General and Mrs. Henry and a number of other ladies and gentlemen were present. The 28th Punjabis provided a guard-of-honour. The Prince, accompanied by the Lieutenant-Governor, arrived shortly before 10 o'clock and took his seat on the dais, the Raja of Sirmoor and the three other minor Chiefs being ranged to the right and left. After the durbars had presented their nazars the Native officers of the 31st Lancers, 28th Punjabis and of the detachment of the 18th Tiwana Lancers had the honour of presentation through General Henry. The Prince and Princess then joined the company and various other presentations were made. The reception lasted about an hour.

The Government of Madras have declared Wednesday, the 24th January, to be a public holiday throughout the Madras Presidency in honour of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

H.M.S. Renown is expected here shortly on her way to Calcutta, where Their Royal Highnesses will embark on her for Rangoon. During her visit to Madras she will rehearse the manœuvre of entering the harbour and taking up her anchorage at the moorage to be assigned to her at the end of January on her arrival with the Royal visitors from Rangoon.

The Naval Commander-in-Chief is due here (Calcutta) in the flagship Hyacinth on Monday next. The Hyacinth will probably not be in port until early in February.

Black and White.—Last week the Prince and Princess of Wales marked their visit to the North-West Provinces by attending a grand review of the Indian Army, in which no less than 55,000 troops took part. Lord Kitchener was able to show the Prince the war divisions at full strength as they would take the field under his scheme of reorganisation. This formation on parade is quite new, but it is reputed to have been extremely effective and most successful. His Royal Highness afterwards visited all the camps, and made a point of meeting the native officers. The favourable impression created in his mind by the spectacle afforded to him has found expression in a letter to Lord Kitchener in which His Royal Highness declares that his three days spent in the camp of the manœuvres have convinced him of the physical fitness and high standard of training of the troops, and of the efficiency of the Army for active work in the field. At this moment, by the way, an interesting suggestion has been made in the Indian Press—namely, that the Viceroyalty should be in future held by a Royal Prince and that the present quinquennial political appointment should be converted into a Premiership, with a Cabinet consisting of the present Viceroyal Council. The suggestion is novel, but it is not unattractive, and it would have the merit of disposing of some of the difficulties in Indian government which recent experience has revealed.

Daily Telegraph.—It was well enough said the other day that nothing, however important, in the internal administration of India could ever hope to rival in interest the frontier questions, symbolised by the golden roofs of Lhasa or the grim defiles of the Khyber. It is all the less accountable, therefore, that there hardly exists for anyone who has not actually visited the spot any very clear idea of the famous cleft in the Himalayas through which a thin trickle of merchandise ebbs and flows between India and the North, and on which so many years of hard military work and close political thought have been concentrated. India—the remark is a platitude—so far as the passage of large bodies of troops is concerned, is an island except for this scanty line of communication, and upon the safe keeping of the Khyber the whole Indian military strategy of fifty years has been pivoted. It is worth while to get some clearer idea of this famous pass. For 1,500 miles, from its source on the right bank of the Hugli, thirty miles north of Calcutta, the Grand Trunk Road unfolds its thin, shadow-flecked ribbon of white metal across the heart of India, by Gaya, Benares, Delhi, Amritsar, and Lahore, on to the gates of far-distant Peshawar. And through the pass itself it is but the Grand Trunk Road that has been carried on yet another stage. The Khyber witnesses the extinction of the most historic highway of the East, a hundred yards beyond the fort of Landi Kotal, and it is worthy of its reputation up to the last rod of it.

Out from Peshawar one goes along the hard, grey, enamelled track, past the gardens and trees of the cantonment, which appears to be peaceful, even beyond the ordinary stagnation of these deceptive enclaves of military control. Nothing could prepare one less for what is to come than the luxurious growth of closegrown tolly, umbrageous banyan, and dusty, spined casuarina overhanging the low white washed walls that divide the compounds and the coarsely-grassed lawns from the roadway. Every now and then the square low walls of a barrack can be seen through the trees, and at last the examining station is passed close besides the police lines on the south side of the road. It is neither of interest nor importance in itself, but close on the post the scene changes with a suddenness that is unmistakable. Man has combined with nature to put a sudden end here to the greenery and the groves of polyglot Peshawar. Man demanded a clear glacis of a mile for his riflemen, uncovered, flat and from end to end commanded and swept by those innocent looking, khaki-tinted mud-walls, and even before the farthest edge of this mile was reached nature had given up its brave struggle with the increasing aridity and the uncompromising stoniness of the last up-wash of India against the Himalayan barrier. Henceforth it is a rocky and treeless waste. The road still strikes westwards, level, straight, and smooth. On either side the coarse sand of the plain stretches away, rarely furrowed here and there by dry watercourses, nourishing here and there an even rarer patch of tilth. It is used as a divisional parade ground, though, for the moment, it lies out as empty as the sea.

To right and left the mountain spurs have by now thrust themselves forward to meet one on either side, but the gullet of the Khyber for some six or seven miles yet is not reached, so deeply into the hills does this tongue of Indian sand penetrate. To right and left the long promontories of grey gault, advance spies of their gigantic brethren, clad only with spotted bushes of stunted wild olive, mount upwards towards the steeper walls of gneiss behind, and in the middle of this deep recess stands up Jamrud, yellow in the sun, a fine, upstanding fort of mud and stone, embattled and bastioned like the fortress of a fairy tale, and perhaps almost as useless against modern weapons. Just as the flag on the keep's summit can be distinguished, India stops beneath one's feet. Here is the frontier; beyond is no man's land—ours, indeed by the right of the nine points of the law, and by the necessity of the case, but part of India it is not. The turmoils and the administrative problems, the constitutional rights and duties, the dust and thrust of our Imperial altruism fall behind, three miles short of Jamrud, and we come out farther to face the elemental facts of life, national or not. Here self-preservation is the only law that sanctions, and the game is played with vigour, and with something of the law of the jungle besides. Jamrud and the Khyber do not exist for the delectation of idle men. It is true that on occasions when it may be convenient, when, that is, the pass is guarded, and its peaceful transit guaranteed for some other purpose than that of curiosity, such a reason as the passage of the bi-weekly caravan from Kabul, then, and only then, may the idler have leave to drive out to see the entering in of the famous defile. He will enjoy it the more because of his fearful and delightful belief that he takes his life in his hand, and that behind each rock may lurk the jezail and ruffian of his long expectation. As a matter of fact, he will but be rudely treated by camels and will suffer much dust; his life will be safer far in the pass than when in a hired fly he went yesterday down into Peshawar bazaar from the hotel to buy a handful of turquoises or a Penjeh rug from a fat Parsee merchant lolling over his accounts.

From Jamrud the road still runs on the flat across a wide, torrent-seamed bed of rock and sand, up to the very tip of the tongue of land. Here the ascent begins between rough boulder-strewn slopes; these soon give way to steep acclivities and shoulders of bare rock, round which the road sweeps and recurs in an easy and even ascending gradient. The Shadibag-iari blockhouse commands the entrance to the pass, and Fort Maude follows soon, just where the old plastered bridge between the wild mulberry and the tolly tree imports a breath of greenery and civilisation into the rocky wilderness between the bare blasted-out road at one's feet, and the forbidding grassless skyline far overhead. Still ascending, the road skirts Shahgai and the little cultivation plots of Lala-china a mile or two before the tiny highperched group of blockhouses known as Ali Masjid. The name is taken from a blindingly whitewashed little shrine which marks a grave in a little plot a few feet above the little stream. The Khyber rivulet flashes by, muttering between its pebbles, and sadly dwindled by the irrigation canal that runs sedately beside it, closely hugging the contours of the rock. On the opposite side rises the sharp conical promontory or group of promontories which guards the gorge itself. For here—and here alone, throughout the pass's length till Landi Kotal is reached—there is a steep rock-bound defile, out of which the road is out on the north-eastern side, and by which all further view of the Khyber is entirely cut off. This sense of privacy is emphasised by the road sentences a hundred yards further on. No one, except those who are accompanied by a "Khyber Rifle" as an escort, is allowed to pass this barrier, and the escort is only granted for special reasons. Bribery, blarney, or bluff, all are useless here, and it is as well that you should not try to steal through. Neither English nor Hindustani do the warders understand, but their orders they most entirely do, and a German who tried to force his way through, the other day, was significantly congratulated on the failure of his attempt. For here is business, real business—short shrifts are given, and few excuses are accepted.

The blockhouses of the Khyber are models of their kind, and the very sight of their shrewdly-pierced loopholes, their machicoulis galleries, and their fist-floor entrances and hanging ladders, will impress you long before you notice that at your elbow, on the rock beside you, is a careless splash of whitewash—500 yards range this one, and across the valley is a deftly-placed series from 300 to 1,000—a splash which one day it will be sheer suicide to approach. Still climbing, the road now follows the course of the tinkling stream, now strikes across the bottom of a tiny flat pan of ploughland, just where, beside the road, illshapen masses of wood are being weighed. They have been brought in by women from the hills, and to-morrow will have started down to Peshawar, which takes every stick of firewood that the pass can provide. From one point of view, this stripping of the pass has its advantages—for even as late as forty years ago the hillsides were thickly-wooded enough to afford considerable cover—but the loss of the vegetation affects, and is in turns affected by, the rainfall, to an extent which is annually becoming more and more unmistakable. Gnarled and stunted wild olives, two or three species of thorn, rarely a rowan tree, still more rarely upon the higher slopes to the north, a small oak which is known locally as a toturra—these make up the robust vegetation of the valley. Major Roos Keppel, the presiding deity of the pass, has urgently recommended the reduction of coal freights to Peshawar in order to minimise this continual drain upon the fuel of the Khyber, but so far without success.

At Katakushta we pass from the territory of the Malik-dins to that of the Wali Khels, and we enter the Khyber proper. This name is given by the Khels to a comparatively small and insignificant part of the pass. A Kuki Khel from Shadibagiari and a Zakka Khel from Landi Kotal will speak alike of making a journey to the Khyber; Ali Masjid itself is regarded as being outside the limits, and the adoption of the name by ourselves for the entire pass is due chiefly, of course, to the convenience of having some inclusive name, partly also to the fact that in this part of the gorge, near Zin-tarra, there is the only remarkable monument of the entire length. This is a large and originally a well-built Buddhist tope. A tope is a plain structure dating in almost every case from a comparatively early period—being, of course, anterior in date to the expulsion of the Buddhists from India in the seventh and eighth centuries—consisting of a platform surmounted by a plain dome. Much of the exterior casing of the Zintarra tope has been pulled down for building material, but it preserves its shape, and in one less accessible part it still keeps its closely-fitted exterior masonry. The dome must originally have been about as large as that of the Invalides, and the square platform below projects well beyond the drum. Beyond the tope and the twin villages of the Sultan Khels and the Niklei Khels, the road lifts to the watershed plateau, where the long low blank walls of Landi Kotal command a hundred acres of fairly level ground.

Landi Kotal is not built for beauty, but inside its fortifications is a pleasant little garden, where there is a well over-run with purple convolvulus and zinnias, and rambling roses prepare one for the few stout shafts of English hollyhock which bloom sturdily enough in this Ultima Thule of Britain. Nor is this all that reminds one of home. Inside the mess of the Khyber Rifles, there, on the wall in front of you, is a series of "Spy's" portraits and—an engraving of the "Beata Beatrix"! Yet one is really in the uttermost of all outposts, so far, at least, as the English officers are concerned; but one can still walk three or four miles on, beyond the friendly levels of the Grand Trunk Road, over a rough camel "track" and cart road, to a lonely post called Mishnai Khandao, perched on the edge of a precipitous rock. From here, Pisgah-like, you may dangle your legs over, and look down over the interlocking spurs of the pass to the flat brown plain and the white minarets of an Afghan tomb beside the Kabul river.

In the sunset we went back to Landi Kotal, passing through the large walled compound, where the Kafila or Kabul caravan was resting for the night. Great shaggy-throated and black-headed camels, half as tall again as those of India, loomed out of the obscurity and tiny groups of incurious women and lazy men gathered round the gipsy fires, at which the evening meal was being cooked. Half-round each party lay a rampart of the heavy corded bundles they were bringing into India. Outside the wall of the compound one could see a dozen heads rise and fall together in outline against the darkening sky as the last prayer of the day was said and the last prostration made to the red vest that curtained distant Mecca. Almost in the dark we went back past the three water-tanks, stumbling up against a placid Shinwari, who, for an expected gain of a few pice, was trudging along to distant Peshawar beside his pony, laden with dirty snow from the winter pits of Mallagori.

Englishman.—The recollection of the visit to Delhi will surely live in the memories of Their Royal Highnesses as one of the most pleasant and fruitful in their tour. Both the Prince and Princess of Wales are ardent sightseers in the best sense of the term. They have a knowledge of the great events of Indian history which would put many old residents in the country to the blush and an insatiable desire to learn everything India can teach them. In Delhi they have had spread before them the richest store of historical relics that exists outside the ancient capital of the Roman Empire and they were diligent searchers amongst its treasures. They have visited all the scenes in the epic siege of Delhi, the Ridge with its precious associations, the sites of the batteries which prepared the way for that most audacious assault, the breaches and gates through which the tiny columns advanced against the overwhelming numbers of the mutineers, the spot where John Nicholson, the Tartan of the mutiny heroes, fell, and the modest monument which covers his remains.

They have seen those noble monuments of the splendour of the Mughul Court, the fort with Dewan-I-Amud Dewan-I-Khan and the noblest of them all the Juma Masjid. They have seen those towering memorials of the old Delhi's which make the road to the Kutab Minar the Appennine way of the east, and which in their decay are eloquent tributes to the magnificence and creative taste of the Mahomedan sovereigns.

All this they have done under ideal conditions without fuss or ceremony, but with just the expert assistance of those knowing their Delhi and loving its grandeur. The weather has been at its best, unusually bright and mild for this season of the year, whilst not until to-day was there a taste of those high winds and clouds of biting dust, which occasionally make life in Northern India a burden. With all these activities Their Royal Highnesses have not been unmindful of their Royal and social obligations. They have met the Chiefs of the Delhi division in formal visit, in reception durbar and to-day at Lady Rivaz's garden party, and they have also met all actively engaged in work in Delhi in whatsoever capacity. Moreover, the arrangements for the visit were admirably planned and admirably executed and no praise is too high for those who made them.

To-day, the last day of Their Royal Highnesses' stay in Delhi was spent in the quiet profitable fashion that has characterised the whole of the visit. This morning the Prince rode and Her Royal Highness motored to the amphitheatre, where His Majesty the King-Emperor was proclaimed at the great durbar. There, with the informed guidance of Mr. Gordon Walker, the Commissioner of the Delhi Division, they were able to reconstruct the principal features of that historic pageant. In the afternoon Lady Rivaz was "At Home" at a charming garden party in the grounds of the Circuit House.

There all Delhi, with the Chiefs who are now staying here in order to pay their duty, was present and Their Royal Highnesses entered into close conversation with many of the guests. Leaving the Circuit House, at half past nine o'clock they drove through roads and streets brilliantly illuminated to the station, whence they departed for Agra.

Graphic.—There can be no doubt as to the success, from every point of view, of the tour of the Prince and Princess of Wales in India. Everywhere there is the same enthusiasm shown in the greeting extended to them. Their Royal Highnesses have lately visited Lahore, where the Prince reviewed a force of Imperial Service troops numbering about 3,000. From Lahore they proceeded to Peshawar, where a great durbar was held. This durbar was in striking contrast to all the previous durbars of the tour, since there was an entire absence of Oriental pomp and decorative display. Perhaps the most striking incident of the tour was a visit to the Khyber Pass, if we bear in mind what was the condition of that region not many years ago. Nowhere in the British Empire can be found a parallel to the Khyber Pass, where British laws are not enforced and tribes are allowed to govern themselves according to their tribal customs, the only requirement of the Government of India being that they shall recognise and help to maintain the sanctity of the Pax Britannica. Their Royal Highnesses, who found the Pass manned by tribal troops, travelled through it to Landi Kotal, which overlooks the Afghan border. Leaving Peshawar, the Prince and Princess journeyed to Lord Kitchener's camp at Serai Kala to attend the manœuvres there. At Rawal Pindi the Prince received the Tashi Lama, the head of the Buddhist Church, and on another day witnessed a review of 53,000 troops. Continuing their tour Their Royal Highnesses reached Satwari on Saturday, where they were welcomed by Sir Pertab Singh, by whom they were splendidly entertained. Amritsar, the sacred city of the Sikhs, was reached on Monday. Here there were the largest crowd seen since the Royal travellers left Bombay. From Amritsar, the route took them to Delhi, which was visited on Tuesday. Here again a magnificent reception was accorded them.

Illustrated London News.—Lord Kitchener has exhibited his Indian Army to the Prince of Wales. On December 5th His Royal Highness arrived at the Commander-in-Chief's camp at Serai Kala, where 100,000 troops were in the field. The force was divided into two armies, the Northern and the Southern, and when the Prince came on the scene war was supposed to have broken out, and His Royal Highness saw the advanced cavalry detachments come into contact. The general idea of the manoeuvres was that the Northern Army was invading India, and had crossed the Indus on the morning of the 4th, finding the Southern Army mobilised and ready. The object of the invading force was to capture Rawal Pindi before the arrival of Southern reinforcements. General Sir A. Hunter commanded the Northern Army, and General Sir A. Gaselee the Southern. During the second day the Northern Division gradually drove the defenders back upon Rawal Pindi. The Prince followed the operations on horseback all day. Between the 6th and the 7th there was a night attack, and the manoeuvres ended on the latter day with the defeat of the invader. On the 8th there was a great review of all arms, and in an Army Order, issued the same evening, was published a personal letter from the Prince to Lord Kitchener complimenting the Commander-in-Chief upon the efficiency of the Indian Army. On the 11th the Prince and Princess arrived at Amritsar, the sacred city of the Sikhs, where they visited the Golden Temple and were greeted by larger crowds than any they had seen since they had left Bombay. On the evening of the 11th they continued their journey to Delhi. The welcome at Delhi on December 12th was most enthusiastic. In the Chandni Chauk the municipal addresses were presented before an immense crowd of spectators, and the continuous roar of acclamation from the people made the Prince's reply all but inaudible. In the afternoon of the day of their arrival, the Prince and Princess visited the Jumma Masjid, the largest Mahomedan mosque in the world, and the fort and palace of the Mogul Emperors. Replying to the address of welcome, the Prince said that it was in the power of the citizens to maintain the great position of Delhi in the Indian Empire.

Indian Daily News.—The stay of Their Royal Highnesses in Delhi has given opportunity for a much needed rest. The motor trip to the Kutab yesterday, with the views of the site of ancient cities, was probably the most enjoyable experience which the Prince and Princess have had since leaving Bikaner, not excepting the historic and highly interesting drive through the Khyber.

Their Royal Highnesses go out on a shopping expedition visiting a number of the Delhi jewellery and art and crafts establishments. A garden party is being held in the grounds of the Circuit House this afternoon, Lady Rivaz being "at home." The Royal train leaves Delhi during the night for Agra. Delhi will be illuminated to-night, and a display of fireworks will take place. The Prince has been pleased to give a present of Rs. 1,500 to the Jumma Masjid as a memento of his visit to the mosque on Wednesday.

The garden party in the grounds of the Circuit House was an interesting and agreeable function. There was a numerous gathering, the assembly including the Raja of Sirmur, the Sardar of Kalsia, the Nawab of Patandi, the Nawab of Loharu, and the Nawab of Dujana. An unpleasantly chilly wind blew during the afternoon, but in other respects the occasion was an enjoyable one. A number of people were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, who stayed for over an hour and as usual, impressed everybody in the most charming manner. The band of the 28th Punjabis was in attendance, and the same regiment furnished a guard-of-honour. At sundown the city was brilliantly illuminated, the small earthenware chirags and Chinese lanterns in the trees being utilised with admirable effect. Simultaneously the display of fireworks began on the maidan in front of the Jumma Masjid, and was witnessed by great crowds of people.

Their Royal Highnesses drove to the station and took train for Agra after dinner, the station being very beautifully illuminated.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The writer of the letter signed "Christmas Day" in Friday's issue of our Allahabad contemporary must surely be a very singular individual. Commenting on the fact that 80 of the Lucknow Martiniere boys are to form part of the guard-of-honour on the arrival of the Prince of Wales, he can "see no reason why parents should be deprived of the company of their sons at the family gathering on Christmas," and questions whether "boys would, of their own free will and choice, stay away from home at such a time when every family, however poor, try to muster on that day. The writer's grammar and construction are nearly as weak as his loyalty and his sense of what would most appeal to the average British school-boy. There are glorious traditions attached to the Martiniere in the record of its boys who gallantly bore their part in the active defence of the Residency in 1857, and we can see no reason why the present day Martiniere boy should be thought to be of poorer spirit than his predecessor,—nor need it be supposed that his parents are, either. "Christmas Day" must be an isolated specimen, a sort of "freak."

The facts are as follows: At a parade of the Martiniere companies the boys were asked for 80 volunteers to represent the "Martiniere Bailey Guard" in the Prince of Wales' Escort. About 100 promptly volunteered. We may rest assured that Mr. Sykes, the Principal of the Martiniere, would neither wish for nor allow any boy who was unwilling—or whose parents were unwilling—to join the detachment for the escort. "Christmas Day," instead of writing to the papers, need only have written to Mr. Sykes, to ensure his "young hopeful" spending the day in the bosom of his family. There are plenty to take his place who will appreciate the honour of taking an active part in the welcome to the Heir-Apparent to the British Crown and Empire. There are many Christmas days in an ordinary life-time; but the honour of being a member of the escort to Their Royal Highnesses,—of upholding the glorious traditions of the old school—will be something for the boys to look back on and remember with pride all their days. The school will break up on the usual date, the 21st instant, and the majority of the 250 boys go home as usual for the usual Christmas vacation. Of the 80 volunteers for escort duty, some live in Lucknow, some in Cawnpore, Fyzabad, and other adjacent places whence they can run in a few hours and at little expense,—which expense will of course not fall on the parents. A certain number of boys always stay in the school throughout the Christmas holidays, during which of course there are no lessons or tasks, so it simply means that a certain number of boys will run in from their homes for a day or two, to share in the honour bestowed on the school corps, while a certain number of boys, who would have left for home on the 21st, remain on till over the 26th.

To-day is being given up by Their Royal Highnesses to a visit to the Kutab Minar, the Prince and Princess going out after breakfast and visiting first Humayun's tomb about five miles out of Delhi. Their Royal Highnesses lunch at the Kutab, and return this evening by Safdar Jang's tomb. The excursion is being made by motor car, the entire round covering a distance of close upon thirty miles.

Madras Mail.—Delhi, 14th December.—To-day was spent by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in visiting those tremendous monuments of past greatness for which the environs of Delhi are famous. After breakfast, the Prince and Princess motored through the Delhi Gate, past the ruins of Old Delhi to Humayun's Tomb. Thence to the Kutb Minar, where lunch was served, and, after lunch, to the tomb of Safdar Jung and back to the Circuit House in the cool of the evening. With the foresight that has characterised all the arrangements in Delhi, the excursion was quite private, Their Royal Highnesses being accompanied only by the smallest of Staffs and by those who, well-versed in the history of the Imperial city, could accompany them with the significance of the monuments they visited.

Not since they arrived in India have the Prince and Princess passed in a few hours through scenes so amazingly rich in historical associations, nor will they behold their like again in the course of their long tour. From the summit of the graceful minarets of the Jumma Masjid the eye looks down upon a panorama which cannot be paralleled outside Imperial Rome. In the distance are just discernible the perfect proportions of the Kutb Minar, which dwarfs the insignificant iron pillar set up by the Aryan monarchs who founded the kingdom of Endra Prastha on land torn from the aboriginal peoples. Deeply graven in Sanskrit characters on the metal column is the proud boast of the Hindu monarchs:—"As long as I stand, so long shall the Hindu Kingdom endure." The Kutb, set up by Kutb-ud-din, the "Pole Star of Religion," the first of the Mahomedan invaders, is the Moslem's proud retort. Between the Masjid and the tower lies that amazing tangle of ruins, fort and temple, wall and mosque which rose and fell as invasion succeeded invasion, draining the land of its substance until Baber, placing his foot in the "stirrup of recollection" and his hands on the "reins of confidence in God," marched against the hosts of Hindustan to found the Mogul Empire.

And at the foot, modern Delhi, the city Shah Jehan created, enriching it with the noble fort enclosing the Diwan-i-Am and Diwan-i-Khas and the Masjid, the grandest of Mahomedan fanes, from whose slender minarets the call to prayer still goes forth, crowding the courtyard with white-robed figures bent in devotion; the Delhi which like a vampire sucked the life-blood from the older cities of its own nurture; the Delhi which witnessed the first agonies of the Mutiny, the heroism of the small band of brave men who courted it, bringing down the last frail remnants of Moghul sovereignty in its collapse; and the Delhi, too, revealed in the expanse of flat-roofed houses, the streets pulsating with life, and the smoke of a dozen chimneys, which is bursting into new life. For is not this the greatest wonder of all that, through sack and storm, the loss of the Court favour which was once the breath of its life, the rise of great cities and seats of Government elsewhere, modern Delhi is, by sheer virtue of its incomparable position, growing into a potent commercial and industrial capital? Whilst other cities, like Amritsar and Cawnpur may increase with it, nothing can rob Delhi of its birthright as the Mother City of Northern India.

Through scenes vibrating with these recollections, Their Royal Highnesses drove through the Delhi Gate over the shady road strewn with the relics of a mighty past to Humayun's Tomb. They paused on the way to note one of the two stone pillars of Asoka, the Purana Kila, with its lofty South Gate, the mosque of Sheer Shah, and the Sher Mandal. Humayun's Tomb itself crystallised two of the greatest names in Indian history.

For Humayun was so beloved of his father Baber that he cheerfully offered his life for that of his son. When Humayun was apparently sick unto death, the stern old warrior King three times walked round the dying Prince—a solemnity similar to that used in sacrifices—and prayed God to accept him as a substitute. The tomb was created by Humayun's son Akbar, the greatest of Moghul Sovereigns, and, in the simplicity and chasteness of its design, typifies the highest qualities of Mahomedan Art. An octagonal mass of white marble and soft, red sandstone, rising from a lofty platform crowned with a perfect Persian dome and cunningly varied with cupolas, it is a monument entirely worthy of the builder. Through all these ages it has preserved an amazing freshness. The walled enclosure is in spotless order, the paths smooth, the shallow ponds, of the fashion of the Taj Mahal, filled with water, and the trim hedges a vivid green. Save for the erosion of the stone here and there, it might be the creation of a few years since, instead of the heritage of centuries. Here was enacted the final scene in the tragedy of the decline of the Moghul Empire, when the frail old monarch, called from his obscurity by the arrival of the mutineers from Meerut, delivered his sword to the strenuous Hodson and went forth to die in exile in Burma.

From the tomb, Their Royal Highnesses passed to the shrine of Sheikh Nizam-ud-din Aulia, one of the places of Mahomedan reverence in India, and were much interested in seeing men and boys dive into the tank which goes by the name of the "Heart-alluring Spring."

Her Royal Highness especially admired the tomb of Jahanara Begum, the daughter of Shah Jehan, who shared his captivity and had grass planted over her tomb with the inscription:—"Let green grass only conceal my grave. Grass is the best covering of the grave of the meek."

From the tomb, a broad, shady, well-metalled road led to the Kutb Minar, where lunch was served in the little bungalow, which is hallmarked with the utilitarian ugliness of the Public Works Department. We have done much to beautify Indian scenery by the avenues of stately arborescence which shade the principal roads, much to disfigure it by the utter tastelessness of most of our Government buildings. On judgment, to which side will the balance incline? The wonderful freshness which distinguishes Humayun's Tomb is even more marked in the Kutb Minar. The mosque which once stood at its foot is now a mere heap of ruins, through which can, with difficulty, be traced the outlines of the buildings which in their prime had no equal for beauty or extent. But the Kutb—that exquisite shaft of sandstone, red and purple and orange, rising nearly 250 feet into the clear blue Indian sky—is as beautiful as on the day of its completion more than six centuries ago. Its impressiveness, coming from perfection of proportion and grace of outline, will endure as long as it weathers the earthquake shocks which more than once have shaken its foundations. Their Royal Highnesses climbed the 397 steps to the top of the tower and thence enjoyed a superb view of the country.

The Kutb Minar illustrates the beginning of the Moslem architecture which has enriched India with so many priceless monuments; Humayun's Tomb that art in its simplest and most defined form: the tomb of Safdar Jung, "The Piercer of Battle," marks its decline. For here Their Royal Highnesses saw the spacious courtyard laid out with shallow ponds now quite dry, same smooth walks and the same fashion of plinth, and dome and minaret. But the grace and simplicity of Humayun's Tomb have departed, the minarets are spoiled by over-elaborate the crispness and patient labour of the earlier workers have. By way of compensation, the last part of the excursion made in the full glory of the declining day, when all things in India are beautiful and when, against the splendid amethyst and emerald of these winter skies, the noble creations of art the Moslem builders are revealed in their full perfection. Truly, the only time to see the Imperial City is when the sun has passed the meridian and the land is wrapped in the subtle softness which foreshadows the decline of day.

In ordinary circumstances, such a motor journey as Their Royal Highnesses made to-day would not be without its serious drawbacks, for the road to the Kutb has anything but a good reputation. But it was thoroughly repaired, the rough places made smooth and the worst sections re-made. As a consequence, the surface was like a racing track and the motoring ideal. Not a flaw marred the pleasures of the day.

As a memento of his visit to the Jumma Masjid, His Royal Highness has given a present of Rs. 1,500 to the institution.

Pioneer.—With the departure of Their Royal Highnesses from Delhi yesterday the Royal Tour, so far as the Punjab is concerned, may be said to have come to an end, for the visit to Simla does not seem likely to come off, and Punjab territory will only be touched again in the course of the long journey to Quetta and Karachi. By visiting Lahore, Amritsar, and Delhi, the Royal Party may be said to have seen the three capitals of the Province—political, religious and commercial; and each in its own way had some unique spectacle to offer to the Prince and Princess. Lahore, as the Capital and resting place of Ranjit Singh, with its Jumma Masjid and its historic fort and the tombs of Jehangir and Nur Jahan close at hand; Amritsar, the Sikh Mecca, with its golden temple and Khalsa College; and Delhi, the former seat of the Moghul Empire, with its wealth of "ancient monuments", its haunting memories and wondrous bazaars must have a fascination for the sightseer, be he Royal tourist or humble globe-trotter. But it is not merely the relics of an ancient past that have been brought before the Royal vision. Their Royal Highnesses have seen something far more important—the "soldiers' land" of to-day and the people who give to India so many of her best troops. It is often insinuated now-a-days that the Punjab is not so frankly loyal as it was in the days when it helped the British Raj to crush the mutineers and fulfil the dream of the great Sikh Martyr, Tegh Bahadur. A vague suspicion of this kind is hard to remove, but there has certainly been nothing which could convey such an impression in the extremely hearty welcome Their Royal Highnesses have received throughout the tour in the Punjab. From the lowest dweller in the city to the highest Chief in the land, all would seem to have been animated with the one idea of showing honour to the King-Emperor's son, and if the roar of the people's welcome might have been moderated at times on the score of convenience, there would appear to have been no question as to its spontaneity. Conditions have undoubtedly changed since the Punjab was first incorporated into the British dominions. The Sikh in those days was still in a minority in the land over which he held sway; but there was no one to dispute his supremacy when the final decision rested with the sword. With the advent of British rule, he has been slowly but surely forced into the background, deprived of what he had come to regard as his place among the rulers of the country, and learnt the bitterness of relying solely on the strong arm of the Law with all the forces of a cunning commercialism arrayed against him. Had no reaction set in, had the Sikh been left to fight his own battle unaided in the unequal contest, steady deterioration must have inevitably ensued. But there were those among his own Chiefs, and one is proud to add, among Englishmen as well, who saw the necessity for averting such a calamity, and have done all in their power to check the flowing tide. The Khalsa College at Amritsar is one of the outward and visible signs of this Counter-reformation; it is the Sikh Aligarh, designed, like Syed Ahmed's institution, to equip a great community in the arts of peace and prevent it from being submerged in the struggle for political existence by other communities, estimable enough in their own way, but without the sterling qualities that have won for the Sikh and the Mahomedan the admiration of the world. The Khalsa College, it is true, is not all it might be yet—in the short space of twelve years one should not expect too much; but it represents a beginning which has already borne good fruit. It would be a bad day for England and India if the Sikh were to show symptoms of degeneration; but with these proofs of an educational awakening and with the presence of such noble figures as that of the venerable Raja of Nabha still amongst us we may hope that that day is not yet.

Pioneer.—During the Royal visit to the capital of Oudh would not the Government feel as indulgent towards the officers of Oudh Provincial Service, both executive and judicial, as on the occasion of the Delhi Durbar? The arrival of Their Royal Highnesses will be public and the reception a State function. It is sincerely hoped that Oudh officers will be allowed admission to the railway platform and thus to enjoy the honour of participation in the reception ceremony. It would not be out of place to ascertain amount toward own request, be permitted to attend foundation-stone ceremony. The minimum limit of the contribution and the latest time for application rendering contributors eligible for invitation should of course be left for determination to the Central Committee.

Pioneer.—In the course of the Royal visit to Delhi an Urdu Ode of Welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales was presented on behalf of the Mahomedan community. The ode was written by Moulvi Syed Ahmed, Dahlavi (author of the Urdu Dictionary known as the "Farang-e-Asafin"), and illuminated in gold, silver and colours by Mr. J. Morris. The poem, of which a translation is given below, was graciously accepted by Their Royal Highnesses.

1. You are the grandson
Of one, the height of whose glory none can rise to,
2. The blessings of God are raining,
On the place of her repose:
3. Her statue, that is in front of us,
Is a true portrait of her love.
4. You are the son of a father
Who is superior to all the kings,
5. One whose dominions, 'tis wonderful,
The sun sets not by day or by night.
6. He is anxious that peace may reign in all lands,
He is opposed for any to fight.
7. May your reign be similar to his,
Since the son bears the stamp of the father.
8. Whenever you visit any country,
King's kiss (or touch) your feet.
9. How is it possible that we be not devoted heart and soul to you,
Since your sacred feet have come here.
10. None more fortunate than we:
What comparison is there between your (august) feet and this wretched Delhi.
11. Delhi has now risen to be proud
Of having regained her pristine glory
12. Why should not every house here rejoice,
When Shahjahan (the King of the Universe) has returned to it.
13. The moon of this Id (feast) is truly blest,
Since none is left unsatiated by the sight of you.
14. That we should have the honour of seeing the Princess
Is a special gift of Providence,

15. She is courteous, kind, and sympathetic.
Briefly she is peerless amongst princess or queens.
16. This is the sincere prayer of Saiyyid.
May the Great God grant it:
17. May you live eternally in peace,
And may you be eternally as happy as a bride.
18. May the glory of the King remain everlastingly at its height, And may the fortune be, or remain, the slave of this family, or dynasty.
19. May life and prosperity progress,
May God grant every moment an increase.

Pioneer.—Messrs. A. John and Co. have offered to build a free hospital for the poor of Agra at an estimated cost of Rs. 50,000 for building and equipment, and have also offered to pay Rs. 500 monthly for its maintenance. The hospital is to be named the Princess of Wales's Hospital and built adjoining Jatri-kin-Bagh in Belongunji, as this part of Agra is thickly populated and at some distance from the Thomson Hospital and Sadar Dispensary. A hospital in that vicinity would be a distinct boon to that neighbourhood.

Juren.—On His return journey southwards from the Frontier Province and Kashmir to the Imperial City of Delhi, the Prince of Wales will break his journey at Amritsar. The sacred city of the Sikhs, though boasting no great antiquity, is one of the most picturesque and striking cities in India, and should certainly not be neglected by the Royal tourist.

The Sikhs may be described as dissenters from Hinduism bound together by military ties—a sort of Hindu Knight Templars. Much of the ceremonial and formalism of Brahminism is rejected, including the most typical dogma of all, the worship of caste. Their religion has not altogether inaccurately been described as a blend of Hinduism and Mohamedanism. The sect owes its origin to a certain Nanak Shah, who preached this reformation towards the end of the fifteenth century. Their rulers, who combined the functions of military chief and spiritual leader, were called Guru (teacher). At the beginning of the eighteenth century the Sikhs formed themselves into tribes, each under a Sirdar (chief), who practically controlled the whole of the Punjab. But some hundred years later all these confederacies fell under the rule of the famous Ranjit Singh, who died in 1839. Finally the British victory of Sobraon in 1846, followed by that of Gujerat in 1849, resulted in the annexation of the Punjab.

Such, in a nutshell, is the story of the rise and fall of the Sikh nation, though perhaps they would be more accurately described as a sect rather than a nation.

Amritsar is a comparatively modern city, having been founded in 1574 by the Guru Ram Das. The chief attraction is the famous Golden Temple, built by Ranjit Singh in the middle of the lake known as the pool of Immortality. Perhaps no temple—Hindu, Moslem, or Buddhist—in India possesses so striking and beautiful a situation as this remarkable sacred temple of the Sikhs. In the dazzling sunshine this beautiful sanctuary with its burnished roof shines like gold, while the lake is bordered with the palaces of wealthy Sikh chieftains, with a background of shady groves and gardens. From this mass of greenery stand out, white and dazzling, soaring minarets, pinnacles, and towers while the many-coloured throngs of pilgrims on the terraces of the lake and the marble causeway enliven the scene. Altogether this is one of the most charming and impressive scenes that the Royal travellers will see in the whole of Their Indian tour.

The famous Golden Temple stands on a marble platform in the middle of the lake, joined to the shore by a marble causeway about 200 feet long. The temple is a small building, and not of the highest architectural merit, but, owing to the richness of the decoration and the unique charm of its surroundings, is one of the most attractive in India. The visitor is met at the entrance gate by an official guide, and, after changing his boots for slippers and carefully removing any cigars or cigarettes he may have in his pockets—for tobacco would be desecration in a Sikh Temple—he is conducted along the causeway to the temple. In the centre sits the chief priest, surrounded by a large number of white-robed priests, who sit round a silken sheet piled with roses. The chief priest chants a verse from the Granth—the Sikh Bible—and the other priests and worshippers chant the alternative verse. Meanwhile the worshippers file past the priest and throw their offerings of roses into the silken sheet. The whole ceremony is so simple, yet impressive that the tourist, who is by way of being shocked or amused, according to temperament, at the fantastic and repulsive ceremonies in the temples of Benares for instance, leaves the Golden Temple with a feeling that he has not been looking on at a mere "sight" but at a reverent act of worship.

Most of the interesting sights are in the neighbourhood of the sacred lake, which is surrounded by palaces, kiosks, pavilions, towers, gardens and groves, forming a delightful panorama. This is best enjoyed from the summit of the Atal Tower, standing in the Temple Garden. The height of this picturesque building is 130 feet. A curious legend is commemorated by this tower. It was built early in the seventeenth century by the famous Guru, Har Govind, in memory of his son Atal, who had been reproved by his father for the wrongful exercise of supernatural powers. The young man took this so much to heart that, declaring that as a life was required he would give his own, he lay down and died. It is true the motive does not seem very convincing, but such is the legend.

But besides being a great religious centre Amritsar is, next to Delhi and Lahore, the most important commercial city in the Punjab. Then it is the chief seat of manufacture of the famous Kashmir shawls, and it is said that there are 4,000 looms in the city. The finest and largest specimens, whose texture is so fine that they can actually be passed through a wedding ring, are decidedly expensive, costing anything from £30 or £40 upwards, but smaller shawls not quite so delicate in texture though only an expert could detect the difference—can be obtained for £10 or so. One reason for the costliness of these shawls is that only the downiest of fleeces taken from the underside of the throat and belly of young kids, is used. The oft repeated legend that these shawls are woven from the fleece of unborn kids is happily a myth. It is said that as many as ten fleeces are required to make one small shawl, and that each loom with four worker can only produce two or three shawls in a year.

Besides the Kashmir shawls—the staple manufacture—all kinds of silk goods are manufactured here, and some of the finest carpets in India. In the bazaars, too, beautifully carved ivory ornaments can be bought at very moderate prices. Altogether the Amritsar bazaars afford one of the best hunting grounds for collectors of native curios and wares in all India, and there is a smaller proportion of rubbish and articles made expressly for tourists than at the better known bazaars of Delhi or Lucknow.

Mr. W. S. Caine, in his entertaining book on India, perhaps the best of the innumerable India travel books which have been published within recent years, calls attention to an interesting sight which the local cicerones quite ignore. This is the great serai, analogous to the khans of Old Cairo, a kind of market surrounded by small houses, in which merchants from Afghanistan, Turkestan, and indeed, from most countries of Central Asia find accommodation: In front of these houses are congregated traders and pedlars who bring the produce of their countries to exchange for Manchester, Sheffield, and Birmingham goods.

"Here are white-skinned Kashmiris, stout Nepaulese, sturdy little Beluchis, stately but filthy Afghans, Persians Bogharans, Khivans, Khokandis, Turcomans, Varkandis, Kashgaris, Tibetans and Tartars, and even the ubiquitous Chinaman."

In no city in India, except perhaps at Lahore, Quetta, or Peshawar can such a variety of Central Asian types and nationalities be encountered in the bazaars.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 16TH DECEMBER 1905.

Hilavadi.—The Hilavadi [Calcutta] of the 8th December writes expressing regret that the occupiers of all houses on the streets which the Prince of Wales is to drive through on the night of the 3rd January next are being requested to illuminate their respective premises, since in such cases a request is merely a synonym for a command, compliance with which may cause pecuniary hardship to many. It is suggested that the Royal Reception Committee might come to the aid of such distressed people with a grant out of their funds.

Jain Gazette.—The Jain Gazette [Arrah] of the 8th December welcomes Their Royal Highnesses on behalf of the whole Jain community in verse from which the following are taken:—

Famine is spreading all over the country. save us from it, O Master!

India was a land of gold once, as they said. Indians have, now become beggars and there is mourning in all directions.

Your heart will shake to see the state of India.

Grief, grief, everywhere, there is nothing but grief and the sigh, Ah!

Ah!!

O Master, earn everlasting fame here.

Still there is plenty of rejoicing and welcome to you. Oh heir-apparent. Welcome Prince.

The wrecked ship of the Jain religion is lying in midstream. You are its only Captain, steer it to the bank of safety.

The Jain community welcomes you from the bottom of its heart.

Bharat Mitra.—The Bharat Mitra [Calcutta] of the 9th December hopes that His Royal Highness would be pleased to try to know the condition of this country from the natives as His Highness did in Bombay.

Daily Hilavadi.—The Daily Hilavadi [Calcutta] of the 10th December says that the manner in which the Prince of Wales is making his tour in India is such as will very probably make His Royal Highness acquainted with nothing but the natural scenery of the land. Wherever His Royal Highness goes he is surrounded by officials who never allow him to know the real condition of the country. Famine-stricken places have been omitted from the Prince's tour programme. His Royal Highness will, therefore, know nothing of India even if he tours through the land for four years, instead of four months, in this fashion.

Hindi Bangavasi.—The Hindi Bangavasi [Calcutta] of the 11th December having learnt from a Calcutta correspondent of the Pioneer that the Bengal Government is anxious to see as large a number of school-boys as possible join in all the rejoicings to take place during the stay of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in Calcutta, is unable to understand this political duplicity since the same Government is so much displeased with the students.

Sandhya.—A lady correspondent of the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 13th December writes:—

Our future Emperor and Empress are coming to our city. We shall pray for all good to them at the feet of God, and we shall frankly lay bare before them the miserable pass to which we have come under the hands of their servants. Let nobody be afraid that they will be annoyed or angry at seeing us pained, sorrow-stricken or impoverished. Can a father and mother abandon their child when they see that child stricken with grief and poverty? That is why I appeal to the daughters of my mother-country, my dearest sisters, my fellow country-women of Bengal, to go to the worship of our Royal pair with the tears of our eyes, with the blood of our hearts, with our most mortifying wailings. How can we, daughters of the unhappy soil of Bengal, forget this, sister.

"Who ever forgets the love of a mother

In whose blood were you born,

At whose lap are you being nursed into manhood?"

Hilavadi.—The Hilavadi [Calcutta] of the 8th December hears that high-placed officers are putting pressure on eminent gentlemen both in town and the mufussil to send ladies of their families to the Belvedere purda party. Threats, it is said, are being used to the effect that those who will not so send are to be counted as disloyal.

Hindi Bangavasi.—Regarding the purda party at Belvedere, the Hindi Bangavasi [Calcutta] of the 11th December learns that the officials are bringing pressure to bear upon those gentlemen who are not willing to send their families to attend the Ladies Darbar at Belvedere, telling them that their refusal to send their families would be considered as an act of disloyalty on their part. What has loyalty or disloyalty to do with this entirely social function. People should be free to act as they like. The officials should not use force or pressure in this delicate matter.

Kesari.—The Prince of Wales visited the capitals of the Chiefs of Udaipur, Jaipur and Bikanir. The remaining Rajputana Chiefs were to be introduced to His Royal Highness at Ajmere and Bharatpur, but the famine in Rajputana prevented the carrying out of this plan and the Prince was advised by the Government of India to exclude both these places from his itinerary. Formerly, it was considered to be the duty of a paramount sovereign to visit places afflicted with serious visitations like famine and earthquake in his empire and to utter words of comfort to the victims of such calamities. Rulers of independent countries do so even at the present day, but Lord Curzon at the time of the Punjab earthquake deliberately avoided a visit to the stricken parts, and the Prince of Wales has now followed the same wrong policy. The Rajputana Chiefs expressed their disappointment at not having the pleasure of seeing the Prince by writing kharitas, and the Prince has sent them a message of sympathy in return and a copy of his photograph to each of the disappointed feudatories. So much for the interchange of sympathy between the Prince and the loyal Chiefs of Rajputana. But what kind of reception awaits His Royal Highness in Calcutta at the hands of the Bengalis? The authorities are very anxious on this score. The autocratic Lord Curzon has inflicted a mortal wound on Bengal with his dagger, and the Bengalis are now in mourning on that account. They might, however, have received the Prince with the customary formalities, but as they have found that the authorities are bent upon forcing their hands in this matter they are not, it appears, willing to extend even a formal reception to His Royal Highness. The Prince will not now drive through the native town of Calcutta because it is apprehended that the people would not only not light the exteriors of their dwellings, but even shut the doors and windows of their houses on the night of the Prince's drive. Again, it is the wish of the authorities that the ladies of Bengal should, like their sisters in Bombay, render homage to the Princess of Wales at Government House, but as the purdah is much more rigidly observed in Bengal both among Hindus and Mussalmans than it is on our side, it is not possible that the Bengali ladies will come forward to show their loyalty to the Princess. Again is it not the height of cruelty and shamelessness to practise extreme oppression on Bengali boys and gentlemen and to expect their mothers and wives to do pooja at the shrine of the Princess? As a reign of terror prevails at present through the whole of Bengal, even Brahmo ladies, who have cast off purdah long ago, have refused to attend the Princess' purdah party. Bengali journals state that Sir Andrew Fraser is highly incensed at this determined attitude of Bengali men and women and has begun to indulge in ravings about "sedition." We are indeed glad that the Bengalis have demonstrated to the Anglo-Indian administrators and their sycophants in the native community that there are objects more sacred than Royalty itself and that there are sentiments higher than loyalty.

Kal.—In the course of an article headed 'Devices of the Russian Government' the Kal writes:—The Russian authorities are accustomed to utilize the officers of the Sanitary Department as detectives for watching the actions of suspected characters. In India, too, that Department has been made to serve the same purpose. At the time of the arrival of the Prince of Wales in this country, passengers going from Poona to Bombay were required to give their Bombay addresses to the Sanitary authorities. At that time there was no plague in either city. It is, therefore, manifest that the secret object of the above measure was something else than the suppression of plague.

The Paisa Akhbar (Lahore) of the 11th December 1905, publishes a communication from one T. C. Gujrati, of Lahore, who says that he has been greatly surprised to read the text of the address presented to the Prince of Wales by the Lahore Municipal Committee. Having regard to certain passages in the document it cannot be considered as coming from the citizens of Lahore, as it claims to be. No fair-minded or patriotic native can endorse the statement made in it regarding the country being in a prosperous and flourishing condition. The address is therefore calculated to convict the real leaders of the people and the best well-wishers of Government of lying and to nullify their efforts for the good of the country. The writer is of opinion that spending thousands of rupees on the ornamentation of roads, etc., and trying to gild the people's poverty into a semblance of affluence in order to mislead the Prince of Wales is a moral offence of no small magnitude.

The Sanatan Dharam Gazette (Lahore), of the 6th December 1905, writing on the same subject, regrets that the Municipality should have done the rate-payers a bad turn and prevented their future King-Emperor from knowing the truth about them.

Madras Mail.—In addition to the holiday gazetted under the Negotiable Instruments Act on the 24th January 1906, on account of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Madras, all public offices at the Presidency will be closed on Thursday and Friday, the 25th and 26th January. The total number of days that they will be closed will be five, as the 27th will be the last Saturday of January and the 28th will be Sunday.

18TH DECEMBER 1905.

Englishman.—It is inevitable that there should be a certain uniformity in the receptions accorded to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, when they visit great centres of population in the course of their tour. Yet at each of these centres there is some special characteristic, some determining feature which differentiates it from those which have gone before. And certainly at Agra the scene which the Prince and Princess saw when they emerged from the station was like nothing they have yet seen in India. Dominating the whole situation were the majestic red sandstone walls and the superb bastions of Akbar's Fort. In a serrated line extending almost from the base of the walls, on both sides of that road leading towards the river, and on the railway bridge were gathered thousands and thousands of the people of the city, while among the battlements themselves were grouped a few score of British line-men in scarlet who lent the final touch of colour to the spectacle. It is, moreover, a subject of never-failing interest to watch the attitude of the crowd as the Royal cortege passes. There they remain for hours squatting on their heels or standing quietly in unbroken rows waiting for hours for the arrival of the Emperor's son with the patience which belongs only to the Oriental. The booming of the guns announces the arrival of the Royal train. A brief pause and the appearance of the mounted police indicates the approach of the Royal carriage. Instantly a ripple of movement plays over the turbaned heads as they are craned forward in eager expectation and the chatter of voices is hushed, a thousand hands are raised in reverential salaams, while others are so intent on studying the Prince and Princess that they forget to salaam. As soon as the cortege has passed at a short trot the waiting lines break and surge over the road and people it with a throng as dense as that which blackens Epsom Downs on Derby Day.

In a station carpeted with beautifully worked rugs Their Royal Highnesses received the dutiful address of the Agra Municipality. In this reference was made to three events which specially linked the city with the Royal family—the circumstances that the people were able to pay their addresses to His Majesty, the King-Emperor, on his tour, to her late Majesty on the occasion of the Prince of Wales' marriage and now to the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Escorted by the 15th Hussars Their Royal Highnesses then drove to the Circuit House which will be their headquarters during their stay in Agra.

Their Royal Highnesses made their first close acquaintance with the architectural glories of Agra in the afternoon when they visited Sikandra and Akbar's tomb in the beautiful grounds adjoining which the members of the Agra Club were at home. At first it looked as if this excursion would be made under conditions the reverse of pleasant. In the afternoon a strong wind sprang up raising clouds of dust which made driving disagreeable. Afterwards, however, the wind fell, and at Sikandra the Prince and Princess enjoyed the full splendour of a Northern India December evening. The beautiful monument that Jehangir raised to his father, the greatest of the Mughals, has benefited greatly from the informed zeal for the preservation of its architectural treasures which now animates the Government of India. The minarets of the main gates have been restored and portions of the coloured work, the arches of the second of the four tiers of the tombs replaced, so that it is possible to form an idea of its appearance of the building when these hues had not faded. The grounds, too, are carefully maintained, and the tomb is tended with care and discretion.

In driving home the long route through the town and under the shadow of the fort was purposely taken, so that Their Royal Highnesses might view the illuminations. These commenced with torches flaming smokily in the dust near Sikandra and then developed as the city was reached into continuous lines of dancing flame. These culminated in thin streaks of fire on the grand walls of the fort and ripples of flickering light by the river ghats. The measure of Agra's joy in the Royal visit may be taken by this; that scores and scores of stands were constructed all along the line of route so as to command a better view of the Prince and Princess. In the stands, draped with red cloth, hung with chandeliers and ablaze with light sat the city worthies with their sons and small daughters, their uncles and their tribes of relations chattered round them hugely enjoying the tamasha, while the whole population was in the streets below

Sunday was a day of rest, and in the morning Their Royal Highnesses attended Divine Service at the Cantonment Church, where an impressive and apposite sermon was preached by the Bishop of Lucknow. In the afternoon they drove quietly across the bridge of boats to the tomb of Itmad-ud-Dowlah on the opposite bank of the river. This, though not the most famous, is one of the most characteristic monuments of Agra. It was built by Nur Mahal, the favourite wife of Jehangier, as a mausoleum for her father, the Lord High Treasurer. It is graceful and refined rather than impressive. But these were the principal attributes of the Treasurer himself. The great gateway through the complexity of the ornamentation produces a somewhat unrestful effect, but the marble screens and filigree work are only surpassed by that in the Taj.

From the tomb of Itmad-ud-Dowlah Their Royal Highnesses drove to the Taj Mahal and spent the remainder of the afternoon appreciating its exquisite beauties in the softened light of the declining day. But this was not their first visit to "the dream in marble." Last night they left the Circuit House almost unobserved and watched the moon rise over the river until it bathed the exquisite fabric in silvery light, transmuting the solid marble into an ethereal shrine of diaphanous opal. Is there any other building in the world that has so absorbed the litterateur and the painter? and withal neither brush nor pen has transmitted its loveliness. It is far beyond the reach of either. The supreme creation of the artist in stone, the perfect material expression of man's love for woman, "the proud passion of an Emperor's love wrought into a living stone" it stands irreproducible as the yearning which gave its birth.

But at least a word of gratitude may be offered to those who have made the surroundings of the Taj Mahal entirely worthy. Any one who visited Agra some years ago will remember the squalid village, the ugly ravines and the generally poverty-stricken scenes through which they had to drive to the main gateway. All this has been changed. The village has been removed, the ravines partially reclaimed, and the whole clothed in verdure. The approach to the Taj Mahal is now in an intimate sympathy with the peerless monument as is the close of Salisbury Cathedral with that great fane. Within the same care has been exercised. The turf is velvety, the paths are scrupulously neat, and no colour breaks the subdued green of the garden, save the occasional flash of a poinsettia or the crimson glow of the croton. If anything needs a restraining hand it is the too luxuriant growth of the trees which sometimes obscures those oblique glimpses of the fabric, which, when the sun is high, are the most fascinating. And let us take heart of grace in that in some other ways we have emerged from the artistic barrenness of the past generation. When His Majesty the King-Emperor visited Agra they could think of no better way to entertain him than to place search-lights in the minarets of the Taj Mahal and crude flares by the still waters of the canals.

Indian Daily News.—The reception of Their Royal Highnesses at Agra Fort Station was a ceremonial of much brightness and interest. The decoration of the station was most effective, and the gathering was one of vivid colouring. Besides the Lieutenant-Governor and his staff, there were present: General Gaselee and staff, the Judges and the Government officials. The Prince wore his military uniform with the insignia of G. C. S. I. After the introductions by the Lieutenant-Governor and General Gaselee on the platform, the ceremony of presenting the Municipal address took place. The entrance hall of the station was richly decorated with gold-embroidered cloths, and beneath a canopy two silver chairs were placed for Their Royal Highnesses. The address, illuminated in delicate colours, was presented enclosed in a casket of marble inlaid with valuable stones in beautiful mosaic work. The surface of the lid was composed of over two thousand separate pieces of stones, and on the four sides of the casket over six thousand pieces were inlaid. The stones used in the mosaic were cornelian, lapis, lazuli, bloodstone, malachite, dongastr, agate, and black marble, with numerous pieces of shell.

After the Prince had replied to the address, the members of the Municipality were presented. Before Their Royal Highnesses departed, the young Raja of Bhadawar, a boy of nine, presented a bouquet to the Princess. He was dressed in robes of white with his headdress ornamented with emeralds and rubies set in a gold circlet, and he also wore a handsome necklace of jewels, while a heavy belted and bejewelled knife was stuck in his cummerbund. There was a very brilliant scene outside the station. Great numbers of people were massed under the walls of the dull red fort. Others lined its battlements, and the decorative streamers across the road were of the most vivid hues. The Royal Welsh Fusiliers with band and colours supplied the guard-of-honour. As Their Royal Highnesses drove off hearty cheers were raised by the crowd outside the station. The Royal procession proceeded along the Strand Road passing between the fort and the river and driving through the Macdonnel Park to the Circuit House. The route was thickly lined, and the decorations were most effective.

This afternoon Their Royal Highnesses made a State progress through the City of Agra and drove out to Sikandra where, in the garden surrounding the tomb of Akbar, the members of the Agra Club held a garden party. Their Royal Highnesses, attended by an escort of the 15th Hussars, left the Circuit House at a quarter to four, driving through the Macdonnel Park. Fine views of the Taj Mahal were obtained. They then proceeded along Strand Road and passed under the walls of the fort with the river on their right to the crowded city. The route was lined by vast numbers of people pressing against barricades, occupying densely packed stands, and thronging the ledges and roofs of houses and shops. The crowd was one of great variety of colour with especially vivid masses where the school children, College students, and the children of the C. M. S. Orphanage were gathered together. The stands along the road were decorated like shamianas, and many of them were occupied by onlookers from particular districts. There were many triumphal arches and mottoes of welcome, and there was a profusion of bright bunting throughout the route.

As the procession passed on flowers were showered upon Their Royal Highnesses. Passing through Belanganj, one of the chief business quarters of the city, the Muttra Road was followed, the Royal visitors here proceeding along what was Akbar's highway to Lahore. Vestiges of the ancient use of the road remain in the old mile stones dating from the time of Akbar and the tombs and ruins of pleasure gardens passed on the way recalled the vanished era before the tomb of the Great Emperor came into sight. Reaching the Mausoleum which stands within a vast garden surrounded by high battlemented walls faced with marble, Their Royal Highnesses paused to admire the beauties of the great main gateway which is inlaid with mosaic in arabesque designs. The four minarets recently restored in fulfilment of the orders of Lord Curzon, were also the subject of attention.

After making their appearance in the garden where there was a large gathering, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to view the interior of the Imperial Mausoleum. Bearing a date equivalent to 1613, the building is of an unusual design, in that it is built in four tiers, each less in size than the one below. The topmost story is a marble platform with a cenotaph hewn out of a single block of marble beautifully carved and bearing Akbar's names and titles.

After a prolonged inspection of the tomb Their Royal Highnesses returned to the garden and a number of those present were introduced to them. These included the Raies of the Province who were in attendance and a number of native officers. Their Royal Highnesses did not take their departure until dark was falling, in order to view the illuminations on the return drive. The route followed in returning to the Circuit House was the same as in the outward journey, but if it was interesting earlier in the evening, it was much more so when the crowds were seen under illumination of a great feast of lights. The small chirags were used in abundance but the shaminana-like stands lining the roads, were now ablaze with the lights of chandeliers and lamps in profusion. In the less brightly illuminated quarters the clay butties were most effective, the Jail, the Fort and the Railway Station being very finely outlined in this manner. During the progress of the return drive through the illuminated city a display of fire-works took place in the bed of the river.

Their Royal Highnesses spent to-day in the usual quiet manner of observing Sunday. They attended the Parade Service at the Cantonment Church at 11 o'clock.

This afternoon a visit was paid to the Taj Mahal and the tomb of Itmad-ud-Daula. The wondrous beauty of the Taj, its exquisite proportions, the purity of outline of its swelling dome, and the richness of its inlaid work were viewed with marvellous admiration. The Taj Mahal, a sonnet of love chiselled in radiant marble, will continue to amaze, to inspire homage and reverential wonder, and will be written about as long as its gleaming dome aspires to heaven, but the grace and meaning of Shah Jahan's inspired tribute to his deeply mourned Empress can hardly be more happily indicated than it has been by Sir Edwin Arnold's phrase "the proud passion of an Emperor's love wrought into living stone." The Royal party spent much time talking on the glories of a monument which thrills the beholder who sees it for the first time from the moment when it is revealed, framed by the great arch which opens on to the garden, to the moment when from the marble platform its full proportions and the detail of the wonderful inlaid work are seen.

From the Taj, Their Royal Highnesses drove a distance of three miles, crossing the Jumna by the pontoon bridge to the tomb of Itmad-ud-Daula. The father of the Empress Nur Mahal, Itmad-ud-Daula was also the grandfather of Mumtaz Mahal, the lady in whose honour Shah Jahan built the Taj. Nur Mahal erected a tomb in memory of her father, building it of marble, as being a material less easily stolen than silver in which it was originally designed to be constructed. It is remarkable for its fine mosaic work in arabesques and for some pierced marble screen, and unlike the lovely symmetrical and swelling dome which surmounts the Taj, the domes of the tomb are of the low Pathan type which were in vogue in the earlier Mogul period. This building is one of those which have recently undergone restoration. Their Royal Highnesses were accompanied in their visits to these buildings by Mr. Marshall, of the Archaeological Department. Tomorrow morning they visit the fort, afterwards luncheon with the officers of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers. In the afternoon the memorial statue of the late Queen-Empress in the MacDonald Park will be unveiled, and after dinner a reception will be held at the Circuit House.

The memorial to the late Queen-Empress, which the Prince of Wales will unveil at Agra to-morrow, consists of a bronze standing statue thirteen feet in height placed on a pedestal fourteen feet high, the sides of which are flanked by allegorical figures of Truth and Justice. On the back of the pedestal is a bronze panel descriptive of the Empire, and on the front of it another bronze panel containing the description "Victoria, by the Grace of God; Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, Defender of the Faith. Ascended the throne 20th June, 1837, proclaimed Empress of India 1st January, 1877. Died 22nd January 1901." The statue and pedestal stand on a platform in the centre of an ornamental reservoir of water which is fed from large bronze shells placed on the projecting sides of the pedestal. The reservoir is enclosed by a marble parapet. The statuary and bronze shells (the work of Mr. Thomas Brock, R.A., who also approved the design of the marble work) have been executed by Messrs. Paolo Triscornia and Co., of Carara, Italy, and the memorial has been erected under the direction and supervision of Mr. A. R. Polwhell, Executive Engineer, Agra Division, and his successor Mr. F. Oertel. The statue has been placed on a high plateau in the MacDonald Park and looks towards the fort built by Akbar and towards the city of Agra. The plateau has been laid out as a grass lawn with sloping sides, and its future maintenance will be the duty of the United Provinces Government. The cost of the memorial is about Rs. 1,40,000.

Morning Post.—Inevitably, no doubt, but unfortunately, our impressions of India have been so far confined to native States, so that there has been no break in the continuity of colour and barbaric ornament. And our opportunities for appreciation and remembrance are not at all so considerable as perhaps they seem. One is aroused out of the unrestful, unwholesome sleep of our unremitting journey in the dark of the morning, one shakes off the blanket of dust which has fallen defilingly over everything during the night, struggles with the meagre means of ablution to suggest a merely temporary lapse in habits of cleanliness, grapples with the incongruity of a frockcoat and its concomitant embarrassments—surely for such occasions the most ineligible costume—and is then suddenly shot out into unexpected sunlight blazing with the effulgence of mediæval India. Impeaching inwardly the intrusion of one's own unwelcome appearance on such a scene, one tries, with a provision of failure, to absorb its immemorable and indescribable variety. Before one has glanced superficially at one-tenth part of it, guns from the station announce the Royal arrival, the lines of astounding figures vibrate with expectation, the sweepers disappear from the roadway, a dozen glittering horsemen gallop along it, the far end fills with a flood of colour, the Royal procession passes, the crowd, stifled in dust, bursts in behind it, and, in the crowd and the dust and the shouting, mediæval India disappears. It melts away, mingles somehow, incredibly, with the moving throng, dissipates its fulgent dyes about the city, and one sees it no more. One may find it indeed, if one is foolish enough to seek for it, but stripped of its glories and almost lapsed again into the common day. The elephants, apart, null, ruminant, in their mud-walled stables, but gone the golden howdahs, the gold embroidered carpets which are their saddle-cloths, the golden girths and bells, the filigree of jewelled silver on their foreheads, the silver chain mail on their flanks. Nothing left them but their painted faces, the gay vermilion and orange, peacock-blue and green, which went so well with their vanished splendours, but almost wear an air of lost innocence without them. But the elephants by no means monopolised one's attention at Jaipur. There were camel batteries with the long swivel gun mounted on the camel, the gunner managing precariously gun and camel from behind the hump, and camel batteries with gaunt camels harnessed to baby muzzle-loaders which hardly reached to the camels' knees.

There were bullock batteries, too, with gleaming silver-plated guns and calm-eyed oxen with chased and hammered silver cases to their horns. . . . silver trappings and inlaid silver. . . . bullock carts brought the strongest note of colour into the whole line, for they and their hoods were painted the same shade as the velvet cloths that the big white oxen wore, and to match which their horns were enamelled or enclosed in velvet bags, either of a vivid emerald green or an intense crimson. These old bullock carts, despite their short, squat curves, are really beautiful pieces of coach-building, if building it can be called, seeing that on scarcely any part of them a tool has come. Every piece of the framework stands just as it grew, and thousands of pieces must have been rejected before just the right curve and then the exact fellow to it was found. But thus found and bound with thongs of raw hide together—even the solid segments of the wheels having no other tie—they have kept the living curves, with all their charming individual differences, unstrained and unwarped for, it might be, centuries, such a bent air of age, of age repainted but unrepaired, has their indestructible solidity. The big white Gujerati oxen, sleek, solemn, sacred, onyx-eyed, such patricians by comparison with all the other kine of India, seem yoked to them with a peculiar fitness, an epitome of the old Hindustan, mild, wrapt, passive, long-enduring. With their beauty, their grave imperturbability, their brooding eyes, it is easy to imagine how they came to be worshipped, easy, too, to understand why they are loved and petted and treated rather as some dull-witted child than as a beast of burden.

Above them, above everything, indeed, fluttered the five colours of the Rajput standard, green, yellow, red, white, and indigo, very decorative, especially when worked on a foundation of threads of gold. They were carried by the elephants, banners twenty feet square that filched a quite considerable space of sky, by the horsemen, whose steeds had their names plaited with gold braid and wore nets of jewelled silver over their necks and quarters, and by footmen all in scarlet; scarlet turbans, scarlet blouses, scarlet trousers, scarlet shoes; or all in green, the most verdant of greens, with a crimson border; or all in orange, the hottest orange, with a pale blue edge. One names but three out of some three hundred liveries, without a word for the uniforms of the native levies, all of them wonderfully picturesque; Infantry, with eight-foot match-locks wrapped up in green velvet bags, proud possessors of bellmouthed blunderbusses, of flint-locks, match-locks, and the earlier progeny of muskets; Cavalry, good horsemen, well mounted, and not ill-drilled, with a pair of the ruling colours in their lance pennants, green and yellow, yellow and red, red and green, green and white, or white and yellow. The queerest figures in the procession were the Nagas, men with dark skins, snub noses, bushy beards, lean and tall, devotees who expose themselves naked to every inclemency of weather, in spite of English interdicts. They had so far conformed to custom as to wear waistcoats of green and pink satin, carried round black shields, and long, straight flexible swords with hilts wrought into a steel gauntlet, the grip being at right angles to the blade, which could thus be used for thrusting only. They leapt wildly about before the Prince's carriage, striking their chins with their prancing knees, keeping their swords, like a harlequin's bat, in a perpetual quiver, screaming and blowing shrilly through strange twisted conches.

After such samples of its peoples one looked forward with exceptional curiosity to Jaipur itself; but Jaipur was an unqualified disappointment. Jai Singh, who was surnamed "One and a half" as a tribute to his greatness, founded it nearly 200 years ago. A man who could have left lovely Amber, five miles away in the hills, to set down a city in the modern American manner on a dusty plain, must have been capable of anything, but Jai Singh's idea of a city was based apparently on a birthday cake, and he built miles and miles of it, in big rectangular blocks, with streets laboriously wide and depressingly regular, all of a painful mauve pink, embellished with flourishes in white stucco, which, by their resemblance to confectioner's sugar, complete the suggestion of a cake. Save the Maharaja's palace, which is painted a stone yellow, the entire city is of the same wearisome tint, of itself a sufficient condemnation, though by no means the worst of its offence. With its tiresome battlements, pretentious ornament, and continuous repetition, it seems composed entirely of outer walls, lacking any hint of personal taste, circumstance, or even of occupation. Even the famous Hall of the Winds, which looks quite interesting in a photograph, is only an exuberant moment in confectionery, and as architecture could only be tolerable on the understanding that it was to be eaten the same evening. The town is said by its admirers to be seductive at sunset; but a sunset—seeing how few we have that are not spent in the train—seemed too valuable to be wasted on it. We saw it illuminated, elaborately illuminated, through a suffocating fog of dust, and the movement of a hundred thousand people, on our way to and from the Maharaja's banquet; but the mauve pink looked not a whit less depressing by the light of the flickering lines of butties, and the streets, though packed with people, seemed still too wide to frame them effectively. But the wonders of the morning came no more; and it is thus that we are seeing India. An incomparable pageant, deplorable decorations, throngs of sightseers, reiterated formalities, and clouds of dust.

Pioneer.—The following correspondence has been sent to us for publication:—

Literal translation of a letter from Shah Hafiz Ali Anwar, Sajjad Nashi of Durgah Hazrat, Shah Kazim Sahib of Kakori, dated 12th Shawal 1323 Higri:

Friend of devotees, beloved by God, Mr. Butler Sahib Bahadur, C.I.E., may your friendship and love be prolonged.

After presenting my salutations and prayers for your welfare and prosperity in both worlds, I come to the point. I am exceedingly pleased and glad to hear of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and of the proposal to commemorate the same by establishing a Medical College. May God bless the same. We mendicants and devotees have no worldly wealth in our possession that would embolden us to join the execution of the proposal. It is indeed our duty to pray (to God) with our heart and soul, and I do not neglect to do so. But my brother, Chaudhri Nasrat Ali's letter shows that you do not care if one subscribed a large or a small sum, especially in the case of the poor devotees like me. I beg, therefore, to remit Rs. 30, and trust that you will accept it as a mere sacred present from this Durgah and favour me with a reply. This subscription though small in amount will, I think, be probably considered sufficient from your well-wishers to bring them within the category of partakers. May God keep you happy. Salaam.

Medical College Fund, Lucknow, 11th December 1905.

Dear and Venerable Sir,—On behalf of the Central Committee I thank you for your prayers and the precious offering from your Durgah. It is quite true that we do not measure subscriptions by their money's worth; the spirit which prompts them and the source from which they come and make small offerings the most valued of all. That you, who have so many disciples to care for and guide, and so little concern with the world except to make men happier and better, should have come forward, as you have done, gives the offering of your Durgah a value which I can scarcely express in words. And may I say that this movement to establish a Medical College at Lucknow is worthy of your thoughts and prayers and blessings? First, because it expresses the fervent loyalty of us all to His Most Gracious Majesty the King-Emperor and the gratitude of us all to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales for coming to this land; secondly, because from this college will issue forth men who will cure the sick and relieve the pains of those who suffer and, thirdly, because a common work and enthusiasm makes us all brothers and brings us closer together, no matter what is our creed and position and business in this world.

It is late and I am tired, so I will write no more except again to thank you and to beg you to continue your prayers for the success of this work, to which we and you have put our hands.

Pray accept my salaams and Believe me, yours very truly,

S. H. BUTLER.

Shah Hafiz Ali Anwar Sahib,
Sajjad Nashin of Durgah Hazrat,
Shah Kazim Sahib of Kakori.

Pioneer.—A salute of 31 guns from the fort at 9-30 this morning announced the arrival of the Royal party at Agra. The preparations to receive the Prince and Princess at their first halting place in the United Provinces were full and complete. The Fort Railway station was brightened with flags and bunting, and the central hall in which the Municipal address had to be presented, had been converted into a charming reception-room. All the surroundings at the station were in keeping, and much skill and labour had been bestowed in making the decorations artistic and pleasant to the eye. Their Royal Highnesses were received on the platform by Sir James Digges LaTouche, the Lieutenant-Governor, and Sir Alfred Gaslee, the Lieutenant-General of the Eastern Command who were accompanied by their Staffs. There were present Justices Knox, Aikman and Bannerji, of the High Court, Mr. Reynolds, Commissioner of the Agra Division, Mr. Winter, Chief Secretary to Government, Mr. Brereton Inspector General of Police, Mr. Ferrard, Collector of Muttra, Mr. Hopkins, Collector of Agra, Mr. Tyler, Private Secretary, Mr. W. E. M. Campbell, C.S., on special duty, and Captain Boys, Extra Aide-de-Camp to the Lieutenant-Governor. The principal military officers in the station and leading native nobilities were also present. The young Raja of Bhadawar, a boy of nine years of age, presented a bouquet to the Princess.

After general introductions had been made by the Lieutenant-Governor and Lieutenant-General Commanding the Royal party moved to the central hall, where the Municipal Commissioners were waiting to present their address of welcome. This was read by Munshi Ganga Prasad, Vice-President, and was as follows:—

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESSES,—We the Municipal Commissioners of Agra, in the name of all the residents of this ancient city, humbly pray Your Royal Highnesses graciously to accept our loyal and heartfelt welcome and the assurance of our undying devotion to His Majesty the King-Emperor. Among the distinctions conferred upon this Municipality in the past we treasure most highly two marks of favour accorded to us by Your Royal Highnesses' illustrious House. His Majesty King Edward honoured this body by accepting its addresses during His Majesty's tour in 1876, and Her late Majesty Victoria Queen-Empress deigned to accept our congratulations and prayer on the occasion of Your Royal Highnesses' marriage, happily fraught with so much blessing to the Empire. To these happy memories will now be added that of Your Royal Highnesses' visit, and it is our earnest hope that the artistic and architectural beauties of Agra, so zealously fostered in recent years by the Government of India and the Local Government, may receive new lustre through earning Your Royal Highnesses' approbation. Our city, once the capital of the Moghal Emperors and the chosen resting-place of the greatest among them, has received the additional honour of being selected as the site of one of the two provincial monuments erected in memory of our beloved late Queen-Empress. This honour is now enhanced by your Royal Highnesses' gracious consent to unveil the memorial. In conclusion, we humbly pray that Your Royal Highnesses may enjoy all the blessings of long life, health and prosperity, and we beg to assure Your Royal Highnesses that we are and ever shall be Your Royal Highnesses' most loyal and obedient servants."

The Prince, in replying, said:—

"GENTLEMEN,—On behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself I thank you sincerely for the kind welcome which you have given to us. It is a privilege to anyone, whether from the west or from the east, to approach your beautiful and historical city. We look forward with keen interest to seeing its artistic and architectural beauty of which you are so justly proud, and I am quite certain that during our visit we shall gain impressions of Agra which will never fade from our minds, and we shall always remember your friendly greetings and the pains which you have taken to make our stay here pleasant and successful. I look forward to associating myself with you in the unveiling on Monday of the statue which you have raised to the memory of our late beloved Queen-Empress. It is befitting that in this city, so rich in exquisite monuments of the great Emperors of the past, there should be a memorial of a ruler who yielded to none in her love and goodwill towards India. While nothing can rob you of the noble inheritance which you possess, I notice with satisfaction that you are keeping pace with the times so that you may have a future as well as a past, for I learn that your railway system is being further developed and that your cotton industry is steadily increasing. Gentlemen, the Princess and I earnestly trust that the prosperity and welfare of Agra may thus continue. I shall have much pleasure in conveying to the King-Emperor those assurances of your undying devotion to His Majesty to which your address gives expression."

The members of the Municipal Board were then presented to Their Royal Highnesses and this concluded the reception. The Prince inspected the guard of honour furnished by the Royal Welsh Fusiliers, of which His Royal Highness is Colonel-in-Chief and the Royal party then entered their carriages for the drive to the Circuit House, the 15th Hussars providing the escort. A vast crowd had assembled on the ground between the Fort and railway station and large stands had been erected for spectators. The people were packed many deep and the concourse extended round the face of the fort into Strand Road, which was also thickly lined on either hand. The barricades put up to guard the moat of the Fort prevented any accidents from the surging of the people after the procession of carriages had passed. The roads were gay with Venetian masts and streamers, and the inhabitants of Agra had turned out in strength to greet the Prince and Princess. As they drove past there was the usual eager desire shown to catch a glimpse of the Royal Carriage and its occupants and the popular pleasure shown was unmistakable, a cheer now and again breaking out. The route taken was by Strand Road with the dry river bed hard by and thence through the Park and by Prince's gate to the Circuit House and the camp the drive occupying a very short time. The volunteers and 17th Rajputs lined the greater part of the road, while the police kept the section near the railway station. The 18th furnished a guard of honour at the circuit House, while the Royal Welsh Fusiliers have the regular guard duties there during the Royal stay.

The Prince and Princess were received at the Circuit House by Lady La Touche. The camp pitched in the grounds is on a very large scale and is admirably placed as it commands a view of the Taj, the Fort and the city. The laying out of flower beds has had beautiful results, while the new lake in the shape of a horse-shoe is a very pleasant feature. There is unluckily a high wind blowing and the clouds of dust rather spoil the view.

This afternoon the Prince and Princess drove out to Sikandra, where a garden party was given by members of the Agra Club. A procession of carriages was formed under a full escort of the 15th Hussars and the route was along the Strand and Muttra Road, thus enabling Their Royal Highnesses to see the decorations in the city. These included a large number of triumphal arches, the best of which were those erected by the Municipality in red and gold, and green and silver, respectively. There were Royal mottoes at every turn and numerous private stands, all in the gayest colours, that of the young Raja of Bhadawar being particularly noticeable. A multitude of small pavilions of wooden framework, decorated with coloured cloth and embroidered fabrics, were also to be seen and the traders of Agra had done their best to make the scene a bright one. From end to end of the route streamers and banners were hung across the roadway, and thus an air of festivity was given to the city. The people were gathered in greater crowds than in the morning, and once again one noticed as in other towns visited the swarm of persons on the housetops and at the windows. There was general rejoicing, and this Royal procession through the city was the great event of the day.

On arrival at Sikandra Their Royal Highnesses were received by Mr. Reynolds, President, and the members of the Committee of the Club. There was a large gathering of Agra society and native gentlemen in the beautiful grounds, and the band of the 17th Rajputs played a selection of music. The Royal party visited Akbar's tomb, the fine red sandstone with its superstructures of white marble being one of the highest historical and archaeological interest. In the interior was seen some of the work lately undertaken in restoring the gilded frescoes and ornamentation on the walls. This serves to show exactly what the original designs now faded and discoloured were, but even the small specimens given have been costly and it does not seem to be known whether more is to be undertaken at present. The broken minarets at the entrance to the grounds have been completely restored under Lord Curzon's orders and now stand out in all the clearness of their white marble. One of the two large ornamental gateways flanking the tomb to the right and left but some distance away has also been renovated. The tercentenary of Akbar's death has but just come and gone, for the great Emperor died in October 1605, and thus more than the usual interest attaches to his last resting place at the present time.

The Prince and Princess stayed about an hour at Sikandra, the company present including Sir James La Touche, Sir Alfred Gaselee and a large party from the camp. The afternoon was a pleasant one as the wind had dropped and a good view was obtainable from the terraces. The Royal party returned by the route they had come as far as the railway bridge over the Jumna and then took the road round the Fort past the Delhi and Amar Singh Gates and through the Park to the Circuit House. This enabled them to see the illuminations in the city which were very brilliant. There was also a display of fireworks in the bed of the river.

The river and its neighbourhood present an arid appearance just now, for the failure of the monsoon has left its mark upon this part of the country, but there is still hope that the cold weather rains may prevent serious distress among the cultivators. The city, with its trade and manufactures, does not feel the situation very much at present, and it has certainly given a most loyal welcome to its Royal visitors. Their Royal Highnesses have much to see here, and the programme as arranged is that Itmad-ud-Daulah's tomb and the Taj should be visited to-morrow, the Fort on Monday and Fatehpur-Sikri on Tuesday. On Monday afternoon the Prince will unveil the Queen Victoria Memorial Statue.

Invitations for the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall by the Prince of Wales are now being issued to subscribers and the public.

Times.—Densely crowded streets testified to the popular welcome given to the Prince and Princess of Wales yesterday, especially during their Royal Highnesses' drive through the city to Akbar's tomb. Illuminations and fireworks brought the day to a close. The Taj and the historical buildings across the river were visited to-day.

Their Royal Highnesses' halt here marks the most interesting stage of the tour; for Agra, though a military and civil station of some importance, still lives as it did 30 years ago at the time of our present King's visit mainly in the past—a past of greater beauty and romance than perhaps any other city of the Mogul Emperors, including even Delhi. But when King Edward was here the splendid remains of its beauty were sadly neglected. Within the walls of the great Fort, the Jehangir Mahal, that noble palace of red sandstone built by Shah Jehan's father, as fine a specimen of pure Hindu architecture as any of the buildings at Fatehpur Sikri, had been walled up and was used as a dépôt for military stores. Portions even of Shah Jehan's palace were turned to the same uses; transport carts were stabled in the colonnaded court-yard of the Diwan-i-Am, and hundreds of tons of gunpowder were stored only a few yards away from the exquisite Pearl Mosque.

Within the last few years, all this has been changed, thanks mainly to Lord Curzon's energy and his cultured appreciation of all that is great and noble in Indian history and art. The precincts of the Mogul palaces have been cleared off the extraneous lumber which disfigured them, and important works of restoration, based upon a careful study of the old records, and carried out with equal skill and discrimination, have not only arrested the natural process of decay, but have to a great extent made good the wanton havoc of past generations. The beautiful courts and gardens are laid out as nearly as possible as they were in the days when they witnessed the splendour of Shah Jehan's pageants. The marble walls blossom once more with their full wealth of inlaid flowers and precious stones. The fretted lacework of the balconies and canopied pavilions overlooking the Jumna is almost as perfect as when Shah Jehan, for eight years the State prisoner of his son Aurangzeb within the palace he had built, was lifted for the last time to the favourite window whence his weary eyes travelled across the plain to the peerless shrine beneath which his beloved consort had long been laid to her last rest.

From the walls of the Fort to the enclosure of the Taj there extended not many years ago an unsightly stretch of drab sand-heaps, with a squalid native bazaar crowding up the approach and even the main entrance to the shrine. To-day there is a park there with grass swards and growing trees; the approaches to the Taj have all been cleared; the outer court-yard put in order, and its terraced mosques reconstructed; the beautiful Persian garden leading up from the great gateway to the glorious mausoleum, restored to something like the old design with its marble water-courses and stone cased flower beds. Within the central shrine the marvellous pietra dura work, repaired by skilled workmen of Agra, is now as absolutely flawless as the exquisite growth of lilies and iris carved in high relief on the marble walls. Measures have been, at the same time, taken by Government to secure in future against thoughtless desecration, too common but a few years ago, the most spiritual of all temples ever erected by the genius of man to the memory of the great dead; for Shah Jehan and the beautiful Mumtaz Mehal still sleep in the marble vault beneath the Taj. More than 20 years have passed since I first saw it, and every time I see it afresh, whether flushed with pink at early dawn or snow white against the deep luminous blue of an Indian noonday sky, or fired by the golden flames of sunset, or, and perhaps above all, in the pearly haze of a moonlit night, when it looms up into the sky supremely ethereal and diaphanous, the impression produced by this wonderful structure of unsullied marble, combining with a classically noble simplicity of outline a Japanese perfection and delicacy of detail, seems to grow more and more profound—the immortal embodiment of a great and spiritualized love which has shed upon death itself the glory of incorruptible beauty.

It is in the middle of the new park between the Fort and the Taj that the spacious camp has been laid out in which Sir James and Lady La Touche are now entertaining Their Royal Highnesses, and not far from it on a slightly raised piece of ground stands in the centre of a marble basin the bronze statue of Queen Victoria by Brock, which the Prince is to unveil during his visit—a noble monument worthy of the first Queen-Empress of India, and worthy also of the unique site it occupies.

Times.—The public entertainment on the Calcutta maidan to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, on the 2nd January promises to be extremely interesting. Their Royal Highnesses on their arrival from Government House will be greeted with the singing of "God bless the Prince of Wales," by a choir of school children, and will then be welcomed by the Lieutenant-Governor, the Maharajas of Darbhanga, Kutch Behar, Hill Tippera, Gidhour, Burdwan, and other European and Native gentlemen. They will then be conducted to a dais and the Maharajas of Burdwan and Gidhour, Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore and Nawab Salimulla of Dacca will act as Royal canopy holders.

The Maharaja of Dinajpur will hold before Their Royal Highnesses a jewelled basin containing rose water; Raja Sir Surindra Mohan Tagore will offer garlands of white flowers; the Maharaja of Sonbarsa II will then present chandan (white sandal) scented with saffron and musk and agar (a sacred fragrant wood produced in the Garo hills); there Mahamahopadhyas, or pandits (of Darbhanga) will hold before Their Royal Highnesses four gold plates, each containing a cocoanut, a quantity of paddy, and a few blades of grass, a gold coin and flowers, as national emblems of fertility and plenty, and will present to Their Royal Highnesses a scroll containing a blessing in Sanskrit mantra; three shamsul-ulamas of Bengal and Behar will present a kasidah specially composed for the occasion and two Buddhist priests from Chittagong will present an address consisting of pali slokas specially composed for the occasion. The following Bengali song of welcome in Bengali will then be sung.

"Hail! Prince, Princess; All Hail to thee!

With joyous voice we welcome sing,
As bursting into festive glee
Bengala greets her future King.
Though humble our reception be
And though our strains may halting run,
The loyal heart we bring to thee
Is warmer than our Eastern sun.

This song, excepting a slight modification now made in allusion to the Princess of Wales, was composed by Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohan Tagore for the occasion of the entertainment given at Calcutta by the Indian Community to the present King-Emperor, when Prince of Wales, and sung before him on the 28th of December 1875, together with its translation into English which was also made by the Maharaja Bahadur.

This will be followed by an Indian musical concert by the Bharati Musical Association under the direction of Raja Sir Surindra Mohan Tagore. This will be followed by a baul song, Sikkim and Bhutanese dances, a Nagar sankirtan, a Tibetan ghost dance, and Indian quarter-staff play.

The President of the Reception Committee, the Maharaja of Darbhanga will proceed to offer attar and pan to Their Royal Highnesses and the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Fraser and the Hon'ble Asif Kadr Saiyid Dasif Ali Mirza Bahadur, of Murshidabad, will place the imamzamin on the arms of Their Royal Highnesses according to the ancient custom of the Mahomedans. Their Royal Highnesses will then leave the dais escorted by the members of the deputation of the Reception Committee and proceed to their carriage, which, after leaving the pavilion, will pass by Serpentine tank, where there will be an exhibition of Murshidabad in the form of illumination (bera) and also of the sari song, on the illuminated tank. As their Royal Highnesses enter their carriage massed bands will play "God bless the Prince of Wales." Their Royal Highnesses will return to Government House by the same route as was followed on their arrival and Red Road will be lined on both sides by 1,000 retainers carrying lighted torches. There will subsequently be a display of fire works which will begin half-an-hour after the close of the entertainment.

Daily Mail.—Siwai Madho Singh is the hundred and fortieth descendant of the Rama, and reigns in a pink city. History asserts that it is two centuries old, but I am haunted with a suspicion that Jaipur is a collection of booths and will be carted away the moment the Prince takes leave of the Maharajah. Who ever saw a city of the East as rectangular as a Latin cross, with streets as broad as the Avenue de l'Opéra, with houses as aggressively alike as a row of suburban villas—all coloured a light pink and adorned with white stencils of conventional flower-pots. It is as great an anomaly as a white negro, and if I were not a fugitive in the land I would wait to see it packed up and stored in the real capital, which is Amber. What man would choose a booth on a dusty plain—even a pink booth—when he might dwell in a green gorge amid lakes and gardens and everlasting hills.

There are other reasons for doubting the substance of Jaipur. It has a museum which is described as the South Kensington of India; colleges where they speak English and teach conic sections; a hospital that must have been equipped in London, and an observatory with gigantic marble instruments that have corrected the calculations of European astronomers. But even these appanages of a permanent city shall not tempt me to break faith with Amber. I went at dawn to this city in the gorge, and met an elephant walking sedately toward the palace on the hill. It was a royal elephant evidently, on his way home, and even a plebeian elephant could not mistake Amber for Jaipur. He was not deceived by ruin of house and temple, by half-drained lake and deserted palace. After all, they are more real than rows of pink booths. Moreover, a little ruin here and there graces the picture, like a rockery in a garden. And is it any harder to imagine that the Rajputs destroyed a few houses and temples in the city of Amber than to believe that they erected a circus and styled it to capital of Jaipur?

So I followed the elephant, and thought of the sins of Siwai Jey Singh—statesman and legislator, and engineer and astronomer and an alleged architect who built the pink booths of Jaipur and the broad rectangular streets—the King who occupied himself with trifles such as the movements of the spheres, who dwelt on the barren plain when he might have bathed in the glory and the fragrance of the purple mists of the mountains and watched the white mist trail over the heaped-up splendour of dawn.

They were sweeping a path up the ramp to the castle whose white walls and towers and balconies glowed with the golden dawn. Far overhead hung the fort like a knightly shield that caught the first rays of the sun. In these pavilions of marble and mosaic lived the romance of the state. Here, in the sculptured hall of audience, Mirza hid his magnificence from the jealous eyes of the Emperor. In the alcove of delight dwelt the modest queen of Jey Singh, who, scoffed at for long robes, seized the sword of her lord and declared that if again her modesty was insulted she would prove that "the daughter of Kotah could use a sword more effectively than the Prince of Amber could wield the scissors." In the garden of citron and orange and pomegranate mused the radiant queen of Ganore, who defended five fortresses against the Mussalman, and, yielding a sixth, clad her conqueror in a wedding garment that was his shroud, and sprang from the battlements.

Why do they tarry by the way? The Prince has gone to shoot tiger. The elephants and spearman who move through the gorge are the advance guard of the hunter. The Princess is at South Kensington—in Jaipur. We must get back to the pink booths and the rose-coloured Palace of the Winds—that impertinent pyramid of bay windows in which are hidden the fruitful mothers of the harem. Siwai Madhad Singh has no son, and seems destined to repeat the romance of his youth. When Ram Singh, his predecessor, lay dying in the billiard-room of the palace, he named as heir to the throne a poor lad who lived in the jungle—Sivai Madhad Singh, who now reigns. A man of many parts, he is ruler and father of his people. We have seen him in their midst with his retinue of bare-legged runners in green jerkins, his men in green armed with matchlocks—guardians of the royal slumber—his spearman and chobdars in scarlet and in silver staves, his elephants like castles of silver and gold, his camels armed with swivel guns, his bullocks palkis of rainbow splendour, and his battery of oxen with green enamelled horns.

We have seen him seated by the Prince in the Durbar Hall under graceful arcades and roof scintillating with brilliance—a picturesque and dignified presence clothed in simple black robe brodered with gold and turban of cloth of gold sewn with pearls. We have seen him in the banqueting hall—a solicitous host, who must not eat with his guests, but comes in with dessert to toast the King-Emperor and to give one more proof of charity for his people. Patron of science and letters, the Maharajah is of that austere faith which mingles reverence with superstition, as the sculptured arcades of his palace mingle with sheds of corrugated iron.

Here is a true story of this descendant of Jey Singh who read the secrets of the stars, and from the first dawning of reason was "devoted to the study of mathematical science and by the aid of the supreme author obtained a thorough knowledge of its principles." (Vide the preface of Jey Singh to his table of the stars.) When Sivai Madhad Singh, Maharajah of Jaipur, took ship for England to witness the coronation of his Emperor he carried with him the images of his gods. The winds and the waves beset him, and he dreaded the sea more than devouring tigers in his jungles. News came to his anxious wives and people, who feared that never again would they look on his benign countenance. But from Aden flashed a message from the Maharaja himself. Through the storms his gods were unmoved and serene, and therefore no harm could assail him!

Such is the mind of the East. You may cloak it under museums and colleges, under hospitals and observatories, but in the unattainable recess of the palace and on the threshold of rich and poor, of ignorance and instruction alike, dwells for ever the soul of the East—the incorporate inscrutable mystery of faith begotten in the dark past. At every step starts a new wonder of jarring incongruity. In Jaipur you see the ruler seated on the throne under the shield of Britian. Far away in the desert and jungle reign the Sirdars, who fill the presence chamber with reflected splendour. Here they are ornaments of the court; there they are feudal barons who may claim an unjust heritage and seize upon it with armed force. A sirdar whose claim is rejected assembles his army, occupies a fortress in the jungle and defies his chief who is powerless until the threat of Imperial wraths brings him to reason and punishment. Another rebels and seizes a village.

These are echoes of history that have not travelled to the shores of England or have been drowned in the fiscal storm. But you need not go into the jungle to read the story of the Rajputs. You will find it written on the walls, for when Jey Singh was busy with the stars and was building its observatory he did not neglect his ramparts.—(William Maxwell.)

Daily Telegraph.—The Prince of Wales to-day unveiled a statue of Queen Victoria, one of the memorials of the province to the late Empress. The statue is a fine work in bronze, and stands on the highest ground in the neighbourhood, looking over Akbar's mighty fort, with the Taj Mahal in the background and the city spread before it. The memorial is the fruit of the extraordinarily widespread reverence to the first Empress of India.

Replying to an address presented by Mr. Justice Knox the Prince of Wales said:

When some months ago, I accepted the invitation to unveil the statue of the late beloved Queen-Empress, my intention was to perform the ceremony in silence, for on occasions like this, when our hearts are full of hallowed memories, silence is often more eloquent than the sincerest words of praise and affection, but your address has greatly touched the Princess of Wales and myself, and we wish to join in this tribute of love and gratitude for her whom you simply but truly call a great and noble Queen. No words of mine are needed to tell you how my revered grandmother loved the Indian people, and bequeathed to my dear father and to me her great regard for India. I unveil this statue not only as a memorial of your first Queen-Empress, but also as a memorial of the fact that India knows how to be grateful for her love. It will be an enduring monument of the sympathy which existed between the Queen-Empress Victoria and her Indian people. May such feelings of attachment to our house grow stronger and stronger as time goes on.

Englishman.—This morning was occupied by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in studying the architectural treasures enclosed in those great red sandstone walls of the fort, which are such a conspicuous element in the landscape of Agra. Entering through the mass of Delhi gate he spent nearly two hours examining the principal memorials of the most magnificent Moghal Emperor; the Pearl Mosque, exquisite in its severe simplicity, and still considered desecrated because it was used as a hospital during the mutiny; the Dewan-i-Am which has suffered as much as any buildings in India from unskilful renovation, the Saman Burj and the gem of the fabrics within the fort, the Jasmine tower. Finally the irregular pile of red sandstone buildings which, with the name of Jehangir's palace and its strongly marked Hindu characteristics, is reminiscent of much of Akbar's work at Fatehpur Sikri.

From the Jasmine tower Their Royal Highnesses were able to enjoy the grand view that may be obtained therefrom—the Taj Mahal, its graces half concealed by the red sandstone mosque, the beautiful gardens, the Jumna, its waters shrunk to a tiny rivulet, meandering through a bed of yellowish grey, and the unbroken tree-dotted plain. They were able to view the town, a spectacle none can regard without serious misgivings, the foul black oily smoke belching from half a dozen factory chimneys. One of the most vivid impressions left on re-visiting the architectural hoards of Delhi and Agra is the sense of their amazing freshness after centuries of exposures to the elements. They have retained that freshness because the elements in Northern India are kindly, but with the spread of manufacturing enterprise a new constituent is being introduced into the atmosphere. What will be the effect of these clouds of inky smoke one sees at Delhi and Agra, on the spotless marble and warm sandstone? True these factories are on the outskirts of the cities, but it is impossible to witness without apprehension the smokeladen clouds bearing down on the Taj Mahal and the Jama Masjid. A wise Government has created a special department and spent liberally to conserve its precious heritage. But of what avail these pains if for the sake of petty economy the atmosphere of Delhi and Agra is vitiated with factory filth?

The principal event of the Agra visit was in the afternoon, when His Royal Highness unveiled the statue to Her Late Majesty the Queen, which has been erected in memory of her splendid reign. The veneration inspired by Queen Victoria in the provinces, which had special reason to value the gracious terms of her proclamation, was so deep that in the province of Agra alone the sum of six and a quarter lakhs of rupees was collected. In all districts where the subscriptions amounted to twenty-five thousand rupees, seventy-five per cent. of the local donations were refunded for the erection of local memorials and the remainder of the fund was allocated to the raising of provincial memorials at Agra and Allahabad. In this way twelve distinct monuments were erected, and at Allahabad is a seated figure of Her Majesty in marble, under a gothic canopy of great limestone. The Agra statue represents Her Majesty standing. It is of bronze raised on a lofty pedestal and flanked by allegorical figures of truth and justice, with a bronze panel descriptive of the Empire at the back. Round the base of the support is a marble reservoir fed from bronze shells projecting from the pedestal. The statuary and bronze shells are the work of Mr. Thomas Brock, R. A., who also approved of the designs of the reservoir.

The site of the memorial is extremely fine. It stands on the summit of a grassy knoll, the highest point in the vicinity of the city. Thence the bronze figure looks towards the angle of the red-walled fort. Behind is the Taj Mahal. At the foot the city lies stretched out in all its picturesque confusion. And the scene when the Royal cortege drove up was one of the singular dignity and charm. There stood the statue draped in Union Jacks. Round it was a circle of intent faces. The native gentry of the province in their varied robes, the scarlet of the British Infantry, the dark lungis of the native troops, the yellow turbans and graceful saris of the massed school children and the uniform and pretty frocks of the residents of the stations. Then on a high bank towards the city were assembled the people, a buzzing chattering throng, making a splash of colour on the yellowish dust. Up the Serpentine road which, winding through the park, leads to the foot of the knoll, came the lancers on bay chargers, the lancers on greys, lancers on chestnuts and the Royal carriage in the centre of them all. Through a lane formed by the brilliant staff came Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the former in the full dress of a British General with the star of India ribbon and the Princess in a lovely costume of pale blue hand painted and trimmed beautifully.

The unveiling ceremony was simple and reverent. The Honourable Mr. Justice Knox, as Chairman of the Executive Committee, read the address and His Royal Highness replied to the address:—

His Royal Highness then pulled the cord holding the national flags in place, the colours rolled away and the statue became visible, whilst the water gushed from the bronze shield. The band played the national anthem, and from the red-ramparts of the old forts the guns slowly boomed out a salute of thirty-one guns.

The statue represents Her Majesty with the orb and in flowing robes. The figure is full of dignity and repose, and the winged panels of truth and justice are finely conceived. Few people in England and perhaps not many in India realise the place Queen Victoria held in the minds of her Indian subjects. How she was, and her memory is to them, not only the embodiment of those regal virtues, truth and justice and integrity, but the impersonation of that sympathy which finds so ready a response in the Indian heart. Hence the wisdom exhibited in these provinces of making all memorials of her reign personal, so that the community may have ever in their midst the likeness of the sovereign so deeply beloved by them as the wise far-seeing Empress and the noble sympathetic woman.

In the evening a reception was given by the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, Sir James LaTouche and Lady LaTouche at the Circuit House. The grounds of the Circuit House are charmingly laid out with graceful flower beds and a horse shoe artificial lake. All the leading residents of this part of the province were present and the hospitality of Sir James and Lady La Touche was generously and tactfully exercised.

To-morrow Their Royal Highnesses motor to Fatehpur Sikri, where they will spend the day, leaving for Gwalior in the evening.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince of Wales before leaving Delhi conferred the Commandership of the Royal Victorian Order on Mr. A. H. Diack, Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, who had charge of all the official arrangements connected with the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to that province. The Commandership of the Royal Victorian Order, though but a recently established decoration, ranks higher than the Commandership of both the two Indian Orders and the C. M. G.

Indian Daily News.—This morning Their Royal Highnesses paid a prolonged visit to Agra Fort, the walls of which enclose the exquisite Moti Masjid and the palaces of Akbar and Shah Jehan. The building of the fort was begun by Akbar in 1565 on the site of an older fort. Entering by the elephant gate, Their Royal Highnesses viewed the Moti Masjid or Pearl Mosque built by Shah Jehan at a cost of three lakhs of rupees, the Diwan-i-Am, the court yard of which have been recently restored to its original condition, the Diwan-i-Khas, the Summan Burj or Jasmine Tower, and the other fine building enclosed within the walls of the fort which was visited and inspected with great admiration.

There was a very large gathering to witness the unveiling of the memorial statue of the late Queen-Empress in the Mac-Donnell Park, and the ceremony was of a strikingly impressive character. A guard-of-honour composed of the Welsh Fusiliers, Native Infantry and the 10th Lancers fringed the crowd, which was full of the brightest colouring. The headdresses of college students and school children were bands of vivid green, pale blue and bright saffron, and the gold of rich native costumes gleamed in the foreground beside the scarlet and gold of officers' uniforms and the bright dresses of European ladies.

In the distance the dome and the towers of the Taj Mahal were in full view, the memorial of one Empress of noble virtues overlooking that erected nearly 400 years later to a greater Queen. Facing the statue swathed in the folds of the British flag was a canopy of gold cloth supported by silver pillars covering two silver chairs, the whole scene being vividly brilliant and picturesque. The statue which His Royal Highness unveiled is one of a number of provincial and district memorials to Queen Victoria in the United Provinces.

Following upon the decision of a meeting held at Lucknow in February 1901, subscriptions amounting to nearly six and a quarter lakhs of rupees were raised. Sixty thousand rupees of the total subscribed in the province of Agra were contributed towards the Imperial memorial, the foundation-stone of which will be laid by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in Calcutta. Nearly two and three-quarter lakhs of rupees were refunded to various districts for the provision of local memorials, and provincial memorials were erected at Agra and Allahabad, the cost in each case being approximately one hundred and forty thousand rupees.

Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by an escort of the 15th Hussars, reached the site of the ceremony about half past four. At the steps by which the plateau on which the memorial has been erected is ascended they were received by Mr. Justice Knox, the President, and the members of the Executive Committee of the Memorial Fund, the trumpeters sounding a fanfare as the Prince and Princess stepped from the carriage. With the members of the Committee leading the way followed by the Royal suite, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the dais, where among others present were the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir A. Gaselee, the Commissioner of Agra, and other civil and military officials. Their Royal Highnesses having taken their seats, Mr. Justice Knox read the following address:—

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Knox, President of the Executive Committee of the Victoria Memorial Fund, read the following address to Their Royal Highnesses:—

It has been said, and perhaps with some degree of truth, that the affections of mankind are fickle and the memory of their benefactors short lived. Your Royal Highnesses, however, need no assurance that when the hearts of India's millions are stirred to their depths by the conviction that they have enjoyed or are enjoying the sway of a sovereign who is sympathetic with, and devoted to, their interests, the loyalty evoked burns brightly and fiercely. The memory of such a sovereign cannot fail to be cherished, and history assures us that it lingers on through succeeding ages with undimmed lustre. Such is the love, such the reverence, which the present generation feels for the memory of the late Queen Victoria, first Empress of India, that this love and this reverence will long survive any memorial, be it of bronze or be it of marble, which can be erected as a token of their existence. It is not, therefore, mainly with this object of perpetuating the memory of our late great and noble Queen that this and other statues in this province have been erected. The thought that inspires this memorial is rather the simple desire to bear witness to the wondrous power which her late Most Gracious Majesty held over the hearts of all her subjects in this land. Whatever their race, whatever their creed, all have united in one joint memorial to emphasize the confidence felt that in Her Majesty's eyes all were equally precious; and next through it to proclaim in silent and reverent unison of one and all the farewell tribute the farewell blessing. She wrought her people lasting good. In these pages, which I pray Your Royal Highnesses may graciously be pleased to accept, will be found set out the details of the measures taken and of the different memorials erected by the people of the province of Agra to carry out this object. In the name of all her late Majesty's subjects in this Province I pray that Your Royal Highnesses will add to the many acts of grace and courtesy already bestowed, the still further kindness of now unveiling the memorial towards the erection of which all classes and all races, in every district in this one Province have loyally and spontaneously contributed.

The Prince in reply said:—Gentlemen,—When some months ago I accepted your invitation to unveil this statue of our late beloved Queen-Empress, my intention was to perform the ceremony in silence, for on occasions like this when our hearts are full of hallowed memories silence is often more eloquent than the sincerest words of praise and affection; but gentlemen, your address has greatly touched the Princess of Wales and myself, and we wish to join in this tribute of love and gratitude to her whom you simply but truly call a "great and noble Queen." No words of mine are needed to tell you that my revered grandmother loved the Indian people, and that she bequeathed to my dear father and to me her great regard for India. I unveil this statue not only as a memorial of your first Queen-Empress, but also as a memorial to the fact that India knows how to be grateful for her love. It will be an enduring monument of the sympathy which existed between the Queen-Empress Victoria and her Indian people. May such feelings of attachment to our house grow stronger and stronger as time goes on.

Their Royal Highnesses then advanced a few paces to a post where the Prince touched a string. Simultaneously the Hussars hauled on other lines and the flags fell away from the statue. At the same moment the first shot of a Royal salute from the fort thundered out and the bands played the National Anthem. Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to view the statue closely. The sculptor has produced an imposing memorial, the statue being one in which the strength, dignity and majesty of the Victoria of the later years are admirably revealed, the work representing the late Queen as the personification of imperial grandeur. After having admired the whole composition, and the guns of the fort having finished their salutes, Their Royal Highnesses returned to their carriage and drove to the Circuit House, a fanfare by the Hussar trumpeters heralding their departure.

To-night a State dinner is being held at the Circuit House to be followed by a reception.

The reception held to-night by the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Latouche was a very brilliant and crowded affair, the shamiana in which the gathering took place being thronged.

Their Royal Highnesses arrived before ten o'clock and stayed nearly an hour, many persons being presented to them. The gathering was exclusively European.

The Indian Mirror writes:—There is no truth in the rumour that the proposal of holding a pardah party at Belvedere to meet the Princess of Wales has been dropped. As a matter of fact, the pardah party will be held at Belvedere, on Monday, the 1st January, at 2-30 when a joint address on behalf of the purdhanashin ladies of different communities will be presented to Her Royal Highness. Elaborate arrangements have been made to receive the Princess in a right royal oriental fashion. Her Royal Highness has expressed her satisfaction in response to Lady Fraser's invitation to be received by the representative native ladies of Bengal. Fifty invitation cards will be issued to those who have signified their willingness to send their ladies to the party in course of the week. The Maharanees of Dumraon and Hutwa will attend the party. Every arrangement has been made to consult the feelings and privacy of the "purda" ladies. No male will be allowed to approach the reception pavilion where the party will be held.

Tents will be pitched within the compound for the accommodation of the female attendants of the invited ladies. Separate camps also will be provided for guardians or male attendants of the female guests. Lady Fraser with her characteristic nobility and kindness of heart and disposition is sparing no pains and effort to make the party successful to the satisfaction of the host and the guests.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses on Saturday afternoon attended a garden party given by the members of the Agra Club at Sikandra. On Sunday the Prince and Princess visited the Taj and Itmud-ud-Daula's tomb.

The programme on Monday includes the unveiling of the statue to the late Queen Victoria.

As there seems to be some misunderstanding on the subject, we are asked to explain that the invitation cards sent out will not admit persons to the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Medical College, Lucknow, on 26th instant.

Tickets will be issued for different blocks to those only who accept the invitations.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Press correspondents who are engaged in recording the progress of the Prince and Princess of Wales through India have not an easy task, but every effort is made by the authorities both in the Native States and in British territory to facilitate their work as much as possible. Some difficulty and discomfort were experienced at Lahore, primarily in consequence of the failure of an individual, but, as attention has been directed to this matter, it is due to the Punjab Government to state that they afterwards did everything in their power to smooth the way for the correspondents and to ensure their comfort during their stay in the Province.

Similarly, in the United Provinces the correspondents, we understand, have found their duties made as agreeable as possible.

Morning Post.—We are devouring India with an indigestible rapidity. It is eleven days since we left Bombay, and some part of all but three of those has been spent in the train. Thus, too, on eight days out of the eleven one has been either packing up and getting into camp, or packing up and getting out of camp. And that, even with all the blessed facilities this country offers for having things done for one, has left very little time for India. Also there awaits us everywhere an obscuring and retarding veil of formalities through which, for half of the time left from travel, one has to see what one can.

True the veil is in itself instructive, it has all the colour and pageantry of India woven into it. Thus it might be of the greatest service if one could only take it in.

But one is really trying all the while to look, not at it, but through it at the India beyond, the India which is the poor precarious tortoise on which this elephant of State stands, and the result of having all this encrusted magnificence dangled continuously before one's eye is merely to put one past getting impressions from anything, and to-day the Maharaja's men in the black chain mail of a Crusader mounted on camels seemed no more curious than the first native constable on a first landing at Bombay. There is one thing more, with which it would be ungrateful to quarrel, but which also serves to shut us out from India.

We are, as it were, insulated from contact with Indian influences by the small but wholly English world in which we move. Take us at the present moment. We are in camp in a Maharaja's compound; the uninhabitable desert stretches for hundreds of miles on every side of us; a sea of sand over which only a camel can travel, separated from us by a low mud wall. The redtousered sentries about the palace carry the weapons of fifty years ago, and are proud of their modernity.

You can have an omnibus drawn by a pair of elephants or a couple of camels in a wagonette or landau. Here, if anywhere, we might fancy ourselves in touch with the East, the old real India. Well, we came into camp before the sun was hot to find choice of Pomfrets Meunière, omelette aux champignons, poulet Colbert, and curry d'huitres offered us for breakfast, cooked as one might often fail to find them in Piccadilly or Pall-mall. Our tents, carpeted with the State colours of Bikanir, are lighted by electricity within and without; there is even an incandescent lamp in one's bath-lap. There is, for those whom the Imperial sand-grouse does not monopolise, buck shooting, pig-sticking, racquets, in a capital court, tennis, and billiards.

Excellent things all of them, and proof, one might say, of nothing but the courtesy of a host whose consideration for his guests' comfort could not be outdone.

He would be a fool indeed who saw in decent cooking and wholesome sport anything that should need apology. Yet it is just because the Englishman's life in India is so healthy and reasonable, so a making the most of meagre opportunity, that its other function of interposing a curtain between his eyes and India passes unobserved.

One has to live the life before its insidiousness can be suspected before the subtle fashion in which this small concentrated English world draws one's receptiveness away from India towards itself could be believed.

And our existence, in such places as Bikanir, does not differ in essence from the ordinary official life of thousands of our countrymen. It is swifter, more discursive, more complete. Our camps are from three to five hundred instead of from ten to twenty miles apart; our dealings are with the top of Indian life instead of, mostly, with the bottom; we are here for a few months instead of for half a life-time. But these differences are superficial; our aims are a like: to do our work as well as we and to keep apart from it as far as possible.

It would be quite easy to prove these things the secret of our success in India; it is not at all impossible that later they may be seen to be the secret of our failure.

There are other paradoxes of the sort, not less surprising. India has conquered all her conquerors because they have lived with her and lost in her indolent arms their conquering qualities.

Therefore, it might appear for England an exceptional advantage that she drew her Indian administrators from the tonic rigours of an island, six thousand miles away.

Yet so thoughtful an observer as the late Sir Salar Jung declared that none of our predecessors ever were so utterly foreign to the country as we are, and that in our inability to settle in India lay the most insuperable objection to our rule.

If that were true when it was spoken, it is still truer now.

We are becoming more and more foreign to India, our isolation as a ruling race is growing every decade more complete.

And therein lies matter for another paradox. It is the Anglicising of India which has emphasised the difference, which has widened the division between us and her.

This has been brought about to a great extent by the increased share which the native has been given in the administration of India.

What he has been given does not at all content him, because he desires higher office than he is considered competent to hold, but what he has obtained already has sufficed to alter the relations of the English official to the common people.

There has come between him and them this layer of native officialdom, through which almost everything that concerns the life of the humbler classes is transacted, a layer spreading over the whole of India and more than six millions persons thick. To it the penetration of the Anglo-Indian reaches and no further. That is one of the surprises in store for anyone who tries to study India: the limitations of the sources of knowledge available for his instruction. He begins by being delighted with the fluency of his teachers; he ends, and ends very soon, in sheer despair of reaching with their assistance anything that he wants to know.

The retort is open to them, of course, that only his abysmal ignorance could expect an answer to many of his inquiries, and it is no doubt true that he would expect less could he but realise, as they, the daunting vastness and variety of India.

Meanwhile, here is Bikanir! and Bikanir has a moral of its own for India. It is run—there is really no other word—for a most capable Prince who found its finances in disorder, its people embittered, its prospects in decay.

To-day he has more than trebled his income, he has built a splendid palace, he has constructed a railway across the desert which is a source of wealth to him; even his gao, in which the costly Bikanir carpets are made, does very much more than pay its way. For the use of his subjects, between the new palace and the town, he has built a club, with racquets and tennis courts, billiard tables, skating rink, football ground, library and reading rooms.

Yet the sands of the desert are all his territory, his capital is but a collection of mud huts. Save on his northernmost border, the only water to be found is three hundred feet below the surface; the white oxen may be seen drawing it in skins from those detestable depths with plaited ropes a hundred yards long.

Rain is so rare that the raising of crops on the chance of it is scarcely treated seriously, and a day's camel riding will show you little more than may be seen in the sterile borders of Arabia a few lean droves of cattle biting their way among—shrivelled sapless stunted thorns.

Yet Bikanir prospers, and prospers indubitably not by the fostering of an English Resident but by the exceptional competence of its natural ruler, a Rajput of the Royal stock. True he has had an English training; he is so English in speech and tastes and manner that one could not in those particulars know him from an Englishman. One may regard him as an exceptional instance, if only because his English training has developed and strengthened the sound fibre in him. More often it has the opposite effect. There, however, he significantly remains; proof that business instinct and the power of rule may be sought outside the white core of India.

The time may come, ere long, when we may have to use it, or rather, for indeed we use it already, to a scale and on a system we have not contemplated hitherto. But the desert, the place of dreams; they are harder to come by, doubtless, in Calcutta and Lahore.

Standard.—Till you come to India, you do not understand the possibilities of life under canvas. In most countries and climates the idea of luxury, or even ordinary comfort, in a camp, would seem absurd. It is supposed to be a huggermugger, make-shift existence, at the best, in which you put up with all sorts of inconveniences, on the same principle as that which induces you to forego some of the elementary decencies and amenities of civilisation on ship-board or the railway. Baths, good cookery, meals served with refinement, soft beds, adequate shelter from sun and rain, facilities for reading and writing, and privacy—who would look for these in a place in which one is a mere temporary sojourner? It is unpleasant, but soon over. That is why, I suppose, we submit to be locked up in a cupboard, to dress and undress and sleep in company with a perfect stranger on a Wagon-Lit train or in a first-class passenger steamer. People go into tents either to satisfy a temporary need or a passing caprice, or under conditions which do not allow much room for choice. A soldier on active service must deem himself lucky if he gets any sort of covering from the weather at all. If his tent saves him from sleeping in a pool of rain water or shelters him in a snow-storm, it is about all he can ask, and more than he will usually obtain.

Some of the newspaper correspondents, unused to Indian ways, when they heard that they were to live in camp during a considerable part of the Prince of Wales's tour, may have felt moments of apprehension. Those who had gone through more than one serious campaign recalled the hardships and privations of tent-life under the burning skies of the Sudan or the merciless blasts of Manchuria. Less hardened travellers thought of their "camping out" in English meadows, or their Easter holiday volunteering with half-a-dozen men packed in a small bell tent, spending laborious mornings in emptying pails, washing-up tea-things, and peeling potatoes. By young fellows, released from desk and office for a few days' outing, this was easily endured; responsible persons, with work to do, might find it less attractive. A place of abode, in which there would be no room to stow baggage, to write undisturbed, or to dress and undress in comfort, would have been disagreeable.

There was no cause for alarm. The first camp we came to was a revelation, even to those who had heard something of the Indian practice in these matters. Considering how large the party was that travelled with the Prince, I had not anticipated that each correspondent would have a tent to himself, and was wondering who would be my stable companion. But when we drove into the canvas town one of the first objects that caught my eye was a small white sign-post, planted in the ground, with my own name painted in visible black letters upon it, and it was signified to me that the tent behind this notice-board constituted my exclusive domain. And a surprisingly desirable little estate I found it, and greatly did I enjoy the two and a-half days I spent therein. I parted from it with deep regret, mitigated, however, by the reflection that other and equally satisfying domiciles awaited me at various other stages of our journey, which, indeed, proved to be the case. Sometimes we were even more luxuriously lodged; sometimes slightly less so. But this first tent of mine was a fair average specimen, not only of those which I occupied at other times, but of those which form the domicile of many Englishmen during a substantial portion of the years they spend in Southern Asia.

My tent is, properly speaking, two tents, one inside the other. You need much more than a single thickness of canvas between yourself and the scorching sun of the tropics. Therefore a good Indian tent is made with an outer and an inner skin, and an air space of a foot or more between the two roofs. The inner tent is the one in which I sleep and work. It is about sixteen feet square, and about seven feet high at the sides, rising to, perhaps, twenty feet at the apex, where the shaft of stout bamboo goes through the covering. This tent is of the Single Pole type, having one main central support, and plenty of thinner posts at the corners and sides to keep everything taut and rigid. Indeed, the whole concern has an air of solidity and permanence, though it may have been put up with a couple of hours' work yesterday, and to-morrow it will be travelling away on a bullock cart, a mere bundle of rods and sheets and cords.

When I sit in this combined bed-room and parlour, my eye is not offended by the sight of crude, rough canvas; for walls and sloping ceiling are all clothed with hangings of some stout cotton material, of a gold yellow hue, with a small geometrical pattern in brown. There is even a sort of dado or fringe, of a suitably harmonious design, where roof and walls join. There are doorways or oblong openings at the back, front and sides, each covered by a Japanese curtain of lath, which admits the air and keeps out the sun, and a flap of the same material as the walls, which can be let down at night.

My doorways, however, do not let me out of my little territory at once. They give upon the corridor formed by extending the roof of the outer tent laterally, and bringing its sides down to the ground, so that I have a passage about five feet wide all round. At one corner this corridor is enlarged to a canvas outhouse, screened off from the main building. Here is my bath-room, and it is large enough to hold a washing-stand, basins, towel-horse, and a great oblong zinc cistern not a mere tub, in which I can sit down and bathe in comfort; or I can stand upright in it, and have water poured over me, ice-cold, from great earthen pitchers, which is the alluring, but rather perilous, custom of many Anglo-Indians when heated in the chase. My saloon is well furnished. There is a cotton rug all over the floor, and a bed mat. It is no case of sleeping on the earth and a waterproof sheet. There is a regular iron bedstead, with proper framework for mosquito curtains, and mattress, sheets, blankets, and pillows, which things as a rule the Anglo-Indian traveller carries about with him everywhere; there is a writing table, and a dressing table with mirror, and a chest of drawers; and there are two cane chairs, and a large well-wadded armchair in which I can take my rest. My passages and bath-room are lighted with lanterns protected by wire guards, and by two large oil lamps (made to stow away in tin boxes for travelling), which shed a bright light into every corner of my saloon. Nothing is wanting. There is an ink-stand, with pens, blotting-book and stationery on the table, a waste-paper basket on the floor. And the whole compact little establishment is placed on a square of turf, carefully kept green by diligent watering, with a small path or miniature carriage-drive, edged with red tiles, leading up to the front door.

My tent is one of a hundred or so, set in two rows on each side of the broad main street of the camp, or along the cross roads, which branch out from this. Larger tents, of similar construction but with double poles and sometimes two rooms accommodate important members of the Royal suite, or serve as offices for those who have business to transact. There is a post office, with a red pillar-box in front, and a notice that the next collection will be at such and such an hour, into which you drop your letters with as much confidence as if you were in a London square. There is a telegraph office, with a staff of clerks and messengers, and offices for the military secretary, the chief of the staff, the transport director, and others, and a Press room, with tables and writing materials and newspapers.

In a little crescent, off the main avenue, with a flower garden in front, there is a whole range of spacious marquees, with silken hangings, which serve for reception-room, drawing-room, smoking-room—with a counter where you can get tea, and cooling drinks, and cigars at most times—and dining-room. Behind this last is a square yard, with high canvas walls, in which are small pyramidal tents and other structures and brick ovens, and a whole corps of cooks and waiters, who between them contrive to produce each morning, noon, and evening, breakfasts, luncheons, and dinners which would do credit to the last new sumptuous hotel in Paris or New York. Tube wells and pumps provide an unlimited supply of cold water; great iron cauldrons, with brick furnaces, enable anybody to have hot baths three times a day, if he pleases, and in India many people do please to bathe at frequent intervals and at all sorts of odd hours; and there is a tall electric light standard in front of the dining marquee, and lamps on poles scattered about freely. Though there are carriages and cavalry escorts and mounted messengers and souars moving along the camp roads all day, there is no cloud of dust; for the bheesties, with their huge leathern water-bags, slung over the patient backs of their bullocks, are always at work, keeping the whole camp moist and fresh, and making it difficult to believe that its site was, perhaps, a space of arid sand or a burnt-up patch of scrub and friable plough-land not many days ago.

When royalty travels things are at their best, and no doubt this is an encampment complete and luxurious even for India. But with a little less elegance and refinement in the upholstery and the reception rooms, a little less perfection in the menus of the dining-room, it is such a camp as the Viceroy often has, and the Commander-in-Chief, and at times even the Lieutenant-Governor or a Chief Commissioner. It is a different matter for that humbler, but most necessary, functionary, the lynch-pin and crank-shaft of Indian administration, the District Officer. Yet, when he traverses his domain he will carry with him a small cohort of servants, from six to fourteen bullock-carts, and three or more commodious tents, like that described above, only with furniture that takes to pieces, in order that it may travel in sections. People "go into camp," to use the technical phrase, so frequently in India, that they must make themselves reasonably comfortable over the process.

Times of India.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales having noticed a letter in the newspapers complaining that the boys of the Martiniere College would be deprived of their Christmas Holidays on account of the Royal visit the Prince has caused a letter to be written to the Principal of the College intimating that the boys are not to form part of the guard-of-honour on the occasion of Their Royal Highnesses' visit to the Residency. It is now said that this decision has caused keen disappointment among the pupils.

World.—Bikanir, where the sand and the camels come from, has this week afforded a sharp contrast to anything the Royal pair had hitherto seen—or indeed will see—in the course of their tour. The Maharaja is quite up to date in his ideas, and his palace of Lallgarh (or the Red House) is the most beautiful home possessed by an Indian prince. It was built by Sir Swinton Jacob, and, though externally it is in strict conformity with native ideas of architecture, its internal arrangements are most luxurious and entirely modern. What strikes one most forcibly on first seeing it is a feeling of wonder as to its raison d'être in the midst of such a desert waste. The principal attraction at Bikanir is, perhaps, the splendid shikar which it affords, and the Prince thoroughly enjoyed his days with the sand-grouse. He shot very well indeed, for this bird gives a very difficult shot, and his bag of two hundred and seven out of a total of a thousand and ninety for twenty-one guns speaks for itself. This was on the first day; on the second he got one hundred and fifty out of a bag of eight-hundred birds; so he failed to approach the record for one day of three hundred and seven which was set up last year by Sir Philip Grey Egerton.

Four members of the Royal Staff, Lord Crichton, Lord Shaftesbury, Sir Arthur Bigge, and Mr. Frank Dugdale, have had some good pig-sticking, the king of sport, with Sir Pertab Singh acting as their guide, philosopher, and friend. This grand old specimen of Rajput chivalry gave them an object lesson in the difficult art of spearing a pig while his horse was engaged in jumping the unclean beast. The party killed four good boars at Bikanir.

The stunting and demoralising tendency of a too prolonged residence in the East is notorious; still, in these days of quick voyages home, one would hardly have expected to come across a senior officer of the Indian army so ignorant of the characteristics of our future Queen as was a certain gentleman who was presented the other day. He was noticeably bewildered, and, in answer to questions on the subject, explained that he had not been prepared to meet so gracious, so tall, and so beautiful a lady. He is still raving of her beauty and her 'hearty grip,' which he contrasts with the somewhat limp handshake of the Prince.

In Calcutta signs of preparation for the Royal Reception are already visible, especially on the maidan, where the escort will be in camp. This is to consist of the crack cavalry regiment, the 15th Hussars, who are coming all the way from Muttra, band and all and that magnificently picturesque corps, the Imperial Cadets. The principal tamasha for the public will be the big At Home, which is to be held in a huge shamiana on the maidan on January 2nd, and we shall probably see the biggest crowd which has ever been known in the capital of India. We have been told by Babu Surendra Nath Bannerjee, the recognised 'arm and burgonet' of the disloyal faction that the harmony of the proceedings will be marred unless Government speedily agrees to rescind the already accomplished partition of Bengal. Unfortunately for the arch-Swadesher, he is not in a position to carry out his threats. In the first place, the presence of the 15th Hussars would be a potent deterrent; and in the second, he has already been discredited by his fellow conspirators, who foresee a lavish distribution of honours looming in the distance, and are preparing to join in the scramble for these much coveted 'loaves and fishes.'

Englishman.—Invitations for the ceremony of the laying of the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall (Calcutta) by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales are now being issued to subscribers and to the public so far as space admits. The Trustees will be glad if subscribers and others desiring invitations will send in their names to the Superintending Architect, Victoria Memorial, as early as possible, stating the number of seats they will require. These will be allotted so far as the limited space allows, preference being given to subscribers, who are requested to state the particulars of their subscriptions on their applications.

To-day was spent by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in visiting Fatehpur-Sikri, "The City of Victory," the great town built by Akbar in an outburst of pious devotion for the birth of an heir, occupied for a few years and then given back to the beasts and the birds who held dominion over the plain until the Emperor disturbed their rule. Starting early from the Circuit House Their Royal Highnesses motored over the broad and well-shaded road which links Fatehpur-Sikri with its successful rival Agra. After some time had been spent in viewing the principal buildings lunch was served in the Daftarkhāna which was handsomely appointed for the purpose. Then the tour of the abandoned town was completed and in the pleasant coolness of the afternoon, the Royal party returned to Agra. The weather was not quite at its best, for it was unusually warm for the season of the year, and a strong wind blew, but the road was in splendid order and well watered. The arrangements were admirable and the Prince and Princess greatly enjoyed the excursion and the absorbing study of the cities, palaces, temples and mosques.

And surely Fatehpur-Sikri is the most impressive monument of the power and majesty and taste of the Moghul Court. Shah Jehan built more lavishly, more artistically, and more perfectly, but none other raised a magnificent city in the jungle, stamped it indelibly with the impress of his own great soul, and before the last stone was laid left it to the bat and the panther and moved his Court elsewhere. To stand on the gate of victory and gaze over the six miles of crenellated wall, the dry bed of the artificial lake which once laved the fourth side of the city, the riot of mosque, temple, palace and tomb almost as perfect as the day they were forsaken, is to gain a far truer insight into the magnificence of the Mughal power than can be induced by the contemplation of the Taj Mahal, the Fort at Agra or even Imperial Delhi. For none but a Titan amongst his contemporaries could have raised this splendid monument to his power and imagination, peopled it with statesmen, philosophers, priests, artists and beautiful women who flocked to his Court, and in the full zenith of his fame, and whilst his craftsman were yet busy in the building, discard it like a costly toy and in obedience to a whim or a sentiment go away and forget it as if it never existed.

For this is how the story runs. Three and a half centuries ago, returning from one of his campaigns, Akbar halted at Sikri. Oppressed with the death of his twin children by Mariam Zamani, his Rajput wife, he approached Sheikh Salim Chisti, a Pir, who dwelt in an adjoining cave and sought his counsel on the subject of an heir. Chisti advised him to come to Sikri and nine months later Mariam gave birth in the cave of the saint to a son called after the Pir Selim and known to history as Jehangir. In his gratitude Akbar built the city of Sikri afterwards called Fatehpur or "victory" after the conquest of Gujarat. There he raised the Baland Darwaza, the noblest portal in India, whose majestic proportions are visible for miles around, to celebrate the conquest of the Sesodia capital of Chitor, the Juma Masjid, the purest and most elevated of Mahomedan fanes, the Dewan-i-Khas, concerning whose use archaeologists still dispute, and his own modest apartments and palaces which are as perfect as the day he left them, and dug the lake which broke the aridity of the plain. Why in the plenitude of its glory was the new city so completely cast aside, that in a few years the wild beasts made it dangerous of approach? One story is that it was unhealthy, another that the water-supply was deficient, a third that Chisti, annoyed by the bustle of the city's life, said that he or the Emperor must go and the Emperor went. It could have been no very active cause that did not find exact record in the full history of his reign.

But whilst the vivid desertion of Fatehpur-Sikri affronts by the audacity and wastefulness of its abandonment the city fascinates by the completeness with which the characteristics of the founder are wrought into the fabric. Without other guide his brief capital affords an index both to the cast of his mind and the main purpose of his life. Akbar's strong, virile, masculine being sought a fitting medium in the rugged red sandstone of the vicinity and marble beds, but sparingly employed in his works. His noble soul found its best expression in dignity and breadth rather than in subtle perfection of detail, and only in the adornment of the feminine apartments was the decorative skill of his Hindu architects allowed to run riot. The Baland Darwaza, or the high gate, bespeaks the soldier. Simple almost to the point of bareness, the splendid portal standing on the point of the ridge over which the court buildings are scattered impresses by the sheer majesty of its proportions, and for miles around it was a visible sign of the power of Akbar's sword. The Juma Masjid reveals the deep religious mind. In the reserve and dignity of its decoration it is unsurpassed and the cloisters of the great square are the true haunts of peace. The marked Hindu, feeling in Jodbhai's palace, Mariam's house, and Birbal's house betrays the catholicity of his artistic instincts and his love for the solid and enduring. The variety of ornamentation in the Turkish-Sultana's house and other of the women's apartments discloses the lighter side of his æsthetic tastes. Then this grouping of Hindu, Jain and Saracenic styles in his new city all of which are embodied in the quaint five-storied pavilion, known as the Panch Mahal, evidences the liberality of mind and breadth of vision, which distinguished Akbar from all his contemporaries. Fatehpur-Sikri is the man himself in stone.

With all its strength and freshness, which make Fatehpur-Sikri not a ruined city, not a city of desolation, but just an abandoned city which yesterday might have pulsed with warm life, there are those human links which preserve it from hardness. In the exquisite marble lace work the Sheikh Chisti's tomb are the little coloured threads that tied the women, who suffered from barrenness, the greatest curse of the East. On the gates of the Baland Darwaza are the horse-shoes nailed as votive offerings by those whose beasts are sick. Stout Sir Protap Singh says that in the palmy days of Rajput chivalry if the enemy's gates could be neither blown up nor beaten in a band of chosen horsemen blindfolding their steeds would gallop madly at the wooden barrier, dashing themselves to a pulp, but carrying all before them. In the modest house near the Masjid lived Abdul Foz, who coming to court as minstrel compiled the classical "Ain-i-Akbari." The gentle-mannered guide, who pilots you through the mazes of the city, is a lineal descendent of the great Sheikh Chisti, in whose honour Akbar raised Fatehpur-Sikri and at whose behest he is said to have quitted it. Having been ridiculously overpaid he importunes you for another rupee and haggles over the value of cheap photographs.

But the most absorbing memorials of Akbar's life and reign that Fatehpur-Sikri enshrines are the monuments to his wide religious tolerance in an age of bigotry. The Jumma Masjid is the declaration of his early Mahomedan belief, but in the pulpit he stood to pronounce the new all embracing faith, which dispensing with a priesthood, recognised only one God, the maker of the universe, and Akbar as God's vice-regent on earth. Near the Diwan-i-khas is the Yogi's seat of one of the Hindu fakirs, who enjoyed his favour. The hospital is on the model of that set up by the Jesuit Fathers, who were also permitted to erect a church and instruct the Emperor in the principles of the Christian religion. On one of the portals of the Baland Darwaza is written in Arabic "Said Jesus, on whom be peace: 'The world is a bridge, pass over it, but build no house there.'" In the Ibadat Khana the learned men of all religions assembled for discussion. Akbar's new state faith died with him, as it was bound to do, but never sought man more diligently for the truth, and it was no real failure to have aimed so high.

The day has been unusually hot and close for Agra at this season of the year. Now as the evening has drawn in clouds are banking up and there is every sign of the rain that is urgently needed to save the district from severe distress. In the Agra and Muttra districts the monsoon rains were so scanty that there was no real kharif crop. If the winter rains also fail, the agricultural population will be almost entirely dependent on Government aid to carry them through until the next harvest. The provincial authorities are fully alive to the gravity of the position, liberal suspensions of revenue have been granted, and preparations made to give any measure of relief that may be required, but a good fall of rain in the next few days would effect an incalculable improvement in the situation. It was with a fair prospect of this rain being soon received that Their Royal Highnesses left quietly for Gwalior after dinner.

The programme of the Royal visit to Lucknow has just been published, and includes the Taluqdars' fête at the Kaiser Bagh; the laying of the foundation stone of the new Medical College; a visit to the Residency where the mutiny veterans will be in attendance; a garden party by members of the United Service and the Mohamed Bagh Clubs and a State dinner and reception.

The difficulty regarding the Martinier boys having been settled the boys will form a part of the Guard of Honour to the Prince at the Residency.

The last day of Their Royal Highnesses' stay in the province of Agra is being given up to a visit to Fatehpur Sikri, the capital founded by Akbar in honour of the birth of his son, Salim, who became the Emperor Jahangir. After seventeen years of splendour, Fatehpur-Sikri was abandoned, some say because of the impurity of the water-supply while a tradition ascribes the desertion of the city to Akbar's regard for the wishes of a holy man who lived there. It was upon the advice of this saint that Akbar, who was anxious for an heir, removed to the village of Sikri, and when the wished-for son was born, made the village the site of his new capital. But the great city which sprang up became an annoyance to the saint of Sikri, and, says the legend, he declared that either he or Akbar must go. "Then let it be your servant, I pray," said the Emperor, and Fatehpur Sikri was abandoned to the beasts who had originally roamed over its site. The ruins of this city are distant about twenty-three miles from Agra. The Prince and Princess proceeded by motor, starting about 10 o'clock. They were timed to reach Agra on their return about 5 this evening, and leave for Gwalior shortly before midnight.

The buildings to be seen at Fatehpur Sikri, include the marble tomb of Salim Chisti, the recluse to whose existence the foundation and ultimate desertion of the city were due. This mausoleum is enclosed within a great courtyard on the top of the hill, the enclosing walls containing cells for religious votaries and numerous places of sepulchre. The remains of the holy man, whom the greatest of the Moghals honoured as greater than himself, lie buried beneath a sarcophagus and a canopy encrusted with mother-of-pearl, the shrine being enclosed by screens of marble art work, which are described as perfect examples of the art. The tomb is fronted by a mosque built nearly three hundred and forty years ago, and is said to be a replica of the holy place at Mecca. The Buland Darwaza, one of the finest gateways in India, rises beside this sacred spot, another mosque is to be seen behind the tomb of the saint and close to his cell. This shrine having been erected by the stone-cutters of the hill in memory of the hermit. The palace of Akbar and his wives are also full of interest, and much time was spent by the Royal party in viewing these remains of Fatehpur-Sikri's former splendour.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—There was a very large gathering to witness the unveiling of the Memorial Statue of the late Queen Empress in the MacDonnell Park, and the ceremony was of a strikingly impressive character. A guard-of-honour of the Welsh Fusiliers, Native Infantry and the 10th Lancers fringed the crowd which was full of the brightest colouring. The head-dresses of the College students and school children were banks of vivid green; pale blue and bright saffron, and the gold of the rich native costumes gleamed in the foreground beside the scarlet and gold of the officer's uniforms and the bright dresses of European ladies. In the distance the dome and towers of the Taj Mahal were full in view—the memorial of one Empress of noble virtue overlooking that erected nearly four hundred years later to a greater Queen. Facing the statue, which was swathed in the folds of the British flag, was a canopy of gold cloth supported by silver pillars covering two silver chairs, the whole scene being vividly brilliant and picturesque.

The statue which His Royal Highness unveiled is one of a number of provincial and district memorials to Queen Victoria in the United Provinces. Following upon the decision of the meeting held at Lucknow in February, 1901, subscriptions nearly amounting to six and a-quarter lakhs of rupees were raised. Rs. 60,000 of the total subscribed in the province of Agra were contributed toward the Imperial Memorial, the foundation stone of which will be laid by the Prince of Wales in Calcutta. Nearly two and three-quarter lakhs of rupees were refunded to various districts for the provision of local memorials, and the provincial memorials were erected at Agra and Allahabad, the cost in each case being approximately Rs. 1,40,000.

Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by an escort of the 15th Hussars, reached the site of the ceremony half-past four. At the steps by which the plateau on which the memorial has been erected is ascended they were received by Mr. Justice Knox, the President, and the members of the Executive Committee of the Memorial Fund, the trumpeters sounding a fanfare as the Prince and Princess stepped from the carriage. With the members of the committee leading the way followed by the Royal suite, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the dais, where, among others present, were the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir A. Gaselee, the Commissioner of Agra, and other civil and military officials. Their Royal Highnesses having taken their seats, Mr. Justice Knox read an address to which the Prince replied.

Their Royal Highnesses then advanced a few paces to a post where the Prince touched a string; simultaneously the Hussars hauled on other lines, and the flags fell away from the statue. At the same moment the first shot of a Royal salute from the Fort thundered out and the bands played the National Anthem. Thereafter Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to view the statue closely. The sculptor has produced an imposing memorial, the statue being one in which the strength, dignity and majesty of the Victoria of later years are admirably revealed, the work representing the late Queen as the personification of Imperial grandeur. After having admired the whole composition, and the guns of the Fort having finished their salutes Their Royal Highnesses returned to their carriage and drove to the Circuit House, a fanfare by the Hussar trumpeters heralding their departure.

To-night a State dinner is being held at the Circuit House followed by a reception.

Madras Mail.—There is no truth in the report, which has got about, to the effect that the Purdah party, to be given by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and Lady Fraser in connection with the Royal visit to Calcutta, is to be abandoned. Invitations are now being issued, and elaborate arrangements made, a separate camp being pitched for the male relations of the ladies attending.

The 15th Hussars from Agra, a wing of the 15th Light Infantry from Dinapur and a detachment of the High and Light Infantry from Dum-Dum have been ordered to Calcutta to take part in the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Pioneer.—Their Royal Highnesses The Prince and Princess of Wales arrive at Lucknow from Gwalior at 8-30 A.M. on Tuesday, the 26th December. They will be received at the station by the Lieutenant-Governor, the General Officer Commanding the 8th Division, the Nawab of Rampur, the Raja of Tehri, and the principal civil and military officials. After the customary ceremonies, Their Royal Highnesses will proceed to the Central Hall, where the members of the Municipal Board will present an address, to which His Royal Highness the Prince will reply, and the members of the Board will be presented to Their Royal Highnesses. From the Central Hall the Royal party drive to Government House, via Station Road, Abbott Road, and past the Church for breakfast. At 10 A.M. the Mizajpursi ceremony will take place, and at midday His Royal Highness will receive the Nawab of Rampur and then the Raja of Tehri. Shortly after 3 P.M. the Royal party will leave Government House via Hazratganj, the Strand Road and Shahmina Road, to the site of the new Medical College, the foundation stone of which will be laid by His Royal Highness. The Hon'ble Sir John Stanley will present the address praying His Royal Highness to lay the stone, and after this has been done, the Prince of Wales will reply to the address. On the conclusion of the ceremony a visit will be paid to the Residency, where the Mutiny veterans will be drawn up in front of the D. C. L. I. monument. This visit will be a private one. After dinner the same evening a deputation of Taluqdars will invite Their Royal Highnesses to an entertainment at the Kaiserbagh when another address will be presented and replied to and this will be followed by a display of fireworks. On Wednesday morning His Royal Highness will receive Sulaiman Kadr, Mirza Muhammad Hasan Ali, Bahadur, of the ex-Royal family of Oudh, and his son, and later on some representative Taluqdars. He will then return the visit of the Nawab of Rampur, and in the afternoon there will be a garden party at the Husainabad Park given by the members of the United Service and Mahomed Bagh Clubs. In the evening there will be a State dinner at the Chutter Manzil followed by a reception, when presentations will be made in an informal manner. On Thursday morning the Prince will drive round cantonments, and at 1-15 P.M. Their Royal Highnesses will leave Government House for the railway station, the Royal train leaving Lucknow at 1-30. The departure will be private.

Pioneer.—Last night after dinner the Prince and Princess paid a visit to the Taj in order to see the full effect of the moonlight on the building. This morning they attended Church parade service at the Cantonment Church, which was filled with a large congregation. A short sermon was preached by the Bishop of Lucknow, who in the course of his local references dwelt upon the extraordinary toleration shown by Akbar to all creeds. In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses paid a visit to the tomb of Itmad-ud-Daulah, Persian Wazir of Jehangir and grandfather of Mumtaz Mahal, in whose memory Shah Jehan built the Taj. Nur Jehan built this tomb to honour her father's remains in 1628, six years after his death, and with its Pathan domes it represents a style of architecture not found elsewhere in Agra. The arabesque mosaic work and pierced marble screens are among its attractive features. The Chini-ka-Roza, with its tomb covered with printed enamel, near the Itmad-ud-Daulah, was also seen. The Royal party likewise visited the Taj to-day and saw it in the full blaze of the sun, a view perhaps not so impressive as when its serene beauty is revealed by moonlight, but still its marvellous charm cannot be resisted whenever one approaches it, and Their Royal Highnesses must have felt this as many thousands have felt it before. No description has ever done justice to the wonderful edifice which Shah Jehan caused to be raised and in which he and his beloved wife now lie, and it would be idle to attempt to write yet once more of this dream in marble, and the associations which it calls up. The Taj Mahal has an enduring fame and centuries have failed to detract from it. Poet and painter, historian and archaeologist have alike striven in vain to disclose to those who have never gazed upon it all the beauty of the building and all the merits of its design and ornamentation. The Taj must be seen and must be viewed reverently not once but many times. Then one has one's reward and the living image remains that can never be dulled by contact with less ethereal things.

But to the visitor who has not been here for some years there is a new charm about the Taj and the buildings that form part of the whole architectural group. The changes that have been made since Lord Curzon directed his attention to Agra and its historical monuments are now seen in their full effect. The entrance is no longer flanked by filthy huts and the squalor of a bazar. These excrescences have been swept away and one passes through grassy spaces dotted with trees and miniature lakes to the very gateway. The Park, which is eventually to stretch from the Fort to the Taj and which has already effaced many of the ugly ravines and bare low mounds, is transforming this part of Agra, and we must be grateful to Sir Antony MacDonnell, as well as Lord Curzon, that the change has been brought about. The arid brownness of the land has nearly vanished and yet in a little time the skilled hand of Mr. Grierson will work more marvels in planting and gardening. But not only in the approach to the Taj has good work been done, for within the encircling walls Lord Curzon spent much of his energy and enthusiasm. The courtyard is perfectly kept and certain of the arcades have been restored, the marble water channels are in order, and repairs in many directions have been carefully and artistically carried out. The simplicity of the whole structure has been jealously guarded and where flaws were found in wall or screen the restoration has been made with a tender regard for the original design. The garden no longer presents the appearance of a jungle, and if the tall cypresses on either side of the main water channel have gone, there are others planted, and the opening out of the avenue gives us a far more beautiful view of the Taj itself. The side mosques are still marked by trees, but efforts have been made to work on lines that will eventually give a beautiful garden in keeping with the spirit of the palace. One marks the recent changes with satisfaction and pleasure, for they have unquestionably been prompted by the highest ideals.

Times.—The Prince and Princess of Wales went by motor-car to-day to Fatehpur Sikri. They greatly enjoyed their visit, their interest in everything connected with Akbar being especially great.

Fatehpur Sikri affords perhaps an even more complete picture of the life of the Mogul Court than even Agra or Delhi. For it was a city built d'embles by the greatest of Mogul Emperors for his own residence, a city conjured up within a few years by his Imperial fiat on a bare sandstone ridge, hallowed by the tomb of a Moslem saint, and abandoned by him again a few years later on account of its unhealthiness. It has never been dwelt in since that time, nearly three centuries ago, and for that reason, perhaps, has been subjected to less wanton damage during the subsequent invasions of India. Lord Curzon, moreover, applied himself during his tenure of office to have Fatehpur Sikri cleared and repaired with no less skill and the thoroughness than the Moghul palaces at Agra and Delhi themselves. One can, therefore, wander now all through the Audience Hall and the Council Chamber, through the Treasury and the Record Office, as well as through the Emperor's private apartments and those of the ladies of his Court, including the much-discussed House of Miriam with its reputed fresco of the Annunciation, and reconstitute, with complete accuracy at any rate of locality, the public and private surroundings amidst which for a few short years Akbar lived and carried on the administration of his vast dominions. Built entirely in red sandstone in the purest style of Hindu architecture, and decorated by skilled workmen and artists drawn from all parts, including even, as one inscription tells us, painters from China, no more striking monument exists of the great Emperor's eclecticism, as well as of his love of symmetry and order, than this wonderful city, erected as a model seat of government by a Mussulman conqueror round a Mussulman shrine in accordance with all the canons of Hindu art, peculiar to the people he had conquered but altogether alien to his own race and creed.

The splendid mausoleum in which Akbar himself rests at Sikandra, a few miles from Agra, has very properly come in for an equal share of Lord Curzon's solicitude, and the restoration of the four minarets, destroyed, it is believed, by the Jats in the eighteenth century, over the great gateway, has just been completed in time for the Royal visit. It is satisfactory to think that the admirable impulse given by the ex-Viceroy to the restoration and preservation of the great historical remains of ancient India is not likely to slacken, though he will no longer be in the country to provide the stimulus of his keen personal interest. The Department of Archaeology has been placed on a sound and permanent basis, and the able Director-General of Archaeology, Mr. J. H. Marshall, with the officials of the Public Works Department who have already responded so zealously to Lord Curzon's call, will continue to carry on the good work.

The Tashi Lama is visiting the celebrated Buddhist ruins of Sarnath, near Benares. Elaborate ceremonies were performed, including the burning of many mounds of ghee, the lighting of hundreds of lamps, the scattering of flowers, and the burning of incense. At the end of this ceremony of adoration the Tashi Lama was transfigured and the other Lamas worshipped him.

Times of India.—The complete programme of the Royal visit to Lucknow has now been published. On the occasion of laying the foundation stone of the new Medical College, Their Royal Highnesses will be received by a Reception Committee, who will be introduced to His Royal Highness by the Lieutenant-Governor. Their Royal Highnesses will then be conducted to the Royal shamiana, where the Hon'ble Sir John Stanley, K.C., Chief Justice, will read an address praying His Royal Highness to lay the foundation stone. His Royal Highness will descend from the dais and lay the stone and will reply to the address.

A deputation of five taluqdars will attend Government House on the night of the 26th to invite Their Royal Highnesses to Kaiser Bagh. The Prince and Princess will on their arrival there, be received by His Highness the Maharaja of Ajodhya and others, and conducted by them to a dais. The President of the British Indian Association will read and present an address; to which His Royal Highness will reply. The taluqdars will then be presented. The President will present attar and pan to Their Royal Highnesses and their suite. Their Royal Highnesses, attended by the President, will proceed to view a display of fire works.

The other functions include a garden party at Husainabad given by the members of the United Service and Mahomed Bagh Clubs and a State dinner and reception and a private visit to the Residency.

The difficulty regarding the Martiniere boys has been settled, and the boys will form part of the guard-of-honour to the Prince at the Residency.

21ST DECEMBER 1905.

Daily Chronicle.—The reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales in the great Mahratta state of Gwalior to-day was the most magnificent and characteristic that has yet been seen during the tour. Time was when the Mahratta chiefs Sindhia and Holkar were the chief enemies of the British arms in India; but Sindhia's power was broken for ever by Lord Gough in the battles of Maharajpore and Punniar in the middle of the last century. During the Mutiny Sindhia himself stood loyal to the British, though his people forsook him and joined the mutineers; and to-day, like Holkar, he is our firm friend. The present Sindhia himself served under Sir Alfred Gaselee in China, and was present at the King's Coronation in London.

To-day, for the first time during the tour, the Prince made his state entry on an elephant. The Prince and Sindhia, and the Princess and Major Daly, the Resident at Gwalior, were mounted together on superb elephants, and, two abreast, rode through the streets which were lined with Imperial Service troops and ancient swordsmen to the Palace. On the way there we passed beneath the shadow of the frowning fortress of Gwalior, which has stood so many a notable siege in history, the last being during the Mutiny, when it was captured from the rebels by Sir Hugh Rose. From that time it remained in British possession until 1886, when it was restored to Sindhia by Lord Dufferin in token of amity.

The procession was a magnificent spectacle, and thoroughly typical of the Mahratta name in history. Spearman, in strange liveries of orange and crimson, camelry with swivel guns, dancing horses in green and gold trappings with garters of green and silver smart well mounted Imperial Service lancers, and alert cadets of the schools where the sons of Sirdars are trained for civil and military employ, followed each other in bizarre array, the modern treading hard on the heels of the ancient world. Then there were elephants with howdahs of beaten gold, cloths of crimson and heavy embroidered gold, with the Prince's feathers and motto painted on their heads, while the mahouts wielded a golden ankus, or driving prod. The staff followed on elephants scarcely inferior in point of the brilliancy of their housings, and a score of Sirdars on elephant brought up the rear.

The scene as the procession swung into the courtyard of the palace, with silver-toned bells tinkling and footmen raising a cry of welcome, was brilliant in the extreme. In the afternoon the Prince opened the Victoria Memorial Market, and started an electric light installation. The Royal party remain here until Monday next and three days' tiger-shooting have been arranged. We spend Christmas Day here, and arrive at Lucknow on the 26th.

Englishman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales entered Gwalior to-day in more truly imperial fashion than on any occasion since they arrived in India. After being received by the Maharaja at the station they mounted the magnificent elephants which were in readiness outside the enclosure. The Prince rode with the Maharaja and the Princess with Major Daly, the Agent to the Governor General. The procession which was then formed was the most magnificent that has ushered Their Royal Highnesses into any Indian city. Through streets lined with the Imperial Service troops and the picturesque swordsmen of a century ago it passed the smart Imperial Service Lancers, camelry with swivel guns, spearmen in orange and crimson and palki-bearers, and then the elephants. Riding abreast were those of Their Royal Highnesses the Maharaja and Major Daly, superb beasts magnificently caparisoned in cloths of crimson and gold, with heads and trunks painted with the Prince's arms and motto. Then followed the Staff in full uniform and on elephants scarcely inferior to those ridden by Their Royal Highnesses and a score of the principal sirdars on hathis with trailing cloths of orange and gold. In this gorgeous manner the procession swept through a reverent throng to the palace, there it passed through the courtyard, and to the main entrance where Their Royal Highnesses dismounted down an easy ladder. This was the most distinctively Indian episode in the whole tour. Later in the day the usual visits were made and this afternoon His Royal Highness opens a new market.

It was reserved for His Highness the Maharajah of Scindia of Gwalior to welcome Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, in the truest Indian fashion, by a great state procession on elephants. The elephant is the real imperial beast. The four-horsed carriage which has hitherto done duty on the tour is a recent importation by comparison. And the employment of elephants on a large scale for the entry into this Mahratta city invested the ceremony with a far more distinctive Indian character than any which have gone before. At Udaipur the feudatories were more interesting because they lined the route in the torn costumes and battered armour of centuries ago. At Jaipur the assemblage of the retainers more accurately depicted India in the early days of villainous saltpetre. But the march of gorgeously caparisoned elephants through Gwalior was the real Imperial India. It was redolent of the East and yielded a series of the most oriental pictures Their Royal Highnesses have yet seen.

The scenes in the streets of this typical Mahratta city, though like many witnessed in Jaipur and Udaipur had their own peculiar character. There were the matchlockmen with covered guns who guard the Maharajah's sleep, the camelry with wooden swivel blunderbusses, the spearmen, the circus horses with nodding plumes and garters of green, and the Imperial Service Lancers in natty uniforms, Imperial Service Infantry in riflemen's green and household troops with obsolete rifles. All this we have seen before on many occasions, but not the virgy swordsmen on tough country-breds who stood silently in the second line. For these were the descendants of the dread Maharatta horse, who wore down the Mughal power and scourged India from Satara to Delhi and Bombay to the Bay of Bengal. Bassein with its round walls, Calcutta with its Maharatta Ditch, Delhi with its story of a captive sovereign, Rajputana with its shorn districts, and the Central Provinces with their towers of refuge bear witness to the widespread power of these irregular cavalry in their palmy days, these Decanni rats, in the phrase of John Jacob who believed in them. Besides these survivals of a great fighting force there was a distinctiveness in the decorations and the crowd. Failing flowers the roadside burst into trees with paper palm shaped leaves and brilliant blossoms, and myriads of flags. The people clustered most thickly on the prow of the rock fort and the streets near the palace. As they were garbed for the most part in white with gorgeous headgear the play of light on the brilliant turbans was delightful.

A noble sight it was to see thirty-six of these regal brutes in all the pomp and circumstances of oriental state, arrayed in readiness for the Royal visitors. Those for the Prince and Princess were gigantic animals, painted from head to foot a slatey grey with the Prince of Wales' feathers on their foreheads, the historic motto "Ich dien" beneath and a list of fanciful ornamentation in green and vermilion round the eyes and ears. Their howdahs were of carved wood, sheathed in beaten gold, and trappings of crimson cloth, heavily brodered with Scindia's arms, almost swept the ground. In their ears were huge earrings of gold, their massive frontals were sheathed with gold mail and screened with shields of rhinoceros hide, whilst solid silver toras ringed their huge ankles. The mahouts or jowdars as they are locally termed bore chowries of peacocks' feathers fixed in sockets of gold studded with gems and urged on their unwieldy chargers with ankuses of gold, whilst from the trappings hung silver gilt bells which tinkled melodiously as the brutes moved restlessly from side to side. Except that silver was substituted for gold the accoutrements of the elephants for the staff were scarcely less magnificent. Here the decorative fancy of the jowdars was given freer play. A favourite device was of twin tigers, the tails beginning jointly down the trunk and bifurcating into two vividly yellow tigers, one round each eye of the elephant. The eye of the tiger corresponded with that of the elephant and when the hathi winked it looked for all the world as if the tiger were alive. Beyond again on a score of elephants just as brilliantly painted and with sweeping clothes of crimson and orange were the principal Sirdars of the State. As a display of profuse oriental magnificence the spectacle was superb.

Again the scene changed and one stepped back a century in beholding a swarm of spearmen carrying enormous weapons and accompanied by raucous music, then to the present again, when another mounted band played up the Cadet Corps. The Maharajah maintains amongst other educational institutions two colleges for the sons of his Sirdars, one to fit them for civil employ and the other to equip them for duty with the Imperial Service Troops. Both joined in furnishing this part of the escort, and uncommonly smart they looked, too, in trim uniforms of blue and white and well mounted and sitting like soldiers. All this was but the prelude to the great feature of the day, the elephant procession. Round the bend in the road came the head of the column two abreast, His Royal Highness riding with the Maharajah and the Princess of Wales with Major Daly, the Agent to the Governor General in Central India. Succeeded the staff in their dark blue uniforms, then came the Sirdars in motley array. When the road was blocked with these monstrous beasts, shuffling along with their peculiar gait, their gay trapping glistening in the strong sunlight, it was indeed a vivid blaze of colour. And as they passed under the gateway the melodious notes of their silver bells pleasantly smote the ear. Through the gardens wound Their Royal Highnesses and their retinue, round the great courtyard of the palace and so to the main entrance where all dismounted. The Prince and Princess were so struck with their experience that they came to the front of the palace to see the painted monsters led away.

Through scenes thus recalling the wild Mahratta days, the cortege moved towards the palace at a stately walk. The spec-taole, as it passed under the gateway, was extraordinarily picturesque. The State Lancers in their handsome blue and white uniforms, with dancing lance pennons lined the road, and the women crowding on the flat house tops splashed the background with colour. Down this guarded way came the Camelry with their soft swishing motion, then two score mounted swordsmen, their war horns wailing and tomtoms beating erratically. More swordsmen quilted in doublets of purple and orange pantaloons, sowers with squealing fifes and footmen bearing the heraldic emblems of the State. Now the road was alive with showy chargers caparisoned in red and gold and silver, with bells on their backs and garters round their knees. These passed, and it was crowded with porters carrying gilded palkis. Following the mounted band that played "God Bless the Prince of Wales" were the State Lancers with fluttering pennons and gleaming lance points, and they in turn gave way to a powerfully horsed battery in the column of route.

Escorted by the smart Imperial Service Lancers in blue and white and the footmen in ochre and claret liveries, Her Highness, the Maharani and her mother drove up amidst cries of "Hohrabahm salaam," and passed into the pardah enclosure. A little later came His Highness, an intensely alert and active figure, in a pink surtout embroidered with gold and crossed with the ribbon of the Victorian Order and wearing the characteristically cocked Mahratta turban. His only ornament was a neckless of pearls of priceless value. The ceremonies at the station were of the simplest. As the train steamed in His Royal Highness in the dress uniform of a general and the Princess in an exquisite costume of hand-painted silk and old lace were received by the Maharaja, whilst the guns from the fine old fort, which crowns the hill rising like a gigantic battleship from the yellow plain, roared out a Royal salute. In the graceful shamiana of delicate shades of pink, yellow and green were gathered the Maharajah's guests, including General Sir Archibald Hunter, but no figure was more conspicuous than that of the sprightly little Sitolia as the senior Sirdar of the State, booted and spurred and in the smart uniform of the Gwalior Cadet Corps. The guard of honour in dark rifle-green and cocked cap of the fashion of the Gurkha regiments was inspected, and their Royal Highnesses mounted by a flight of easy steps the royal elephant.

The palace at Gwalior is a huge modern pile in the Italian fashion and washed the whitest of whites, but the hall where the durbar was held soon after Their Royal Highnesses' arrival is a more restful apartment, decorated in cream and gold with some of the largest glass chandeliers ever made. The ceremony was quite unique in its way, combining a durbar with the formal and return visits, and was watched with keen appreciation by the Princess from the Library. Having been received with all due ceremony and conducted to the chair of state, His Royal Highness entered into close conversation with Seindia. The Maharaja then left his seat and personally presented his twelve leading Sirdars, commencing with the little Sitolia, men in whom the Mahratta characteristics were very strongly marked. Conspicuous amongst those presented was Sir Michael Filose, the head of the family which has been so long and honourably connected with the State. There then entered a solemn body of perfectly drilled retainers who bore trays with the vessels containing attar, pan, and gold braided hars and the parchejat ornaments, and weapons to be presented to His Royal Highness, and laid them on the ground. The parchejat comprised beautifully embroidered cloths of every kind, the ornaments were studded with diamonds and the weapons everything from a bow and arrow to a muzzle-loading gun. Outside were arrayed the ceremonial gifts of animals, five elephants and six horses. The Maharajah gave itra pan to His Royal Highness and put a hand-some har round his neck. The Prince garlanded the Maharaja in return, and the staff having been similarly honoured the gifts were removed and the Prince departed. It was a most dignified and interesting ceremony.

The people of Gwalior offered their welcome to the Royal visitors in the afternoon, when they drove to Lashkar, to open the Victoria Memorial Market. Lashkar, it should be mentioned, is the real capital of the State, Gwalior town being a small place on the way to the fort. The purchase of the memorial is described in the speech of the Maharajah, delivered when his Royal visitors had driven through the streets packed with an enthusiastic population to the shamiana in front of the market.

His Royal Highness now proceeded to open the building, and the manner thereof was original. With a jewelled gold key he opened a massive gold souvenir padlock. This had engraved on the face likenesses of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Maharajah, and illustrations of the palace, the fort, the laying of the foundation stone of the market by the Duke of Connaught and the finished building. These were surmounted by the arms of the Prince of Gwalior. Unlocking the casket His Royal Highness pulled a handle and a curtain rolled up opening the building. After half an hour spent in examining a collection of the products of the State, temporarily housed in the market, the Prince of Wales returned to the shamiana and pressing a button flooded the building with a blaze of coloured lights, thus inaugurating the new electric light works which have cost three lakhs of rupees.

The drive back to the palace was through streets softly illuminated with chiraghs, and crowded with as dense and as pleased throngs of people as any which have met Their Royal Highnesses in this eventful progress, but the most effective feature of the decorations—a feature more pleasing even than the illumination of the old fort and a blaze of fireworks therefrom—was flight after flight of fire balloons. These were sent up in their hundreds until they formed a new Milky Way of enormous stars right across the firmament.

Harking back to Agra for a moment, His Royal Highness before leaving invested Major Smallwood, who did excellent work in connection with the Durbar and laid out the camp at the Circuit House with an M.V.O. of the fourth class. He also presented Mr. Grierson, the officer in charge of the Taj Mahal gardens, and the Sergeant at the Fort with the Victorian Medal.

Indian Daily News.—Their Royal Highnesses reached Gwalior this morning, and had a striking and brilliant reception, making their entry riding upon State elephants. The Maharaja Seinda met the Prince and Princess at the Morar station and accompanied them in the Royal train to Gwalior station where, after the introductions of Sardars and others, the Prince mounted an elephant with the Maharaja, the Princess being accompanied on another by Major Daly, Agent to the Governor General. The members of the Royal suite mounted ten other elephants. The procession included the State Cavalry and Artillery and the Sardars and Military School Cadets besides a large number of picturesque retainers.

It was a truly oriental reception that Their Royal Highnesses received this morning and the State procession to the Maharaja Seindia's Jai Bilas Palace had a distinction which gave the reception an exceptional place among the striking incidents which have attended the welcome of the Prince and Princess in the Native States. The scene at the Gwalior Railway station was one full of the most vivid chromatic effects. The arrival platform had become a most tasteful shamiana hung with gossamer fabrics of delicate hues of pink, saffron and pale green, gracefully draped, and flags of bright red, yellow and green silks lined with gold floated above the great tent. Half of the shamiana was screened off and enclosed for the Maharani, and in the rest of the shamiana an assembly of richly bejewelled and gold embroidered Sardars was gathered along with Political and Military Officers and a numerous gathering of other European guests of His Highness. Lining the road facing the brilliant shamiana were the thirty-six State elephants, their bodies newly painted in grey, their foreheads decorated in elaborate designs and bearing gold and silver howdahs and the richest of jhools and ornaments. All but the Royal beasts reserved for Their Royal Highnesses and the suite, were already mounted by men whose head dresses and robes formed banks of the warmest colour. The elephant which was to bear the Prince and the Maharaja had a gold howdah richly chased, gold and a scarlet jhool, a frontlet of gold chain mail with a circular embossed shield, a massive gold chain around its neck, and ornaments of gold filagree work covering its ears. Its face was painted with a design of the Prince of Wales's plumes, and the mahout sitting in front of the howdah waved a whisk of drooping peacock's feathers. The second beast, which was to carry the Princess, was almost identically adorned, except for a difference in the design of the howdah and a frontlet of silver instead of gold. State troops and retainers, cavalry and infantry, filled in the spaces of the picture around the station, and on the platform men of the Maharaja's Rifle Regiment formed a guard of honour.

It was half-past ten before the Royal train, amid a salvo of artillery, drew up at the reception platform. The Prince wore a military uniform. The presentation of the Sardars and officials was made by Major Daly, the Governor General's Agent, the ceremony occupying only a few minutes. The youngest and one of the most important of the Sardars present, was a boy of about eleven, wearing the uniform of Scindia's Cavalry. The Prince proceeded to inspect the guard of honour and simultaneously the Princess, accompanied by Mrs. Daly, proceeded to the screened enclosure to see the Maharanees. Her Royal Highness returned with a beautiful bouquet. The Royal elephants, which had been brought alongside the steps leading from the platform and had lowered their ponderous bodies till their girths touched the ground, were then mounted by the aid of the staircase gangways, and the procession moved off amid cries of salutations by the Maharaja's retainers who escorted the two Royal elephants. The thirty-six beasts moved in pairs and a very imposing sight they were with howdahs and jhools, flashing back the rays of the brilliant sunlight. The other details of the procession were also striking comprising as they did the Cavalry and Artillery, led horses sumptuously caparisoned, cavalry and bands, State palkies, and all the ceremonial emblems which accompany a State cavalcade. The route was lined by State troops, looking unusually smart, many wearing white puggarees and nearly all wearing miniatures of the Maharaja in their head-dresses. The military display was exceptionally fine, but behind the troops were lines of horsemen in more picturesque oriental garb. The line along the roads was continued by spearmen backed by great throngs of people in the brightest of festal attire. The decorations really approached the beautiful, delicate silken streamers and masses of artificial flowers being strung from lines of masts with charming effect. The procession moved along to the shrill native music of the numerous bands to the Jai Bilas Palace, a Royal salute of artillery announcing the arrival there of Their Royal Highnesses. At one o'clock a Durbar was held, and this afternoon the Prince opens the Victoria Memorial Market.

The Durbar held in the Jai Bilas Palace this afternoon was a ceremonial of great and stately impressiveness, having, like the splendid entry of the Emperor's son into Gwalior, features which have not been witnessed at any Durbar ceremonial previously seen. Four Sardars waited upon His Royal Highness to invite him to the Durbar, and the Prince reached the Durbar Hall by way of the pink room and the crystal staircase of the palace. The scene, as His Royal Highness and the Maharaja took their seats on silver chairs, was brilliant in the extreme. The Agent to the Governor General and the Resident occupied glass chairs to the right and left of the dais, and the members of the Royal suite and the staffs of the Agent and the Resident were provided with gilt chairs on the right. The Sardars and officers of the State were massed in four rows on the left. On the terrace facing the Durbar Hall and lining the staircase was a guard of honour of the Maharaja's troopers in uniforms of blue and white. The approach of His Royal Highness was heralded by flourishes of trumpets and a Royal salute was fired as he entered the hall. The distinctive feature of the ceremony was the presentation of the nuzzar by twelve Sardars whom the Maharaja named to His Royal Highness. The tribute was borne in on trays and took the form of parcheat composed of Indian cloths.

Along with ornaments consisting of a diamond studded aigrette, a kade job with diamonds, a diamond ring, diamond armlets, a necklace and a serfeh as well as a number of weapons. These latter included muzzle-loading guns, spears, a semitar, a pesh qabaz, a khand, a beautifully adorned steel bow and quiver, two singadas, a una, and a shield. Outside the palace, as part of the tribute, stood five elephants, three with velvet jhools, one furnished with a banat jhool, and one carrying a silver howdah. There were also six horses saddled and caparisoned. Following the presentation of the nazar, trays of itra pan and hars of gold braid were brought in. The itra pan was presented to the Prince by the Maharaja, who also garlanded him with a har. His Royal Highness next garlanded His Highness, and after the presentation of pan to the Agent, the Resident, and the Chief of the Royal staff by the Maharaja, and to the rest of the staff by the Naib Dewan and the Falke Sahib, the ceremonial was at an end. The Prince departed under a Royal salute. The Durbar was witnessed by the Princess from the library.

This evening His Highness the Prince of Wales performed the ceremony of opening a market hall erected as Gwalior's memorial of the late Queen-Empress. The building is a handsome structure in cream of an Oriental design with a very effectively designed clock tower. The opening ceremony was performed in the midst of a setting unusually picturesque and tastefully admirable. There was an abundance of vivid colouring in the large gathering which witnessed the ceremony, a brilliant assembly being massed in a gracefully arranged and artistic shamiana facing the market hall, while the surrounding buildings and the road spaces were packed with masses of animated colouring. An ornamental garden fronted the shamiana. A guard of honour in dark blue and scarlet edged the scene with great effect. Their Royal Highnesses drove through the crowded and decorated city lined by State troops and reached the market place where His Highness the Maharaja was already in waiting at the shamiana. Precisely at half-past five they were escorted by fifty Sillehdari Sowars in pink garb carrying bucklers and spears, a regiment of the Maharaja's cavalry in dark blue tunics faced with scarlet, and wearing white head-dresses and breeches, and by the Sardar's School Cadets, a body of young horsemen whose yellow and silver turbans caught the eye as being prettily distinctive. Their Highnesses the Prince and Princess took their seats upon silver chairs placed on a dais carpeted with elephant jhools of the costliest kind and enclosed by delicate draperies, and His Highness the Maharaja, President of the Municipality, immediately opened the proceedings by reading the following address:—

Your Royal Highness,—On behalf of the citizens of Lashkar, I, as President of their Municipal Corporation, beg to offer Your Royal Highnesses a most hearty welcome to this town. It will not be out of place to give Your Royal Highnesses a brief history of this town and of the work done by the municipality since its establishment. This town was founded in the year 1810 by my ancestor, His (late) Highness Maharaja Dowlat Rao Scindia. The gateway to Your Royal Highness' right was the nucleus of the town, and as time went on the other buildings arose without any idea of symmetry or regard to the preservation of sanitation. All the roads in the town at this time were of paved stone, and the whole town practically was a fortuitous combination of buildings of all shapes and kinds. As the people learn better, the successive streets open and marked an improvement upon the previous ones, of which the Jiwaji Bazar, called after my father, is an example. The Lashkar Municipality was founded in the year 1887, but for years it was on a less ambitious footing than at present. The deficiency was remedied in the year 1898, and the present body was properly organised with sub-committees for various circles and a sufficiency of members. The income of the Municipality prior to its remodelling amounted to about Rs. 50,000, but the durbar has recently supplemented it, thus bringing the total annual income to Rs. 1,28,000. One of the consequences of its increased revenues is that the town is to-day possessed of an arrangement which will make it a blaze of light directly Your Royal Highness touches the button beneath your hand. An endeavour is now being made to improve the sanitation and the architecture of the town, and in addition to these proposals the Municipality aims at having a large public garden, a town hall and an electric tram service. These are rather ambitious schemes, but it is hoped they will become accomplished facts in course of time. The market building, which I have the honour to request Your Royal Highness to declare open this afternoon, is built to perpetuate the memory of Her Most Gracious Majesty the late Queen-Empress. The building cost Rs. 38,000, which was paid by public subscription, and it was designed by Sirdar Balwant Rao Scindia who, I think, may be congratulated on his performance. The foundation stone of the building was laid by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and it is a happy coincidence that Your Royal Highness is opening it. Taking advantage of the present occasion we have organised a little exhibition of indigenous products. In addition to the industrial products there are also exhibited articles turned out by the Maharani's Girls' School and the Technical Institute. The former will illustrate the progress made in the State by female education and the latter for the prosperity of trade. In this State it was considered necessary to encourage handicrafts, and to fulfil this object the Technical Institute was opened in the month of July of this year. It is customary with municipal bodies always to ask for favours, and true to the traditions of our species we are asking Your Royal Highness to do us not one, but two favours. I trust therefore that Your Royal Highness will now be graciously pleased to open the Victoria Memorial Market and the electric installation.

The speech was received with cordial applause.

His Royal Highness replied as follows:—

Your Highness and members of the Municipal Committee of Lashkar,—It has given the Princess of Wales and myself great satisfaction to accept your interesting address, and to observe from it that in matters of local self-government the Gwalior State is adopting a wise and forward policy. I have much pleasure in acceding to your request that I should open the Victoria Memorial Market and inaugurate the city's installation of electric lighting. I trust that for many years to come these undertakings will prove of great benefit to the city of Lashkar and bear testimony to the enterprise of its municipality and the philanthropic zeal of His Highness the Maharaja.

The Maharaja then presented to His Royal Highness Colonel Sir Michael Filose, Vice-President of the Municipality, Sirdar Bulwant Rao Scindia, designer of the market building and Pundit Pran Nath, Chairman of the Municipality, who, with the other members of the board, stood in front of the dais while His Highness read the address. The introductions concluded, His Royal Highness advanced to a pillar, opened a large golden padlock with a golden key lifted the top of the pillar which the lock had secured as a lid, and pulled a lever hidden within the cavity of the pillar. Instantly a velvet curtain covering the entrance at the market hall opposite ascended, and the interior of the hall was illuminated. Their Royal Highnesses, accompanied by the Maharaja and the staff, entered the hall, where they spent more than half an hour inspecting an exhibition of local products. Dusk had meanwhile fallen, and the shamiana illuminated by chandeliers, and the surrounding buildings lined by small chirags, were in brilliant glow. When Their Royal Highnesses quitted the market hall the lights therein were extinguished, but the Prince returned to a second pedestal, touched a button concealed upon a small ivory elephant and instantly the market hall was outlined in the loveliest tints of light as by the touch of a magician's wand. In this manner the installation of the electric light was most successfully inaugurated, the red, yellow and blue lamps covering the new building being illuminated by electricity. The Prince and Princess and the rest of the guests were thereafter garlanded with hars of gold braid.

The return to the palace was made through an effectively illuminated city.

To-morrow morning the Prince reviews the State troops.

Madras Mail.—The arrangements for the reception of the Prince and Princess in Calcutta are now nearly complete. The principal special functions will be the presentation of the Address of Welcome by the Municipality at Prinsep's Ghat, where Their Royal Highnesses will land after crossing the river from Howrah by steamer, and an entertainment upon the Maidan on the 2nd January, which will be of an entirely Indian character. The features of the Maidan Entertainment will be the garlanding of Their Royal Highnesses with flowers, the offering to them of attar, sandal, saffron, and musk, also of four gold plates, each containing a cocoanut, some paddy, some blades of grass, a gold coin and flowers, being the national emblems of fertility and plenty. The school children along the route will welcome Their Highnesses and a Bengali song will be sung, which has been translated as follows:—

"Hail! Prince and Princess, all hail to thee,

With joyous voice we welcome sing,

As bursting into festive glee,

Bengala greets her future King.

Though humble our reception be,

And though our strains may halting run,

The loyal heart we bring to thee

Is warmer than our Eastern Sun,"

There will also be Sikkim and Bhutanese dances, a Tibetan Ghost Dance, Indian quarter-staff play, and illuminations and fireworks.

Pioneer.—Among those presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales during their stay at Delhi was Mr. Stanley Skinner, grandson of the fine soldier who raised Skinner's Horse in 1803. As he holds a Commission of Lieutenant in the Regiment, Their Royal Highnesses were naturally interested in seeing him, for more than a hundred years have passed since Skinner's "yellow boys" first became known. The Prince has graciously accepted a copy of Baillie Fraser's Life of Colonel James Skinner, a very rare book now. The author was a brother of William Fraser, Resident at Delhi, who was Second-in-Command of the Regiment in the earlier part of the last century. In commemoration of the Royal visit, Lieutenant Skinner intends placing a tablet in the Church at Delhi, which James Skinner built, and in which he lies buried. This will be inscribed with the names of officers of Skinner's Horse killed in action, and the list will be added to in case of further casualties in future campaigns. The tablet will be erected on behalf of the regiment, of which the Prince of Wales is Colonel, and which furnished his escort at Rawalpindi.

Pioneer.—The Prince and Princess proceeded this morning by motor-car to Fatehpur-Sikri staying there for lunch and motoring back in the afternoon. The car was a Serpolette and made a fine run, doing the distance back under the hour. Fatehpur-Sikri is the city which Akbar built only to abandon four or five years after its completion. The palaces and their courtyards, the Hall of Audience, the Council Chamber, the public offices, the stables, all stand desolate as they have stood for over three centuries, with the mystery of the House of Miriam to add to impressions that these groups of magnificent buildings produce. One can wander all through the deserted halls gazing in ever-increasing admiration and yet remembering how short-lived was the glory of this Moghal capital. The unhealthiness of the neighbourhood is one of the reasons assigned for its abandonment. Another is that the hermit Sheikh Salem Chisti, whose descendants still guard his tomb on the hill, persuaded Akbar to move his Court to Agra and have his residence within the Fort there. Be that as it may, we have still left to us the wonderful results that sprang from Akbar's original intention to create at Fatehpur-Sikri a great city, his indomitable will raising on a low barren ridge all that we see to-day. The place is remarkable in that it discloses Hindu art and architecture in its highest form though built by a Moghal Emperor, and not even the iconoclastic tendencies of Aurangzeb wrought much mischief in after years. There are images defaced, it is true, but on the whole the damage done was not great compared with that wrought in other parts of India by Mussulman zeal and fanaticism. The carvings, the sculptured work, the fine pillars and screens remain to testify to the skill of the thousands of workmen in whom the love of art must have been great; otherwise their work would not have been so good and enduring. One hears as a legend in Agra now that cunning artisans and painters were brought from afar and that even some came from China, and one can well believe that many nationalities shared in the building of Fatehpur-Sikri. Within the last few years a Viceroy and two Lieutenant-Governors have done a grand work in preserving and restoring the splendid structures which make Agra so famous, and to Lord Curzon especially Fatehpur-Sikri owes much. It now presents that appearance of order and preservation which are eloquent of careful thought and well-balanced archaeological enthusiasm, and its future seems secure. The Prince has realised the greatness of Akbar's work and his genius as a ruler, and every building which is linked with the great Emperor's name has a marked interest for him. The Princess of Wales will have another opportunity of gratifying her strong artistic sense, for Her Royal Highness will renew her acquaintance with Agra some two months hence, while the Prince is shooting in the Nepal Terai.

In conclusion, it need only be said that the stay of the Royal party here has been an extremely pleasant one, and that the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady LaTouche and the Staff have done everything to make it a success. Their Royal Highnesses have seen every place of interest in Agra and its neighbourhood, and the beauties of the Taj and the Moghal palaces have been indelibly impressed upon their memories. The camp about the Circuit House, where Sir James and Lady LaTouche have entertained them, was so delightfully placed that from many points within it excellent views could be obtained, and the stretch of the park below was in itself a restful feature of the landscape. The camp, perfectly laid out by Major Smallwood, R. A., who pitched the great camp at Delhi for the Durbar, was replete with comfort, and the Royal Suite and the Lieutenant-Governor's guests were housed under canvas in a luxurious manner. The Prince showed his great appreciation of Major Smallwood's labours, which have not been confined to this Camp alone, by presenting him personally with the M. V. O. this evening.

As to Agra city its demonstrations of loyalty were hearty and spontaneous, and on the evening of the illuminations especially the crowds were loud in their demonstrations of welcome as the Prince and Princess drove through the streets on their way to and from Sikandra. It was an unmistakable popular demonstration lacking nothing in intensity. The help given by the Municipality in decorating the public roads and setting an example to the Native community as to the manner in which everything should be done must be acknowledged. Their Secretary and Engineer, Mr. Arthur Rogers, worked indefatigably to secure the best results, and his energy had its reward in the highly successful effect secured. The gracious reply of the Prince to the Municipal address of welcome will be long remembered here.

The visit has now come to an end after the most satisfactory fulfilment of the whole programme laid down. The Royal party are leaving for Gwalior to-night.

A good shower of rain fell early this morning—not enough to do lasting good to the crops, but sufficient to improve fodder prospects slightly, and admit of stopping well irrigation for a day or two, thus giving a much needed rest to the hard-worked bullocks. It is hoped that heavier rain has fallen in the district. The natives attribute this good fortune to the Royal visit.

Scotsman.—The Prince and Princess of Wales continue their progress among the shrines of ancient religions and the seats of vanished Empire in Northern India. During the past week they have visited the palaces and fortresses, the temples and mausoleums that attest the grandeur of the Great Mogul at Delhi, at Agra, and at Fatehpur-Sikri. The Mussulman conquerors of India and the splendid edifice of power and wealth which they built up have disappeared, like a tale that has been told. But the monuments of their taste and piety remain; the cities and provinces in which they kept court and held sway are wealthier and more populous than ever; and, under happier auspices and in a milder rule, the homage which once was theirs has, as is attested, at every stage in the Royal tour, been transferred in double measure to the British Raj, visible and incarnate for the moment in the Heir to the Crown. Yesterday Their Royal Highnesses reached the historic fortress of Gwalior, and were there received by the Maharaja Scindia, the descendant of a long line of powerful Mahratta Princes, amid a scene of Oriental state and splendour which, as we are told, surpassed anything they have yet encountered on their tour. There remains in reserve, however, a meeting which will appeal still more strongly to the imaginations, if not to the eyes, of the peoples of Asia, as a sign of the persuasive strength and pacific influence of British power in the East. The Tashi Lama of Tibet has received and has accepted an invitation to meet the Prince in Durbar, and has already descended from the high and well-nigh inaccessible regions in which he has hitherto been hidden from the eye of the world into the plains of India.

Who is the Tashi Lama? The Dalai Lama is not unknown by name and fame; and the recent expedition to Lhasa was made necessary through the Living Buddha having fallen under Russian influence, and shown his anti-British sympathies by repudiating his treaty engagements and indulging in acts of aggression and insult. But there are more Living Buddhas than one. The subject is intricate and obscure. But it would appear that the dominant position assigned to the Grand Lama of Lhasa, whether as secular ruler of Tibet or as head of the Buddhist faith, is neither of long standing nor unchallenged. The Grand Lama of Tashi-lhumpo, near Shigatse, has been recognised as his superior in learning and his equal in sanctity, and sometimes in authority. As far as it is possible for the mere Western intellect to make out, the secular and spiritual head of the Western capital of Tibet is the emanation and incarnation, not exactly of Guatama Buddha himself, but of the principal of Light from which Buddha himself was derived; he is the earthly reflex of the Dpity or Father-God of the Buddhist world; and it has hitherto been the privilege of this powerful and mystic personage to identify and ordain each new incarnation of the Buddha at Lhasa. The Tashi or Teshu Lamas that have become known to us since the British occupation of India have not been wholly worthy of the high place and charge assigned to them. Shigatse has often manifested a marked friendship towards British trade and influence, while Lhasa has remained in late generations consistently hostile and jealous. It was to the great Tashi-lhumpo monastery, one of the wealthiest and most splendid as well as holiest institutions of its kind in Tibet, that Warren Hastings dispatched Bogle and Turner in the Eighteenth Century, and each of these envoys had a kindly reception. During the late troubles the Tashi Lama exerted himself to keep the peace and to bring about an agreement. He and his agents were helpful in bringing about the settlement ultimately reached at Lhasa. By that arrangement the sceptre of the secular and spiritual hierarchy in Tibet was virtually removed from Lhasa and transferred to Shigatse. For the time, if not for all time, the Dalai Lama-ship has been set aside, and the Sacred Figure who presides over the monastery of the Yellow Caps and the magnificent array of the tombs of previous Incarnations of the "Boundless Light" at Tashi-lhumpo may now be regarded as the supreme head of the Buddhist faith, which is professed by something like a third or a fourth of the human race. This "Great Gem of Learning," as he is styled, has shown that he means to support and promote, in the spirit and in the letter, the new and better relations that have established between British India and Tibet. He gave hospitable and honourable entertainment at Shigatse and Tashi-lhumpo to Captain Rawlings and the other British officers charged with the duty of exploring the route to Gartok and opening a new trade mart there; and they were much struck by his intelligence and geniality. He has, it seems, proposed that the trade agency and station of the British Commissioner at Gyantse should be removed to his capital, and has offered to bear the cost of the transfer.

But the crowning proof of his friendship, as well as of his courage and enlightenment, has been his acceptance of the invitation of the Indian Government to be their guest, and to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales on their tour. Such a step on the part of one of the great Spiritual Rulers of Tibet has hitherto been unheard of, and even undreamed of. It would seem to mean that Tibet is at length preparing to break through the shell of exclusiveness within which it has shut itself away for centuries from the knowledge of the outer world, and to yield testimony of the fortunate results in the promotion of goodwill as well as trade that have followed the Lhasa expedition. It is possible that the action of the Tashi Lama may give rise to some heartburnings, not only among the conservative section of Tibetan lamaism, but at Pekin, which, it is understood, will not view with unmixed favour the development of closer intercourse between Tibet and British India. The remarkable thing is that such an enterprise should even have been contemplated. His Holiness the Pope of the Buddhist world has safely accomplished his journey, as far as that supremely sacred shrine of pilgrimage for the votaries of Guatama, Bodhi Gaya, in the province of Behar, south of the Ganges, of the faith. "Never," it is stated, "since the days when India was a Buddhist country has been there seen such a demonstration" as awaited the arrival of the incarnation of Amibotha; and a still more solemn and imposing spectacle is expected to attend his visit to the "Sacred Bo-tree," or peepul, under which the Guatama of the Sixth Century before Christ sat and meditated, until he was withdrawn in soul and body from earth and its passions. Compared with Buddhism, Mohammedanism or even Brahminism, as a dominant religion, is a new comer in India. The roots of the older faith, once spread widely over the land, are still in the earth, and a revival is not impossible. The visit of the Holy Man of the Tibetan Plateau to the plains of India may have a bearing on other matters deeper and higher than the political relations and trade arrangements between Sikkim and Shigatse. But this is perhaps looking too far ahead. It is enough to say that the meeting with the Tashi Lama promises to be one of the most interesting and not the least auspicious incidents in the Royal visit to India.

Times.—At Gwalior Their Royal Highnesses resume the series of visits to the feudatory princes of India which constitutes so important a feature of their tour. To none of greater interest be attached than to their visit to the Maharaja Scindia. For he is to-day not only the foremost representative of the Mahratta chiefs, but one of the most remarkable personalities in India.

Considerable as is the part which the Mahrattas have played in Indian history, they appeared relatively late on its stage, and scarcely one of their present leaders can claim descent from the ancient military or feudal aristocracy of the land. Shivaji, who laid the foundations of the Mahratta power by raiding the western dominions of the Moghul Emperors up to Surat within a few years of the cession of Bombay to the British Crown—i.e., in the middle of the 17th Century—is indeed reputed to have sprung from a scion of the great Rajput house of Udaipur who escaped from the first sack of Chittor, but his son was captured and cruelly done to death by the Emperor Aurangzeb, and his grandson became a mere puppet in the hands of his ambitious Minister, the first Peishwa. The Maharaja of Kolhapur to-day alone, and in an indirect line, represents the Shivaji family. The real makers of the Mahratta Empire were the great Peishwas, Konkan Brahmins, or Chitrapavans, "purifiers of the soul," created, according to Mahratta legends, by the Brahminical hero Parashuram, out of a funeral pyre. Konkan Brahmins were their chief supporters, and the Peishwas' Government at Poona was almost exclusively composed of that caste. The Peishwas themselves have also long since disappeared bequeathing to everlasting infamy the name of the last adopted offshoot of their house, Nana Sahib, the author of the Cawnpore massacre. But it was under the Peishwas that, in the first half of the 18th Century, the forebears of the present Mahratta chiefs sprang to power, Scindia of Gwalior, Holkar of Indore, Gackwar of Baroda—soldiers of fortune of the humblest birth who nevertheless carved out kingdoms for themselves at the point of the sword; Randaji Scindia, the "slipper bearer," for such was the lowly office he first held at the Court of the second Peishwa; Mulhar Rao Holkar, the herdsman, Damaji Gackwar, the shepherd. They and their successors, with others who are now almost forgotten, helped themselves indifferently to the territories of their exhausted Rajput neighbours, to the débris of the Moghul Empire and finally to the Peishwa's own patrimony when his power began in turn to wane. The battle of Panipat in 1761, when Ahmed Shah Durani and his Afghans smote the flower of the Mahratta army, dealt, it is true, a staggering blow to the Mahratta power, but its effects fell more heavily upon the Peishwa than upon his great military chiefs, though most of them were present on the stricken field. As the Peishwa's power waned, that of Scindia and Holkar and Gaekwar waxed. Shah Alam bought off Scindia by placing Delhi and the Moghul throne under his protection; Holkar broadened out his territories in Malwa and Central India, and Gaekwar extended his sway to Gujarat and the Indian Ocean.

Such was the state of anarchy and exhaustion into which India had sunk with the decay of the Mogul Empire that the whole continent would have been at the mercy of the Mahratta power had the latter not challenged by its lawlessness a power greater, though scarcely older, than itself in India—the rising British power. Reluctantly and only after many appeals was it cast into the scales against the Mahrattas. Wellesley, afterwards to be the Duke of Wellington, crushed Scindia at Assaye, whilst in the same year, 1803, Lord Lake released the phantom King of Delhi from Mahratta tutelage. Not until many years afterwards, however, was the Mahratta power finally broken. Though shorn of a large part of their conquests, the leading Mahratta chiefs survived the downfall of the Peishwa, and were allowed to retain their status as ruling princes under the British Raj.

Curiously enough, it is not, however, in the States of either Scindia or Holkar or Gaekwar that the Mahrattas are to be chiefly found to-day. On the contrary, in none of these is the Mahratta population numerically a considerable factor. It is in the Bombay Presidency that they have mostly survived, and Poona, the old seat of government of the Peishwas, is still the stronghold of the national sentiment. If one looks back to the position which the Mahrattas had achieved at the end of the 18th Century, it is perhaps not surprising that the national sentiment should have taken the form of deep-rooted antagonism to the paramount Power which shattered the Mahratta dreams of conquest and supremacy over the whole of India. The Mahrattas have forgotten that their own dissensions began the disintegration of their Empire, and they remember only that it was we who dismembered it. At Poona especially, where the Mahratta Brahmins were all-powerful, religious hatred was superadded to racial and political animosity, and though, owing to their intelligence and aptitude for education, the old ruling caste are still largely represented in the Government offices and administrative departments of the Bombay Presidency, there still prevails unquestionably much bitter resentment at the subordinate position to which they have been reduced. The term Poona Brahmin has, indeed, become unfortunately almost synonymous with disloyalty. The ruling Mahratta Chiefs, on the other hand, have steadfastly kept faith with the Power which spared them, and, like the then rulers of Indore and Baroda, the father of the present Maharaja of Gwalior, the late Scindia, gave signal proof of his own loyalty during the Mutiny, though almost all his troops joined hands with the rebel sepoys, and he himself was driven to seek refuge with the British in Agra.

Of his Highness, whose splendid hospitality the Prince and Princess of Wales are now enjoying, those who know him best speak in terms of highest admiration. Certainly none but a man gifted with remarkable qualities of intellect and character could have achieved at so early an age—he is now only 28 years old—the position he occupies among the ruling princes of India. The Nizam of Hyderabad, who prides himself on being the premier prince of Hindustan in virtue of the area and importance of his State, is believed often to seek his advice; and even the blue-blooded Rajputs sink their ancient resentment of the wrongs they endured at the hands of his ancestors in order to consult with him on matters that are held to affect the common interests of the feudatory States. Singularly accessible to all Western ideas, understanding them even when he does not share them, he takes a keen interest in the administration of his State, which is one of the largest of the Native States in India, with a population of over three millions and an area almost equal to that of Ireland. But he is above all a soldier, as doubtless becomes the descendant of Randsaji Scindia, and he has clearly inherited the capacity for military organization which distinguished the Mahrattas in the heyday of their power. No other Indian prince has availed himself so fully of the opportunities afforded by the system on which the Imperial Service Troops are levied to increase the military strength of his State. That the Maharaja Scindia has no mean ambitions may be readily believed, and the future alone can show to what ultimate goal his ambitions may be directed. But it is not the practice of British statesmanship to discourage the legitimate ambition of the Indian princes or to question their purpose.

Gwalior itself, with its ancient fort crowning an isolated rock which towers abruptly out of the plain—resembling vaguely the hull of some huge battleship as it rises on the horizon—has already played no inconspicuous part in the history of India. It is said to have been founded 17 centuries ago, and its gigantic rock-sculptures, though sadly mutilated in the days of Baber, still bear witness to its fame under Hindu rule before the advent of the Moslem conquerors. In more recent times it was repeatedly the gauge of battle in our hard fought Mahratta wars, and it was beneath its walls that the Rani of Jhansi, in male attire, was cut down by one of Sir Hugh Rose's Husars as she was swept away in the fight of the rebel sepoys whom she had vainly tried to rally against the hated "infidel." The recapture of Gwalior was, in fact, one of the closing scenes of the Mutiny; and it was not until 1886 that, during Lord Dufferin's Viceroyalty, the fort was restored with great pomp and ceremony to the custody of Scindia as a signal proof of amity and confidence on the part of the Government of India.

It would be invidious to say that the reception at Gwalior eclipsed in magnificence that given to the Prince and Princess by the other Native States, but nowhere certainly has it been surpassed. From the steps of the tented pavilion where Their Royal Highnesses alighted from the train with the Maharaja Scindia, who had proceeded to Morar station to welcome them to his State, line after line of living colour stretched away across a sparsely wooded plain towards the scarped cliffs of Gwalior fort, which formed an impressive background to the brilliant scene. In the forefront, inside a hollow square formed by the smart Gwalior Lancers, who furnished also a guard of honour, the State elephants stood massed in the full ceremonial array of gold and silver headpieces, their ears, faces, and trunks elaborately painted in fantastic designs, with velvet trappings heavily embroidered in gold, and burnished howdahs flashing in the sunshine.

After the usual presentations and a private greeting to the Princess by the young Maharani, who specially came to the station for the purpose, the Prince, with the Maharaja, mounted the first elephant, and with the Princess, accompanied by Major Daly, Agent to the Governor General for Central India, on a second elephant, the gorgeous procession moved slowly away, amid the salutations of the crowd, towards the new palace, which was built by the Maharaja's father shortly before the King's visit to India. In the beautiful park surrounding the palace, where Their Royal Highnesses themselves are residing, a huge camp has been laid out, where the Maharaja is entertaining over 100 European guests for the Royal visit. In addition to the camp the Maharaja has rebuilt, or practically built, a spacious guest house, itself a small palace, for the better accommodation of visitors.

A darbar, attended by the leading Sardars of the State, of whom the chief happens to be a bright little boy about ten, who had already this morning attracted the gracious attention of the Prince and Princess at the station, was held at noon in the new palace. It was a brilliant ceremony, and the customary presentation of offerings, which closes these durbars, was an exceptionally picturesque feature, as the Maharaja had taken the greatest pains to follow out ancient precedents in respect both of ceremonial and of the number and variety of objects presented, which included the arms, and full equipment of an old-time Mahratta warrior.

About sunset the Prince opened the Victoria Memorial Market and an electric lighting installation in the modern city, and his return through the illuminated streets was one of the most striking scenes of the Royal tour. The immense crowds lining the streets, filling the windows and balconies, and piled up even on the roofs, the horsemen and men on camels, and the mountainous elephants towering above the crowd, the wonderful carved stonework of the houses, and every architectural detail silhouetted by festoons, of lamps against the blue-black sky—everything combined to form a series of luminous pictures indescribable for variety and picturesqueness. In the daytime the intense whiteness of the walls, the intense blueness of the sky, and the intense brilliancy of the colours under the fierce sunshine convey an impression of almost dazzling crudeness, but the golden haze of innumerable small lamps and lanterns produces an atmosphere of extraordinary softness and mystery, which transfigures the whole scene and for a brief moment translates into reality the fabled visions of The Thousand and One Nights.

22ND DECEMBER 1905.

Daily Telegraph.—Due south from Agra the railway runs to Jhansi. Soon after leaving the red sandstone reefs of Dholpur, and the curiously-ravined and shrivelled banks of the Chambal, the country changes. The row-rigged fields of drifted and drifting sand give way to sparse patches of arable. The inevitable ak plant has been driven away from the little lots in which millet and Indian corn are sown and watered almost with the care that is bestowed upon a garden at home. Deep in the bed of wide nullahs every square yard of irrigable soil is utilised, and agriculture is at higher pressure the farther south one goes. One feels the coming of a strong man's influence.

At last, out of the bosom of the flat, dry cultivated plain rises a gigantic flat rock, two miles in length, and in breadth varying, between 200 and 1,000 yards.

To those who know Chitor the resemblance of Gwalior to the old citadel of Mewar is striking. Except that Chitor is considerably longer, the general likeness is undeniable. In each case a huge rocky prominence rises abruptly from the flat plain to a height of about 300 feet. On all sides the descent is precipitous, and a heavy and well-loopholed wall runs round the crest of each. Entrance is obtained by the slants of a road cut in the solid rock, and guarded by several strongly-fortified gateways. But Gwalior is more than a fort. It is true, that for 600 years its chief importance lay in the fact that it presented the first barrier to an advance southwards from Agra, but since 1886, when the British troops, which had held it intermittently for over 100 years, were finally withdrawn, its real significance has been rather archaeological than military. The Maharaja Scindia has, indeed, a few hundred men in the old defences on the top of the rock, but no one knows better than His Highness that the day of impregnability is over for such fortresses as Gwalior, and that in his splendidly-trained Imperial Service Troops quartered in the plain below, he has a weapon far worthier of his predecessors' fighting fame.

On the back of an elephant—Palace and Residency alike point an Anglo-Indian proverb for hospitality—one sees, saws strenuously and slowly up the steep ascent to the main gate beside the Painted Palace. This is a fine structure, simply designed in the mass and decorated in detail with tiles of an exquisite glaze, some charged with an elephant, such a beast as the designer of the Bayeux tapestry might have traced, some splendid with blue and green peacocks, others diapered with conventional work in free and bold curves. Others again—and these are perhaps the most impressive of any—of plain pure colour, are set in bands or surfaces of utter blue so exactly of the colour of the deep mid-sky overhead that they seem to make symmetrical gaps and rents and spaces in the solid stone of the palace wall. Inside there is indeed something to see and admire, some finely chiselled capital brackets and latticed windows in the women's court, some dainty finials also along the parapet, but the foul sweet stench of the bat battalions who have had undisturbed possession of the inner rooms for centuries will drive away the hardiest of intruders. There is something apart from all other smells in that of a bat haunt. You may be prepared for, and even proof against, the more violent stenches of life; you may even be almost deficient in a sense of smell at all, but this particular warm, intimate odor, that you can taste on the palate for ten minutes afterwards, and long to be sick therefor—this will yet drive you headlong. It is half-psychological in its effect; one could swear that in the darkness there was crouching some warm-blooded creature of the octopus tribe; in fact, the origin of the vampire legend is clearly founded upon the suggestions of this fetid smell rather than upon the ascertained habits of these foul little beasts which have long made Gwalior their chief capital in India.

On the flat top of the rock, and cut into its flanks, there are several things of interest. All the world knows of the gigantic statues, nude and unashamed, that excited Baber's modest anger, and collected in a little compound are a hundred and one relics of a Bhuddist age—Bhuddist or Jain—who knows? The two are first cousins, and it is hard sometimes to disentangle the fragments that are left. Truth to tell some of these quaint sculptures might have been cut in Egypt, or in Siam, or in Ireland, as readily as here in Central India. The bigger statues cut in the side of the precipice are comparatively modern—some are even dated as late as the Fifteenth Century. Looking over the strong breastwork of stone which surrounds the fort one sees the new town of Lashkar lying, white and new, in among well irrigated and afforested lands below. Here is the real Gwalior of to-day. The page is turned for ever on all that made the rock splendid and sanguinary in history, and in Lashkar the advent of a new era is blazoned forth. And the most striking part of Lashkar is nothing less than the Maharaja himself.

Scindia is, beyond all question, the most capable and most ambitious native chief in our Indian Empire. With a mental dexterity and wealth of information that might be envied by many an expert "political" twice his age, he combines an industry which has no rival unfortunately scarcely a follower even, in other States. Nothing that can interest or affect his wide territory is left unnoticed by the Maharaja of Gwalior. Nothing is too small or too petty to escape his direct attention and action. In the course of one short afternoon which I spent with him the drainage of an unhealthy quarter of Lashkar, the course and prospects of yet another proposed light railway, the financial position of the club, a new electric power station, the proper collection and distribution of forage for his own Imperial Service Troops and the Prince of Wales's horses, the destructions necessitated by the new market, which is to be formally opened by the Prince—the exact matter was the abolition of some adjacent stables lest the flies should spoil the wares of the worthy confectioners of Gwalior—a patch of 'bad road' some ten miles out towards Datia, for which the local overseer would have to supply the best of explanations; an improvement in electric thermostats invented by His Highness which caused an even breeze rather than a draught, the lessons of the Russo-Japanese war—such a list, incomplete as it is, will show the versatility and insatiable activity of this man, the only prince and almost the only man, in all India who adds to the nimble wit which is not uncommon there—those rarest of all qualities in a Southern Asiatic: the powers of initiative, foresight, determination, and perseverance. He has put the past behind him. I asked an official at the palace about the famous Gwalior pearls; it seemed only obvious to ask about them. They are beyond question the finest in the world, even Travancore's ranking second to these ropes and collars and sashes of exquisitely matched sea-stones each as large as a filbert, and ideally perfect in shape. The official saddened visibly. "Ah, His Highness will take no care of them; he will not wear them, and so they must go bad." Certainly it required some stretch of imagination to clothe in the translucent breast-plates of pearls which his predecessor's picture bravely shows, the sturdy and alert figure which had been driving us about in a motor from one municipal improvement to another, confident, certain of touch, and mindful of the life and limbs of the most tiresome of pariah dogs asleep in the fairway.

Yet the matter I have mentioned last is closest to his heart. At home or on his travels you will always find beside him ready to his hand the last book upon the science and theory of war. He is a soldier first and last. His own troops are models of discipline and organisation, and to the fact that they are his own, not ours, till the day for their employment comes his never failing interest in them is due. Someone while I was there had written to ask him to become Honorary Colonel of some Central Indian Cavalry, and I heard him refuse bitterly. "Honorary Colonel? No; what's the use of that? It won't bring me a step nearer active service. Now, if they had offered me the post of squadron commander instead—"

There is another matter. It cannot be doubted for a moment that Scindia's position in India as acknowledged head and champion of all Hindu Native States is one that is nearly more and more to be recognised and reckoned with by us. It is no light thing that Rajput and Mahratta alike come to him for advice and leading. The significance is doubled when we remember that this involves at least one concession of no small importance, for Scindia is not of the Royal Kshatriya caste, and he has won his pre-eminence by sheer ability and force of character. One could write much upon this man—on the whole, the most remarkable character in India. Perhaps he errs on the side of over-attention to detail; it would be better to leave minor matters in responsible hands. Perhaps, also, his energy needs concentration on fewer interests, if results are to be permanent. But Scindia is either a great man or, what comes to pretty much the same thing so far as we are concerned, the greatest man of and in India.

Englishman.—Every one was early astir this morning, for at nine o'clock His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was to review the military force that the Maharaja Scindia maintains on the plain that lies about three miles from the palace. And it was with a feeling of profound thankfulness that all who have recently passed through Northern India remarked the noticeable change in the weather. It was cold, and almost damp, and many clouds were about. This was the reflection of the change that has brought abundant rain to the Punjab, saving from destruction the thin rabi crop which was beginning to look parched during the manoeuvres at Rawalpindi. In the Agra and Muttra districts and indeed throughout the United Provinces rain now would be invaluable. Here in Gwalior the time has almost passed when it could benefit the crop. It has been a bad year, and preparations are in train to relieve the distressed population. With the energy constantly betrayed in his active personal rule the Maharaja is now arranging to tour through the affected districts to see for himself and to super-vise ameliorative measures. But though perhaps too late for the harvest, rain would be thrice welcome in Gwalior to replenish the store of water. Almost every tank is dry and even the palace grounds will have to be starved if the supply is not supplemented.

The review ground was charmingly situated: a great stretch of yellow alluvium enclosed in an amphitheatre of low hills and ringed with trees. The huge fort-crowned rock looking more like a battleship than ever formed a fitting background. Sunlight and shadow wrought fascinating changes upon its scarred and rugged face, now wrapping it in the softest purple, now as the unclouded sun beat upon it revealing every line and house and battlement. To the left a modest hillock was spotted with the people who had come in holiday attire to witness the display. To the right of the stand erected for the Princess of Wales were the purdah arrangements for the Maharani; for though Her Highness of Gwalior observes the strictest purdah, no ceremony is held in the State without thoughtful provision for her to witness it. And in the centre the troops, and bullock batteries, cavalry, infantry, and sappers. Besides his household troops the Maharaja Scindia maintains three regiments of Imperial Service Cavalry, two of infantry and a sapper company. There paraded two batteries of horse artillery, three regiments of cavalry, one bullock battery, one elephant battery, a company of sappers and four regiments of infantry, a total of just under five thousand of all arms under the command of the Maharaja himself.

First there marched past the cavalry band on greys, and the staff with the Maharaja in rear, a soldierly figure in the uniform of a British Colonel crossed with the Star of India ribbon, and mounted on a grand bay. Saluting, he rode into position near the Prince's right and made way for the artillery. These advanced in column of batteries, well disciplined and powerfully horsed with walers, but with muzzle-loading smooth-bores.

The cavalry brigade passed in column of squadrons and presented a gallant sight in their blue and white uniforms and dancing pennons. The elephant and bullock batteries represented those historic elements in the Indian Army which having fulfilled their purpose are passing away. The elephant has already been superseded in our heavy batteries because he is such a mighty trencherman that it is hard to keep him supplied on campaign, and the day of the bullock is drawing to a close. Then come the company of Sappers in khaki, their mule-borne tools rattling and the infantry in column of double companies. First the household troops, some in rifle green and some in scarlet, with muzzle-loading guns and long triangular bayonets. Afterwards the Imperial Service Regiments, quite recently raised, with Lee-Metfords tipped with stabbing steel end, all with a medallion of the Maharaja in their head gear.

Back came the footmen in line of quarter column, and the artillery and cavalry at the trot, the former in line at half interval and the latter in column of wings.

Hitherto there had only been the interludes which seem inseparable from every public display—the inevitable dog which trotted to and fro as gravely as if it were the most important part of the pageant and an Indian jay which fluttered in front of the prince, its azure wings flashing in the sunlight, like those of an enormous butterfly. But as the Horse Artillery thundered by at the gallop a graver episode occurred. Just opposite the Prince the off-wheeler of the middle team apparently put his foot over the trace and came down with a crash. The dust was so thick that this could not be seen from behind, and it seemed as if the third battery, following hot upon it must collide. One of the staff galloping into the fog stopped it and soon the fallen horse was up and the battery away, none being one whit the worse. Galloping out the Maharaja placed himself at the head of his cavalry and brought them up at the gallop in line of squadron columns, a gallant sight indeed and a fitting climax to a well organised and well executed review. His Royal Highness warmly complimented the Maharaja on the parade and then when the troops were drawn up in a crescent presented medals to nine sowars and two sappers for service in South Africa.

On the east side of the Thatipore parade ground there was a performance of quite a different character in the afternoon, closing with a realistic sham fight. First a squad of the First Infantry gave a smart display of semaphore signalling and the Fourth Infantry an exhibition of Indian club exercise. Then there was a well executed musical ride by sections, representing the military dress of different periods in the history of Gwalior from the reign of his late Highness the Maharaja Mahadji Scindia to the present day. Periods as far apart as men in chain armour to men in the smart uniforms with magazine rifles of the Imperial Service Lancers. But the crux of the entertainment was the mimic combat between the State troops and a Chinese army for the possession of a battlemented and bastioned fort that sprang like magic out of the plain. This was conducted with infinite zest and spirit. The scouts advanced spying out the land over their recumbent horses, and the Chinese Cavalry charged with true Mongolian yells. The plain was littered with the dead and wounded who were carried off in dhoolies or were doubled up behind the more fortunate horsemen. The guns blazed at each other, the artillery from the encircling hills joining in the fray. The Cavalry charged wildly and the Infantry peppered away with blank at a range of ten yards. Finally the enemy having abandoned the fort the victorious general decided to blow it up. Flames having been started by the artillery fire the fortalice vanished with a most satisfactory amount of fire and smoke and explosion. The concluding tableau was when the conquering army marched their prisoners back with bands playing, torches flaming and the Tartar general an unwilling spectator of the enemy's triumph from his own sedan chair. The Prince and Princess, and all the Maharaja's guests enjoyed it hugely and returned to Camp immediately it was over in readiness for the State dinner.

The banquet which was held in the new dining hall of the palace, was attended by a hundred guests. Conspicuous amongst many novel and ingenious decorations was a tiny railway that ran round the central table carrying the wine. Dinner over the Maharaja joined his Royal guests.

After proposing the health of His Majesty the King-Emperor, in submitting the toast of the Prince and Princess of Wales, he said :—

"I know no words which will adequately convey an idea of the feelings which spring in my heart as I rise to say a word of welcome to Your Royal Highnesses on behalf of my people, my family, and myself. I shall, therefore, not attempt the impossible task of describing those feelings but shall content myself with saying that the present is a unique occasion in my life, and that I shall never forget the honour done to me by Your Royal Highnesses' presence here to-night, and by your gracious kindness in visiting my capital. This house, which Your Royal Highnesses have graced by your presence, was designed by Sir Michael Filose, and built in the year 1874 under the direction of my late lamented father, and the first exalted guest that ever abode under its roof was his most gracious Majesty the King-Emperor, your revered father. With the lapse of time its interior has undergone considerable alteration, and in the natural fitness of things it seems only proper that in its modernised condition it should have conferred upon it the additional honour of a visit from Your Royal Highnesses. What adds so much more to the honour of the house, the distinction of the occasion and the pleasure of us all is the circumstance that unlike the previous occasion this is rendered even more felicitous by the presence of Her Royal Highness, the Princess of Wales.

I had intended in the course of this speech to deal at some length with the ambitions that have governed me during the last ten years of my career as one whom Providence has called upon to rule over a State containing an area of 30,000 miles and a population of about 3,000,000 and to illustrate how each move made has been directed towards the accomplishing of these ambitions. But realising that the inevitable fatigue of long journeys already made and the prospect of more still to be undertaken, together with the inappropriateness of the hour cannot but make such a narrative rather tedious and protracted, I shall refrain from giving effect to my cherished idea. It will be enough for me to say that whatever useful work has been or is being undertaken in the various departments of my State has but one ultimate goal, viz., to help towards the stability of the British Empire and with that end in view, to ameliorate the condition of the people over whom I am called upon to rule. Whenever Your Royal Highnesses travel in India you will see on the triumphal arches and in the addresses read to you the words of loyalty and devotion to the Crown. If I say but little on this subject, it is because I feel all the more deeply my hope and ambition is that the day may come when my army and I may by our acts show what is not only on our lips but in our hearts just now. There is some distress in a few districts of the State owing to the failure of the monsoons, but I have no doubt that Your Royal Highnesses' visit to the capital will grant it immunity against famine for many a long year. This remark may sound at best pure sentiment, but it embodies a feeling which to my knowledge is implicitly relied upon by the simple-minded villagers of my State. During the short time Your Royal Highness is here, I shall endeavour to bring to Your Royal notice as much as I can of the administrative reforms which I have been attempting to introduce into the State. May I say that the interest that Your Royal Highness had already graciously shown in my army and in the Municipality of my State has greatly encouraged me and will be an incentive to fresh efforts on my part. I shall not now take up more of Your Royal Highnesses' time than to say that I hope this visit to Gwalior which has no doubt entailed considerable personal inconvenience to yourselves will afford an insight into the peace and prosperity we all enjoy under the benign rule of His Majesty's Government, and will also furnish some amusement and relaxation to make up for the trouble you have undergone. My Lords, ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to drink to the health of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales."

In proposing the health of His Highness the Maharaja Sahib the Prince of Wales said :—

"In the name of the Princess of Wales and on my own behalf I thank you sincerely for the eloquent and touching words in which you have proposed our healths. I recognise that we have listened to no mere complimentary speech, but that His Highness has taken this opportunity of telling us the guiding principles and motives of his life. We are, I am sure, grateful for his frankness and highly appreciate his noble expressions, for whether we regard these principles from the point of view of the British Empire, the Maharaja himself, or the subjects of the Gwalior State, we cannot fail to recognise in them the highest ideals and aspirations. His goal is the stability of the British Empire, and to attain that goal he sees that he must strive, and indeed he is striving, with all his characteristic energy to improve the condition of his people. I look forward with pleasure and interest to hearing from His Highness of his administrative reforms. And while His Highness modestly refrains from telling us of his ambitions and intentions we do not forget the hospital ship which he sent to China a few years ago. I should like also to remind you of the two regiments which the Maharaja has just added to the Imperial Service

Troops, and, indeed, I believe that his ambition is to see his whole army attain to that excellence which characterises the troops which he gives so freely to the service of the Empire, and I should like to say how very much I am indebted to him for showing me his fine troops on parade this morning. We all know of our host's reputation as a soldier, but his energies and his influence are just as conspicuous and effective in the civil administration of his State. The Princess and I desire to express our deep sense of gratitude to Your Highness for the kindness and hospitality which you have shown to us and for all the trouble which you have taken to entertain us and our large party in your capital. Nor can I refrain from alluding to the magnificent procession with which Your Highness honoured our arrival yesterday. It was the first time that we had taken part in a ceremony, mounted on elephants, which is only possible in this wonderful country. I can assure you that we shall never forget that splendid scene with all its picturesque surroundings, and we shall also remember that every one of its details had been conceived and carried out so successfully by Your Highness. I am looking forward with great pleasure to enjoying the sport for which your State is so well renowned and in which you are kind enough to allow me to join.

Before sitting down I must convey to you, Maharaja, my dear father's warm messages of esteem and good-will, and I am glad to have another message to deliver from the King-Emperor which I am sure will please Your Highness. You have been appointed Honorary Colonel of the Indian Regiment of which I am proud to be the Colonel-in-Chief. The 1st Lancers will be as delighted as I am to welcome you as one of us. I call upon you, ladies and gentlemen, to join with me in drinking to the health and long life of His Highness the Maharaja Scindia. I pray that all possible blessings may be given to him and to his people."

A reception was afterwards held in the handsome drawing-room. To-morrow the Prince of Wales goes after tiger.

The news of excellent rain in Northern India is confirmed. All the ryots ascribe it to the luck the Prince and Princess have brought them.

In connection with the Royal visit to Burma the Local Government have called on the jail authorities to submit the names of long-term prisoners undergoing sentence in central jails who for good conduct may be recommended by Superintendents of Jails for the Royal clemency, with a view to entire release, or remission of sentence, in honour of the occasion.

The list is now under preparation by the Superintendent of the Rangoon Central Prison, and it is expected that, as on Coronation Day, there will be a good number of convicts released.

Englishman.—His Royal Highness entered Gwalior mounted on a swaying elephant, which passed through lines of retainers whose costumes and arms recalled the days when the Moghal power was waning and all India lay at the mercy of the mercileless horsemen of Sivaji. A few hours afterwards the Prince was listening to a speech from Scindia in which the Royal visitor was asked to graciously open the Victoria Memorial Market and to press the button which would inaugurate the electric lighting of the Municipality of Lashkar, a city built at the caprice of a Mahratta Chief. The contrasts thus vividly presented are indicative of the extraordinary positions occupied to-day by the ruling Chiefs of India. It was sometimes asserted that the Government of India has deprived the great feudatories of all their prestige and power, leaving them no room for the exercise of individuality or character. As a matter of fact so far is this from being the case, that no Chiefs or Rulers have so much power, outside of the absolutely uncivilised tracts. The ruling Indian Chiefs can enact whatsoever laws they please and have absolute control over the revenues of their States. Can so much be said even of the Tsar? Of recent years several Indian Chiefs have made the fullest use of the liberties they enjoy to further, in spite of convention and custom, the welfare of their subjects, using those despotic means to do good which Western statesmen must often hanker after.

Amongst these rulers of the Gwalior, Jaipur, and Baroda have been most pre-eminent. Scindia, indeed, has this special claim to the regard of his Royal visitors, that he has particularly identified himself with the Imperial idea. There is nowhere a more loyal subject of the King. Not only have his Imperial Service Troops seen service abroad, but amongst his own decorations is the war medal for China. In that campaign he rendered a unique service. He fitted out a hospital ship at his own expense, and there are many Englishmen who owe their lives to the forethought of an Indian Prince. And yet the little speech Scindia made on Wednesday was chiefly concerned with smaller details of his activity as President of a Municipality. The Prince of Wales has always shown the keenest interest in technical education. He probably heard with the greatest pleasure Scindia's remarks concerning the exhibition of indigenous products and regarding the recently opened technical school. The stay at Gwalior will possibly reveal other sides of Scindia's character. He has had the education of an English gentleman, and is interested in every kind of manly sport. As a motorist Scindia has made quite a reputation, and the encouragement he has given both to the sport and the industry will long be gratefully remembered.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince this morning reviewed the Gwalior State Troops on the Thaipore parade ground.

The Horse Artillery, Cavalry and Field Artillery drawn by elephants, four regiments of Infantry and a company of Sappers paraded under the command of His Highness the Maharaja Scindia, and a very imposing spectacle they presented.

The review of the Gwalior troops this morning was an impressively fine military display, and passed off most successfully. The road to the parade ground from the Palace was lined by the Shagird Peshwa civil police, the Sardars, Lawazima, the Tuman Nizam, the Ghate Risala, and Infantry. These are the Oriental picturesque elements of the State forces, and, viewed through Western eyes, appeared as spearmen and standard-bearers and men-at-arms in robes of white maroon and scarlet and yellow. The State elephants and the bedecked horses were also drawn up along the route, and approaching the parade ground were horsemen in raiment of blue, green, purple, and cerise. The troops were drawn up in review order across a plain, and backed by the great fortress hill, made a brilliant show, the pennants and bright uniforms of the cavalry showing up in fine effect. Their Royal Highnesses arrived on the ground, escorted by the squadrons of the Gwalior Cavalry and the Sardars, School Cadets, the latter attractive in their yellow and silver puggies. A royal salute fired from the fort began as the Prince approached the ground, and it was a stately procession that was seen as the Prince and the staff joined the Maharaja and proceeded to inspect the line of troops, the Princess accompanying in a carriage. The inspection over, the Prince returned to the saluting base, and the march-past began, the Princess viewing it from an ornate and solidly constructed stand. Preceded by his staff, the Maharaja wearing a military uniform, led his troops past His Royal Highness. The Horse Artillery, in column of batteries, headed the march-past, and very smart they looked in dark blue uniforms faced with yellow and wearing white puggies. They were splendidly mounted on and were much admired. The Cavalry in three regiments rode by gallantly, making a splendid display both of efficiency and of spectacular effect. The Field Artillery in bullock drawn and elephant drawn batteries succeeded, and were followed by four regiments of Infantry, headed by a company of Sappers. The Infantry, which included two Rifle Regiments, marched with admirable precision and looked to be a very useful body of troops. After the whole of the troops had gone by, the Infantry returned in line of quarter column and made a great impression as they swung by in excellent order. The Cavalry and Artillery thereafter trotted past, the guns afterwards retruning at the gallop. An accident threatened at this stage to mar the success of the whole review, but fortunately the incident had no serious consequences. As the Artillery broke into the gallop, a horse fell, and for a few minutes there was a confused medley of horses and guns in front of the saluting base. A second battery was galloping up and the elements of a catastrophe seemed to be forming. Happily, the on-coming battery was stopped just in time. The officers led their horses out of the mêlée, and the fallen horse which was an off-wheeler and had therefore not dismounted a rider as was dreaded, was raised and the team galloped off amid applause to join the rest of the battery. The incident merely suspended the stately progress of the review for a few minutes, but created excitement while it lasted. After the last of the Artillery had galloped away, the Cavalry who had formed in a line across the parade ground, charged in a line towards the saluting base, the Maharaja leading the charge. They halted within fifty yards of the saluting base. The Maharaja saluted the Prince amid applause and the Cavalry wheeling disappeared instantly in a great cloud of dust, the denouement being in a double sense a most effective curtain. When this fog of war had cleared, the whole of the troops had formed in review order and advanced towards the saluting base. The wings of parade closed in to form three sides of a square and thereafter the Maharaja dismounted and led ten of his men forward to the Prince to receive medals from his hands for service in South Africa. His Royal Highness dismounted and pinned the medals upon the breasts of the men, the ceremony being viewed with much interest. His Highness marched the little company of men to the back ranks, and having mounted again, galloped towards the Prince, who rode out to meet him and warmly congratulated him on the success of the review and the efficiency of the troops. This afternoon the military sports and a combined military display in the form of a sham fight are taking place.

The military display which was witnessed by the Prince and Princess and the Maharaja and the other guests this afternoon was interesting and had some features of realistic warfare.

It took place on a maidan, where a theatrical fort had been erected, fronting a range of low hills. The men of the 1st Infantry gave a pretty display of semaphore signalling to music; they wore a striking undress uniform of white shirt, white breeches, white puggies, and vests of green and orange and gold, and wielding red and white and blue and white flags made a very effective picture. The men of the 4th Infantry, also brilliantly attired, gave an exhibition of Indian club swinging, this being followed by a musical ride, in which the costumes of Scindia's horsemen were represented from the period of the late Maharaja Mohadjji Scindia to the present day. The company of riders included men in chain mail with burnished brass helmets, others equipped with steel cuirasses, armlets and gauntlets, and others violet, scarlet, cerise and saffron robes, and carrying bucklers. In contrast with these were the men in the present uniform of the Gwalior Cavalry. All were armed with lances, and the features of the ride represented medieval jousting, the display concluding with fine charges. The great show of the evening, however, was the combined display by all arms, which took the form of an attack upon, and defence of, the fort which had been erected. It was supposed to be held by a Chinese garrison against an invading force. The operations opened with the scouts of the invaders sent to reconnoitre the fort, being pursued by a troop of the Chinese cavalry; the pursuers were checked by discovering a great force of the enemy and returned hurriedly. The Chinese brought up a couple of guns which were promptly replied to, and a Cavalry demonstration compelled them to dismount the guns and abandon them. The Chinese Infantry came up and under cover of these the artillery teams were enabled to return and carry off their guns. A hot action was maintained between the opposing Infantry, but the invaders brought heavy gunfire to bear, and finally compelled the Chinese to hurriedly retreat. Realistic touches were introduced during the progress of the fight by the dropping and tending of wounded, the hurrying of riderless horses across the plain, and the garb of the Chinese force who wore yellow mushroom hats and loose red robes. A war balloon was another feature of the display. Before the final rout of the Chinese the rival Cavalry charged down upon each other, pulling up when the opposing horses were almost touching.

The position having been won, the fort was bombarded and set in flames, the whole theatrical structure burning rapidly, and many fireworks exploding. Finally the combined forces marched past, the Chinese being enclosed by a square of the victors and the Chinese commander being carried in a sedan chair surrounded by torch bearers burning coloured lights.

The procession was a pretty and admirably effective finale to the programme.

A State banquet was held to-night in the Jai Bilas Palace. The Maharaja proposed the health of the King-Emperor, the toast being loyally honoured.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—A pathetic Royal visit story comes from the Punjab. A small chief exhausted the whole of his treasury in the purchase of a new hat in which to keep up his regal dignity. The amount of money to his credit was but Rs. 30,000, and the whole of this went to procure his much bejewelled turban. Probably it will be for sale cheap in a week or two.

Lucknow, 18th December, 1905.

Calcutta, 20th December.—The arrangements for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales in Calcutta are now nearly complete. The principal special functions will be the presentation of the Address of welcome by the Municipality at Prinsep's Ghat, where Their Royal Highnesses will land after crossing the river from Howrah by streamer, and an entertainment upon the maidan on the 2nd January, which will be of an entirely Indian character. The features of the maidan entertainment will be the garlanding of Their Royal Highnesses with flowers, the offering to them of attar, sandal, saffron and musk, also of four gold plates, each containing a cocoanut, some paddy, some blades of grass, a gold coin and flowers, being the national emblems of fertility and plenty. The school children along the route will welcome Their Highnesses and a Bengali song will be sung which has been translated as follows:—
“Hail! Prince and Princess, all hail to thee!

With joyous voice we welcome sing,

As bursting into festive glee,

Bengala greets her future King.

Though humble our reception be,

And though our strains may halting run,

The loyal heart we bring to thee

Is warmer than our Eastern Sun.”

There will also be Sikkim and Bhutanese dances, a Tibetan Ghost Dance, Indian quarter-staff play, and illuminations and fireworks.

The Imperial Cadet Corps, twenty-one strong, arrived here, this morning with Major Watson in command, Major Cameron (Adjutant) and Lieutenant Deep Singh (Assistant Adjutant).

The Cadets include the Maharajah of Kishengarh, the Raja of Manipore, the Nawab of Radhanpur, the Nawab of Sachin, Khan Fattah Deen Khan, Rajkumar Jitendra Narain of Cooch Behar, Mahomed Akbar Khan, Momtaz Mahomed Khan, Mir Gulam Raza Khan, B. Prithisingh, B. Shonath Singh, Kumar Ranjit Singh, Kumar Nator Singh, Rao Raghunath Singh, Ananda Singh, Mahomed Kuli Khan, Kumar Pratap Singh and the Thakur Sahib of Raipur.

22ND DECEMBER 1905.

Pioneer.—The Royal party are once again in Native territory, for this morning they crossed the boundary of Gwalior and are now the guests of the Maharaja of Scindia in the Jai Bilas Palace here. The Maharaja with Hana Sahab Ingley Hazratji and Mr. Cobb, the Resident, met the Royal train at Morar Station about 10 o'clock and there received the Prince and Princess. This was a very short ceremony, for the State arrival took place half an hour later at Gwalior Station, the Maharaja travelling in the train with Their Royal Highnesses. The station was beautifully decorated in light yellow, pink and green, and a special shamiana was veiled off on the platform for the Maharani and Maharani's mother, the interior of this being a study in pink. On the platform were Major Daly, Agent to the Governor-General in Central India, with his Political Staff, all the leading officials and Sardars of the State and a number of European ladies and gentlemen. Among these were Mrs. Daly, Sir Archibald Hunter, Count and Countess Quadt, Lady Locke Elliot and other guests of the Maharaja.

Their Royal Highnesses on arrival were met by Major Daly, and the twelve principal Sardars were presented to them. The chief of them was the young Sardar, premier noble in Gwalior. He is about twelve years old and looked very smart in his cadet uniform with tiny top boots to match. The other Sardars were in brilliant dresses, but the most striking figure was that of the Maharaja himself in full Durbar costume and with magnificent rows of pearls about his neck. The usual Royal honours were paid and the Prince, accompanied by the Maharaja and the Staff, proceeded to inspect the guard-of-honour. The Princess, with Mrs. Daly, entered the shamiana and received a loyal personal welcome from the Maharanis, a bouquet being presented to Her Royal Highness. All was then ready for the elephant procession to the Palace and this was a very imposing ceremonial, the like of which has not been seen during the tour. It was arranged on a large scale and the slow and stately procession was full of pomp and bright with colours.

There were thirty-six elephants in all, and their trappings were of the richest. Their heads and trunks were all painted and the designs were very varied. The leading pair, intended respectively for the Prince and Maharaja, the Princess and Major Daly were particularly gorgeous. The howdahs were of gold and silver, the saris or mantles over the forehead and chains round their necks were of gold, and long gold pendants hung from their ears. The howdah cloths were of deep crimson heavily embroidered in gold. Each animal had on heavy silver bangles. To mark their dignity these two elephants had the Prince of Wales' Feathers cleverly painted on the base of their trunks with the motto “Ich Dien” below. The other thirty-four for the suite and officials were also splendidly bedecked and as the whole body moved off, two by two, the spectacle was a most brilliant one. It was purely Oriental in character and with no defect in any detail. The Maharaja was welcoming his Royal guests in a manner that made the whole ceremonial spectacular and yet impressively splendid. But there was far more than merely a procession of elephants, for in front went men on foot with native music and heralds proclaiming a welcome, led horses prancing with their gold and silver trappings and cushioned saddles, State palkies showing the ancient methods of conveyance, and chobdars and banner-men with high standards. Interwoven in this column were the fine Imperial Service Lancers in blue with red plastron and white turbans, their bands playing "God bless the Prince of Wales" in enthusiastic style. A battery of Horse Artillery, with guns and carriage in khaki colour, paraded along and, after more retainers, rode two Cadet Corps, the boys admirably turned out in blue with yellow kamarbands and lungis with silver fringes and white accoutrements. These young soldiers of the State were well mounted and rode like horsemen every one of them. More macemen and carriers of guns in coloured covers trooped along and then the Royal elephants, in all their splendour marched steadily onwards, the occupants of the howdah being shielded from the sun by golden umbrellas held aloft. A troop of Imperial Service Lancers was in close attendance and then followed the remainder of elephants with the Royal suite and the Sardars. The procession was closed by two squadrons of the Lancers.

The route from the railway station to the Palace was lined throughout with troops, the two regiments of Imperial Service Infantry (known together with the Lancers as the Regulars) were on duty, one a rifle battalion, which is probably the only one of its kind in a Native State. There were hundreds on horseback and on foot, many of the former being most picturesque figures with swords, lances and shields, all in bright colours and adding to the general effect. It was a mingling of ancient and modern and we could see what great strides have been made in military reorganisation under the present Maharaja, who is a very keen soldier indeed and looks personally after the welfare of his troops. To see some retainers of importance sitting in his saddle while an attendant held a small sunshade with an enormously long handle over his head and then to turn to an officer of the Lancers, spick and span, well turned out and holding himself as a soldier should was an object lesson. The old order is changing in Gwalior as elsewhere, and the army will vanish in another generation. Behind the lines of troops were crowds of spectators, and on the slopes below the Fort they rose in groups almost to the walls. The people affect gaily-coloured turbans and the distinctive Mahratta head-dress, and thus the crowd was not of that neutral-tinted kind which is seen so often in big cities. Yellow and red and green seemed the favourite colours, and in the bright sunshine they gave brightness to the scene.

The procession passed slowly along until the north gate of the Palace was reached when a salute of 31 guns was fired from the Fort. There were more spectators on the gateways, and hearty cheers were raised as the inner grounds were entered. Their Royal Highnesses dismounted from their elephants at the main gate of the Palace and watched the latter part of the procession file past as the suite and Sardars arrived. At 1 o'clock a Durbar was held, the fine hall in the Palace, with its buff and gold pillars, walls and ceiling and two magnificent chandeliers, being admirably suited for the purpose.

It is of great extent, and is perfectly proportioned, and here it may be mentioned incidentally that the Jai Bilas was built to accommodate the present King when he visited Gwalior thirty years ago. A handsome dais had been put up, and to the left of this the Sardars and durbaris, all in rich dresses, were seated, while to the right were a large number of European officials and guests. The Princess of Wales watched the Durbar from a side alcove. The Prince was escorted to the dais by the Maharaja, a fanfare of trumpets, a salute from the guard-of-honour and a few bars of the National Anthem being the signal that the Durbar was about to open. The Maharaja then in person presented his twelve Sardars to the Prince, their nazars being touched and remitted. The venerable figure of Sir Michael Filose, so long connected with the State, was noticeable as he presented his nazar. The rows of attendants then filed in and deposited trays on the ground, atar and pan and hars, or golden garlands, together with some old weapons, being thus laid down. The Prince and suite were garlanded, attar and pan being distributed, and then the Durbar came to a close. Outside the Palace were drawn up six elephants and some led horses, the Royal presents according to precedent, but these were of course only formally accepted, to be returned at once. Thus ended the two official functions of the morning, both the reception and the Durbar having been carried through with all due dignity.

In the afternoon the Prince opened the Victoria Memorial Market, a handsome building near the old Palace. The route was again lined with troops and the scene in the Sarafa, a street of the bankers, was a particularly animated one. The houses are very irregular, high and low buildings alternating, but this serves to prevent monotony of outline, while innumerable balconies break the façade. Everything is absolutely white, and the background set off the varied colouring most effectively. The flat roofs were thronged, and every side street was packed, for all Gwalior wished to see the Prince and Princess pass along in state. The party had as escort a Lancer regiment, the school cadets and a detachment of silldar sowars. There was a roar of welcome along the route and the popular voice was heard still louder as the open space in front of the old Palace was reached. Here a large shamiana had been erected, and the Maharaja, with his Staff, met the Prince and Princess on arrival, conducting them to a dais facing the Memorial Market, where the members of the Gwalior Municipality had assembled. The Sardars and European ladies were seated under the shamiana, all deeply interested in the proceedings.

The Royal party with the Maharaja and Staff then inspected the interior of the building, which contained among other things specimens of good work turned out at the new Technical Institute and also local products. By the time this inspection had been finished it was dark and the party returned to the front of the dais. Here on a pedestal was a small silver elephant and by pressing a button the Prince inaugurated the electric light installation. In a moment the whole Memorial was glowing with coloured lights and transparent portraits of the King and Queen, Prince and Princess, the Viceroy and Lady Minto were lighted up, while the motto "Happiness and Prosperity" also shone out. The effect was dazzling and the crowd showed its pleasure in a demonstrative way. The old palace and adjacent buildings were already illuminated with chings. Hundreds of fire balloons began to ascend and there was a display of fireworks on the high battlements of the Fort. The Royal party drove back through streets ablaze with more illuminations, every house contributing its share and the Palace was reached in its glow of electric light. To-morrow there will be a review of the troops in the morning, followed by military sports, and at night a State banquet will take place in the Palace. Friday and Saturday will be devoted to shooting.

Pioneer.—Sir,—I have read in your issue of the 13th instant an account of the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to the Khalsa College. I find that your correspondent has not at all noticed the most important event of the day. It was to the effect that the College Committee in commemoration of this auspicious visit has opened a fund for awarding scholarships tenable for three years in foreign countries to the most deserving students of the Institution.

These scholarships, with the gracious permission of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, have been named the "Prince of Wales's foreign scholarships." The fund for these opened with munificent and generous donations from the patrons of the College, Their Highnesses the Maharaja of Patiala, Jhind and Nabha each contributing Rs. 1,00,000, 50,000, 50,000, respectively. The Committee expect help from all the members of the community both high and low and any donations towards this fund may be sent either to the Bank of Bengal, Lahore, or to S. Sundar Singh Majithia, Honorary Secretary of the Managing Committee of the Khalsa College, Amritsar, and they would be thankfully accepted. There was also a mistake in the text of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Rattigan's address. The number of boarders as shown in your paper was 104, while it should be 404. I hope you will kindly give publicity to this and oblige.

SUNDAR SINGH MAJITHIA.

(Honorary Secretary Khalsa College, Amritsar.)

Times.—Our Special Correspondent with the Prince of Wales has already dealt at some length with Gwalior and its notable ruler, the Maharaja Madho Rao Sindhia; but, as at very few places in the course of his tour will the Prince come in contact with conditions more radically changed since the days of his father's visit, it is worth while to pass them in review. Some of the most obvious of them date from the period between the Royal visit of 1876 and the death of the then Maharaja Jyaji Rao Sindhia; but the change is mainly due to the Regency under British supervision, during the nine years minority of the present ruler, and to the continued activity and the enlightenment of Maharaja Madho Rao Sindhia himself, in the ten years which have elapsed since he took the reins of government into his own hands.

The journey from Agra to Gwalior, in 1876, could, even by a Prince of Wales, only be accomplished in a tedious and dusty drive; in 1905 it is performed by the humblest of Sindhia's subjects in a three hours' railway journey. The railway is due to the late Maharaja, who advanced the necessary funds, and, moreover, insisted on the line being constructed on the broad gauge.

As the carriage approached Gwalior, in 1876, it passed between two great landmarks which were, and remained for nine years more, an eyesore to the prince whose conduct in 1857 had raised him above all suspicion of disloyalty, and whose refusal to listen to the temptations of intriguers who would have placed him at the head of a Mahratta rising saved the British Government from an enormous addition to its difficulties. On the left hand, at Morar, lay the cantonments of a strong British force; on the right, 300 feet above the road, towered the great fortress of Gwalior, also in the occupation of a detachment from Morar. Now the cantonments still remain, maintained in all their old order and neatness, but the troops in its barrack are Sindhia's own. The fortress still frowns down on the city and the palaces of the Maharaja, but the guns which could so easily destroy them belong to him. It would have added immensely to the clat of the visit of 1876 had it been followed by the rendition of the fortress, but, in those days, the Government did not deem it advisable to return to the Maharaja the stronghold which had been recaptured, in 1858, from his mutinous troops. Its guns still dominated his palace and met his gaze whenever he raised his eyes. When it was, at last, returned to him, in 1886, he was too near his death to be able even to be present at the ceremony of transfer. When the final negotiations which led to this act of justice and good policy were begun, he had almost abandoned hope, and when Sir Lepel Griffin, as Agent to the Governor-General, sounded him on the subject, he was inclined to avoid it. That the rendition was an act of justice cannot be doubted. The Government was pledged to it, when it could safely be made. It was equally clearly an act of good policy, for, so long as the fort remained in British hands, the Maharaja had a grievance. Nor could there be any danger in it, since the retention of an isolated rock fortress, of which the garrison used to be estimated at 7,000 men, would have been one of the worst examples possible of the "fortress incubus." The Power which is unable to maintain a force of that strength in the open field in India might as well haul down its flag at once. Besides, the place is a mere "shell trap" which a very few hours' bombardment, even by the artillery of 20 years ago, would render untenable. In giving it up, and in exchanging Morar for Jhansi, now the junction of four important lines of railway, the Government certainly acquired a much more valuable strategic position, and the terms of the transfer saved pecuniary loss.

In the personality of the ruling chief the change has been immense in 30 years. The old Maharaja was a man of great ability, and one really of much more amiable disposition than was attributed to him by some who only saw him on public occasions. Those who knew him more intimately recognized that much of his brusque manner was really due to shyness, complicated by an impediment of speech. Yet he was distinctly of the old-fashioned type of Mahratta ruler, the last link between the days when the Government of his State—he being then only a child—came into armed collision at Maharajpur and Punniar with British forces, and the modern times of amicable union. With him the people and the country were instruments created for the use and enjoyment of the ruler. He sought to get from them all that they could afford, and to return little or nothing in the shape of benefits. His provincial governors were let loose on the country with a free hand, and when they abused their power by extortions the remedy was, not dismissal and punishment, but the extraction of a share of their illicit gains by a fine, the object of which they perfectly understood, and which produced no ill-feeling between them and their master. With the exception of the railway to Agra and the realignment of part of the great Hindustan and Deccan road, nothing was done to improve the communications of a country which was dying from inanition for want of them. When it was smitten with famine, its inhabitants were left to seek their own remedy by pouring over the boundary to lands where there was plenty, or at least some form of famine relief. No branch of expenditure was liberal, except that on the Maharaja's favourite plaything—an army which was of little real efficiency, notwithstanding the unfounded reports, which used at one time to be heard, of men constantly passed through the ranks on a short service system, or of Mahrattas enlisted from the Deccan. One-third of the gross revenue was hoarded and buried in the vaults of the Gwalior palaces, where, when the Maharaja died, several millions sterling were found in cash and jewels. Education, sanitation, medical institutions, judicial and police administration were as much neglected as roads and railways.

Of the striking personality of the present Maharaja our Special Correspondent has already spoken. When he succeeded to full powers, he found himself with a reorganized administration, which had already carried out many improvements. With it he was entirely in sympathy, and allowed no relaxation of the advance. He continued to support the work of Colonel Pitcher, an expert lent to the State by the Indian Government for the purpose of revising the system and the assessment of the land revenue. With that officer's assistance he was able to co-ordinate the revenue revision with coinage reforms rendered necessary by the new policy of the British Government in currency matters. The revenue was increased, whilst the people were saved from extortion. Even the right of coinage was surrendered. The Victoria College at the capital bears witness to the Maharaja's interest in education, as do numerous schools, for girls as well as boys, all over the country. The Memorial Hospital at Gwalior, and dispensaries at many places, are a record of his enthusiastic support of Colonel Crofts, his European medical officer, the personal friend to whom he owes so much of his training in manliness and sincerity. His Sirdars' College provides for the education of aristocratic candidates for State employment, and a club on English lines promotes good fellowship amongst his officials.

With a revenue largely increased by the profitable investment, during his minority of his father's buried hoards, the Maharaja has found himself in a position to devote much of a constant surplus to roads, railways, and irrigation, and to carry out famine relief on a scale hitherto unknown in his State. His first railway venture was the broad gauge line from Bina to Goona, for the continuation of which to Baran he lent money to less wealthy neighbours. He provided funds for his portion of the line from Bhopal to Ujjain, and, by the construction of three lengths of narrow-gauge railway, he has brought into communication with the capital and the outer world fine grain-producing tracts which, 20 years ago, were so isolated by want of passable communications that their produce fetched less than half the prices ruling at Agra, only 80 miles away. A further length is now under construction. The army has not been neglected. The Maharaja's contribution to the Imperial Service Corps comprises three cavalry regiments, two of infantry, and a transport corps, in addition to which he maintains a separate transport corps for his own tours in his State. The officers are now properly trained at a State cadets' school, and the interests of the army generally receive the Maharaja's special attention. Above all things, the Maharaja is thorough. In his frequent tours through all parts of his dominions he investigates for himself. He is not above sitting down to examine the office and accounts of a local revenue or police district. Many prompt punishments of detected delinquents have testified to the searching nature of the inquiry. He has taken the warmest personal interest in suppressing the bands of dacoits who a few years ago were a scandal to Central India. Two significant instances may be mentioned of his anxiety to acquire a thorough knowledge of details. As a boy, he learnt to drive an engine on the miniature railway from Morar to Gwalior. When the Bina-Goona Railway was opened, the Maharaja himself drove the first train over it. In revenue matters he displayed a similar aptitude for details, by insisting on qualifying in the work of a village accountant. The certificate of his capacity in this respect, which Colonel Pitcher was able to give him, he showed with pride to the Viceroy. Both Gwalior and the British Government are proud of Maharaja Madho Rao Sindhia, and owe him much.

23RD DECEMBER 1905.

King.—The more closely one examines the programme of the wonderful tour which Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales are making in India, the more deeply is one impressed with its many-sided significance. It is hard to imagine an itinerary more skilfully and artistically planned with a view to including in the limits of less than a score of weeks, perhaps, the most astonishing phantasmagoria of scenery and associations which the world of travel has to offer. Of the programme a considerable section has already been brilliantly accomplished, but much of surpassing interest remains to be seen by the Royal couple who thus, under the happiest conceivable auspices, are both visiting India and bringing the millions of residents there into almost personal touch with the throne. Yet it is as a whole that the Tour has its chief attractiveness, as well as its gravest meaning, and a brief comprehensive survey of the ground which has been, is being, and is yet to be covered may prove to many more instructive than detailed rhapsodies upon any particular stage of this memorable visit.

It is pleasant to recall the fact that the earliest portion of the Tour comprised some of the oldest and most romantic associations connected with Indian history. Some day, perhaps, our schoolboys may learn to take something of the same interest in Rajput tradition which they are supposed to take in the mythology of Greece and Rome. But, pending the realisation of such dim hopes, it is encouraging to those who have studied the annals of India to feel that the countless legends and the numerous facts which cluster round the storied homes of Rajput chivalry cannot fail to have impressed a future King of England and Kaiser-i-Hind. From Jaipur, the latter-day model of a prosperous Rajput capital, the Prince travelled up to Peshawar, whence he drove through the famous Khyber Pass with an escort of those Afridis who less than a decade back ventured to try bloody conclusions with the Government of India. The first week in December was spent in camp near Rawal Pindi, where 55,000 troops had been collected under Lord Kitchener for the purposes of a set of most impressive manoeuvres and a concluding review. Such a function was with peculiar fitness included in the programme of the tour, since not only did it bring the Prince into contact with Indian military actualities, but enabled him to stimulate, if possible, the devoted loyalty of the great number of native officers who were on this occasion accorded the honour of presentation to His Royal Highness.

After a flying visit to Jammu, and a pleasant meeting with that grand specimen of India's aristocracy, Maharaja Sir Pertab Singh, the Royal party paid a remarkable visit to the great Sacred City of the Sikhs, Amritsar. At the Golden Temple here the Prince and Princess were acclaimed by the largest crowds seen since they left Bombay, a pleasant token of that fervent loyalty of which the Sikh is, perhaps, the finest Indian type. The programme for the rest of December comprehends visits to Delhi, Agra, and Lucknow, all three surrounded by memories, at once sad and glorious, of the great Sepoy Revolt, and the first two additionally famous for their relics of Moghul magnificence.

January will see the Prince of Wales at Calcutta, where his reception by the new Viceroy will constitute in itself a notable occasion. A hasty trip to Darjeeling is foreshadowed, and here Their Royal Highnesses will stand on one of the most interesting frontiers in the world, beyond which, on one side, lies the Nepal Valley, and on another the tangle of mountains through which Younghusband's Mission recently forced its way to Lhasa. From Calcutta the Party goes to Burma, visiting not only Rangoon, but also Mandalay, soon, perhaps, to be raised to a pinnacle of commercial importance by railway connection with the South of China. In Burma the Prince will see a British Dependency in a transition state, for hardly yet has full appreciation of the beneficence of British rule dawned upon all classes of the Burmese population.

Yet here, as everywhere else throughout the Indian Empire, Their Royal Highnesses will see the process of consolidation if not completed, at any rate so far advanced as to produce real pride in the transparent goodness of the administrative and educational work that is being done.

From Rangoon the return crossing will be made to Madras, where special interest will be awakened by the memories of the earliest British settlements. Mysore, Bangalore, and Hyderabad will all be visited, and a country traversed which is closely linked with some of our hardest struggles—those in the latter part of the eighteenth century—for supremacy in Southern India. The close of the tour is projected to include a visit to Simla, the summer seat of Government, but it seems possible that this item may be eventually abandoned. As a matter of fact, a visit to Simla early in March will give Their Royal Highnesses a very faint idea of the aspect of the place a few weeks later. It is to be hoped that nothing will interfere with the visit to Quetta, arranged to take place between March 12 and 16, or with the closing of the tour at Karachi. Quetta has now a greater strategical importance in some respects than Peshawar and Karachi, and, apart from naval and military considerations, cannot but eventually attain the commercial prominence towards which it has been steadily climbing for the last quarter of a century.

Illustrated London News.—The Prince's chief halting places during the past week have been Delhi and Agra. At Delhi the Prince and Princess visited all the chief memorials of the Mutiny and the famous buildings that remain to record the splendour of the Moghul Empire. Of the public ceremonies there is nothing to say, except that they resembled those that went before, and the same is true of the popular welcome. At Agra on December 18th the Prince unveiled a statue of Queen Victoria, which he said would be an enduring monument of the sympathy which existed between the Queen-Empress and her Indian people. He trusted that the attachment between India and the ruling house would only grow stronger with time. The statue, which is by Mr. Brock, is flanked by allegorical figures of Truth and Justice.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The review of the Gwalior troops this morning was an impressively fine military display and passed off most successfully. The road to the parade ground from the palace was lined by the Shagird Peshu, Civil Police, the Sardars, Lauazima, the Tumau Nizama, the Risala and the Infantry. These are the Oriental picturesque elements of the State forces, and viewed through Western eyes appeared as spearmen, standard bearers and men-at-arms in robes of white, maroon and scarlet and yellow. The State elephants and the bedecked horses were also drawn up along the route, and approaching the parade ground were horsemen in raiment of blue, green, purple and cerise. The troops drawn up in review order across the plain backed by the great fortress hill made a brilliant show, the pennants and bright uniforms of the cavalry showing up in fine effect. Their Royal Highnesses arrived on the ground escorted by squadrons of the Gwalior Cavalry and the Sardars School Cadets, the latter attractive in their yellow and silver paggaris. A Royal salute fired from the fort began as the Prince approached the ground, and it was a stately procession that was seen as the Prince and the Staff joined the Maharaja and proceeded to inspect the line of troops, the Princess accompanying in a carriage. The inspection over, the Prince returned to the saluting base and the march past began, the Princess viewing it from an ornate and solidly constructed stand. Preceded by his Staff, the Maharaja, wearing a military uniform, led his troops past His Royal Highness. The horse artillery in column of batteries headed the march past and very smart they looked in dark-blue uniforms faced with yellow, and wearing white paggaris. They were splendidly mounted and were much admired. The cavalry in three regiments rode by gallantly, making a splendid display both of efficiency and of spectacular effect. The field artillery in bullock-drawn and elephant-drawn batteries succeeded and were followed by four regiments of infantry headed by a company of Sappers. The infantry, which included two rifle regiments, marched with admirable precision and looked to be a very useful body of troops.

After the whole of the troops had gone by the infantry returned in line of quarter column and made a great impression as they swung by in excellent order. The cavalry and artillery thereafter trotted past, the guns afterwards returning at the gallop. An accident threatened at this stage to mar the success of the whole review, but fortunately the incident had no serious consequences. As the artillery broke into the gallop a horse fell, and for a few minutes there was a confused medley of horses and guns in front of the saluting base. A second battery was galloping up and the elements of a catastrophe seemed to be forming. Happily the on-coming battery was stopped just in time. The officers led their horses out of the mêlée, and the fallen horse, which was an off-wheeler and had therefore not dismounted a rider as was dreaded, was raised and the team galloped off amid applause to join the rest of the battery. The incident merely suspended the stately progress of the review for a few minutes, but created excitement while it lasted. After the last of the artillery had galloped away the cavalry, which had formed in line across the parade ground, charged in line towards the saluting base, the Maharaja leading the charge. They halted within fifty yards of the saluting base. The Maharaja saluted the Prince amid applause, and the cavalry, wheeling, disappeared instantly in a great cloud of dust, the dénouement being in a double sense a most effective one. When this fog of war had cleared the whole of the troops had formed in review order and advanced towards the saluting base, the wings of the parade closed in to form three sides of a square and thereafter the Maharaja dismounted, and led ten of his men forward to the Prince to receive medals from his hands for service in South Africa. His Royal Highness dismounted and pinned the medals upon the breasts of the men, the ceremony being viewed with much interest. His Highness marched the little company of men back to the ranks, and having mounted again, galloped towards the Prince who rode out to meet him and warmly congratulated him on the success of the review and the efficiency of the troops. This afternoon military sports and a combined military display in the form of a sham fight are taking place.

The military display which was witnessed by the Prince and Princess and the Maharaja's other guests this afternoon was interesting and had some features of realistic warfare. It took place on a maidan where a theatrical fort had been erected fronting a range of low hills. The men of the 1st Infantry gave a pretty display of semaphore signalling to music. They wore a striking undress uniform of white shirt, white breeches, white paggaris and vests of green and orange and gold. Wielding red and white and blue and white flags, they made a very effective picture. The men of the 4th Infantry, also brilliantly attired, gave an exhibition of Indian club swinging, this being followed by a musical ride on which the costumes of Scindia's horsemen were represented from the period of the late Maharaja Mahadji Scindia to the present day. The company of riders included men in chain mail with burnished brass helmets, others equipped with steel cuirasses, armlets and gauntlets, and others in violet, scarlet, cerise and saffron robes and carrying bucklers. In contrast with these were men in the present uniform of the Gwalior Cavalry. All were armed with lances and the features of the ride represented mediæval foresting, the display concluding with five charges. The great show of the evening, however, was the combined display by all arms which took the form of an attack upon, and defence of, the fort which had been erected. It was supposed to be held by a Chinese garrison against an invading force. The operations opened with the scouts of the invaders sent to reconnoitre the fort being pursued by a troop of the Chinese cavalry. The pursuers were checked by discovering a great force of the enemy, and returned hurriedly. The Chinese brought up a couple of guns which were promptly replied to, and a cavalry demonstration compelled them to dismount the guns and abandon them. The Chinese infantry came up and under cover of these the artillery trains were enabled to return and carry off their guns. A hot action was maintained between the opposing infantry, but the invaders brought a heavy gun fire to bear, and finally compelled the Chinese to hurriedly retreat. Realistic touches were introduced during the progress of the fight by the dropping and tending of the wounded, the scurrying of riderless horses across the plain, and the garb of the Chinese force, who wore yellow mushroom hats and loose red robes. A war balloon was another feature of the display. Before the final route of the Chinese, the rival cavalry charged down upon each other, pulling up when the opposing horses were almost touching. The position having been won, the fort was bombarded and set in flames, the whole theatrical structure burning rapidly and many fireworks exploding. Finally the combined forces marched past, the Chinese being enclosed by a square of the victors, and the Chinese commander being carried in a sedan chair surrounded by torch bearers burning coloured lights. The procession was a pretty and admirably effective finale to the programme.

December 22.—To-day and to-morrow are being given up to shooting, and it is anticipated that His Royal Highness will have excellent sport, a number of tigers having been marked down. The shooting has been arranged at Sakhya Bilas Tekanpur, Singhpur and Panihar, the Royal party proceeding to these places by motor. Five hundred beaters are being employed at Sakhya Bilas, five hundred at Panihar, seven hundred at Singhpur and eight hundred at Tekanpur.

The Prince went out this morning after breakfast.

Madras Mail.—This morning His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Maharaja and a small staff went out for a tiger shoot. To-day, to-morrow and Monday are to be spent at shikar. The Maharaja has made the most complete arrangements to give His Royal Highness the best of sport. Three shooting places have been prepared, one for each day, and there is every prospect of the Prince being able to add materially to the bag of big game which opened so well at Jaipur.

Madras Mail.—Gwalior, 22nd December.—To-day was wholly given to Shikar. Leaving the Palace soon after breakfast, Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by His Highness the Maharaja and a small staff, motored to Paniar, about twenty miles from Gwalior. There, the road came to an end and the Prince rode to the shooting tower about a mile-and-a-half away. The Princess was carried thither in a tonjohn and took her seat beside His Royal Highness. The beat then began.

To make what follows intelligible a few words of explanation may be offered. In this part of Central India as in Rajputana tiger generally frequent certain convenient nullahs. So fixed are these customs that, if a tiger is killed in a favourite nullah one week, it is almost certain that another will be there before the month is much older. Hence it is the custom not to shoot from a machan but to have erected small towers in advantageous positions, beating towards the shooting from there. It was in one of these towers that Their Royal Highnesses waited for the appearance of the tiger to-day.

The scene of the shoot, Paniar, has figured prominently in the history of Gwalior. For it was there that, in December 1843, the British Government, having been compelled to interfere in consequence of internecine strife, one of the double victories was gained which put an end to the trouble. The tower commanded a big nullah, into which ran several lesser clefts and the ground was covered with a good deal of leafy growth, for this is early in the season for big game shooting. It was, indeed, very much like a big Devonshirecombe, when winter has stripped the trees of most of their foliage.

There were some three hundred beaters out, most of them State troops, and, crowning the ridges, they at once began to work towards the tower. This was a long business, and the stars were not auspicious. A tigress and two cubs were observed, but it was not until half-past 3 o'clock that His Royal Highness got a shot. Then a tiger was seen moving through the leafy growth, about 80 yards from the tower at a half-trot.

His Royal Highness marked down the spot where he intended to shoot and waited coolly, and then placed a bullet just behind the shoulder killing the beast at once. It was a beautiful shot, admirably timed and placed, but the tiger was a young one.

No other shot was fired, and, as it was evident that sport was at an end for the day, Their Royal Highnesses returned to the motor terminus, where they lunched. Afterwards, motoring to the Palace, they reached it about quarter past 6 o'clock.

From the sporting standpoint it was not a productive day, but, as an excursion into the jungle, it was delightful.

The weather was changed, and it is now colder and crisper and delightfully stimulating.

The scene at Paniar, too, was picturesque and very characteristic of the jungle in this part of the country.

Further tiger shoots have been arranged for Saturday and Monday.

CALCUTTA, 22nd December.—The proposed purdah party, which is one of the functions to be held here in connection with the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, is raising much heart-burning in Bengali circles, and is being discussed in a not very favourable spirit in the Calcutta indigenous Press. The Statesman suggests that the best way to ensure the success of the party would be for the Government to widen its scope by inviting the co-operation of the ladies belonging to the community which, like their enlightened compatriots on the other side of India, have outgrown the precinctary confines of the zenana.—Our own Correspondent.

Rehearsals are now going on daily of the proceedings for the Royal reception here, which promises to be exceedingly imposing.—Our own Correspondent.

Pioneer.—At the State banquet at Gwalior on Thursday evening the Prince of Wales was able to make the announcement that the King has been pleased to appoint His Highness the Maharaja Scindia, Honorary Colonel of the 1st Lancers Skinner's Horse, the historic corps of which the Prince is himself Colonel-in-Chief. "The 1st Lancers," said His Royal Highness to the Maharaja with simple cordiality, "will be as delighted as I am to welcome you as one of us." The compliment of military rank is of course no conventional one in the case of the Maharaja Scindia, for His Highness has it always before him that he comes of a military line, and there is no chief who takes more thorough and practical personal interest in the efficiency of his troops as indeed was made evident by the appearance they presented at the Gwalior review. The choice of the corps with which the Maharaja is to be associated is, moreover, a particularly appropriate one, inasmuch as it was in the service of Daulat Rao Scindia that the original Major James Skinner, the founder of the regiment, first came to the front.

Pioneer.—The Maharaja Scindia maintains for Imperial Service purposes three regiments of Cavalry, two battalions of Infantry and a transport train, and he has besides this force a number of State troops that are farily well organised, though their armament is necessarily of a past period. Thus there are two batteries of Horse Artillery, some heavy guns drawn by elephants, and a battery of Field guns with bullock draught, together with a company of Sappers and two battalions of Infantry armed with muzzle-loaders. The combined forces constitute the State Army, and this morning they paraded at Chitpore, an open plain, with low hills overlooking it on two sides. There were 4,807 men in all assembled, and the Maharaja himself was in command, being more than qualified to handle such a force of all arms. The Prince and Staff rode on to the ground at 9-30, the Princess driving up escorted by the Cadets. His Royal Highness then rode down the line, the Princess following in her carriage and Sir Archibald Hunter, with his Staff Officer, Major Rawlins, accompanying the cavalcade. The following officers of the Imperial Service Staff rode with the Prince's Staff: Colonel Drummond, Inspector-General; Major Stainforth and Captain Ellwood, Inspecting Officers of Cavalry; Captain Rawlins and Lieutenant Burk, Inspecting Officers of Infantry. The usual salutes were paid, and the Royal party then rode to the saluting flag, placed in front of a raised shamiana, from a screened portion of which the Maharani watched the parade.

The Maharaja with his Army Staff placed himself at the head of the troops and the march-past began, Brigadier-Generals commanding the Cavalry, Artillery and Infantry, respectively. There were no British officers of the Imperial Service Staff engaged in the morning's proceedings which were conducted entirely by His Highness and his officers. The Horse Artillery went by in column of batteries, the horses being sturdy walers, and the men looking well in uniforms resembling our own R. H. A., and wearing white turbans with red kullahs. The three regiments of Cavalry followed, very smartly turned out and riding serviceable country-breds, the red and white pennons fluttering bravely in the breeze, and the passage of the Cavalry took some time as a full Brigade had to go by. They are the best troops which Gwalior has, and their drill has obviously been thoroughly looked after. The Field battery, with its bullocks, marched slowly by, and then came the three heavy guns, each drawn by two elephants. British authorities have discarded this kind of draught, but it is only a few years ago that in the Regular Army these huge beasts were employed. The elephants saluted with their trunks, carrying them high in the air as they neared the flag. A Company of Sappers in khaki headed the Infantry Brigade, which march past with a fine swinging step in column of double companies, the men carrying themselves well and keeping their dressing admirably. The Lee-Metford rifles showed at once which were Imperial Service regiments. Each soldier of whatever arm bore on his turban a miniature likeness of the Maharaja, thus showing he belonged to the Regular State Army. It is a distinctive sign and at once attracts the attention of the visitors to Gwalior who sees any of the troops.

The Infantry then counter-marched, coming by in line of quarter columns and again acquitting themselves well. Then the Horse Artillery and Cavalry trotted past, this movement being an effective display and noticeable for the drill and horsemanship shown by the Lancers. There was no raggedness in the dressing, officers and men appearing quite to know their work. Finally, the march-past closed with a gallop by the Horse Artillery. The first battery went by at a splendid pace, their dash being much admired. As the second battery reached the saluting point a horse in the team nearest the Prince came down and it looked as if an accident must occur, but the guns all came to a halt with marvellous quickness, and the team was soon put right again, the Maharaja riding out at once to see if any of the gunners were hurt. Fortunately no casualty had happened, and in a few minutes the gun moved off half-right, clearing the way for the rest of the battery, which put on pace immediately and went by at top speed.

The Cavalry had meanwhile wheeled in the rear of the Infantry that had been drawn up the line with elephant batteries in the centre, and the Maharaja placed himself at the head of his squadrons and gave the signal for a gallop in line of squadron column. The squadrons came forward through the intervals of Infantry and then formed into line, a movement not at all easy to carry out, but one which was excellently done. As the line was formed the whole of the three regiments advanced at the gallop, and did not halt until within fifty yards of the Prince, when the Maharaja raised his sword and the charging squadrons reined up. This was the spectacular feature of the parade, and it could not have been better done, for there was no check in the whole movement. All the troops then advanced in review order and gave a Royal salute, the wings afterwards moving forward so as to form a big semi-circle. This was for the presentation of war medals to nine men of the Cavalry and two of the transport train who had gone to South Africa in charge of horses. The Maharaja of Gwalior himself led these men to the Prince who pinned on the medals. His Royal Highness then warmly congratulated the Maharaja of the appearance of his troops and the manner in which the parade had been conducted. It had indeed been most successful, and the results shown are mainly attributable to the Chief of Gwalior, whose interest in all military matters and whose study of modern warfare ensures thoroughness where his Army is concerned.

This afternoon military sports were held closing with a sham fight. The semaphore signalling by the men of the 1st Infantry was done to music, and it was both smartly and prettily done, small red and white and blue and white flags being used. The Indian club exercises by the 4th Infantry were also very good. Then followed a musical ride by small boys in which each section represented the dress of different periods in Gwalior history to present the day. Some of the boys were in chain armour and others in picturesque costumes. At the end of the ride they engaged in a sham fight with lance and shield. Then came the combined display by all arms, the general idea being that a force advancing from the north had halted near Chatpore and that its scouts shortly afterwards discovered a Chinese fort in the plain. This fort is reconnoitred by the scouts. The garrison sent out Cavalry and two guns. The troops become hotly engaged. Artillery and Infantry fire shows the progress of the battle, and the Cavalry on either side meet in full shock of a charge. The Chinese have the worst of it, and as more of the Northern Force occupy the hills commanding the fort its capture is accomplished, the victorious General deciding to blow it up. This closes the action. Everything was done in a most realistic way, and the troops representing the Chinese soldiers were well got up to fill the character. They had at one time to abandon two field guns and these were dismounted, the wheels of the carriage being left lying on the ground with wonderful quickness. They were later on recovered and removed equally quickly. The scouting was good to watch, the men making their horses lie down and using binoculars to locate the enemy. Wounded men were carried off by their comrades, the horses kneeling so that they could be lifted up behind the saddle. Red Cross ambulances were seen at work behind the firing line and no details of warfare were wanting, even a captive balloon flying aloft over the Northern Force. The Infantry skirmished and took cover in good form, while the opposing Cavalry charged at a terrible pace halting only within a few yards of each other! The blowing up of the fort and its destruction by fire were well managed. When all was over the victorious army marched past with the Chinese force as prisoners, the scene being lighted up by magnesium flares. The Prince and Princess watched the whole display, and the Maharani was also present in their closed shamiana. The Maharaja directed the operations, and saw personally that everything was done as arranged. It was a sham fight quite interesting to watch.

Pioneer.—The 1st Oxfordshire Light Infantry will form the guard of honour at the station next Tuesday on the occasion of the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses, while the escort to Government House will be composed of the 1st Royal Dragoons, 6th Prince of Wales' Cavalry and O. Battery, Royal Horse Artillery. Two Royal salutes will be fired, one as the Prince and Princess leave the train and the second as the carriage enter Government House. The roads will be lined by the 1st Oxfordshire Light Infantry, 24th Punjabis, 1st Durham Light Infantry, 10th Jats and 2nd East Surreys. The route will be closed to traffic at 9 A.M.

Pioneer.—Sir Walter Lawrence has communicated the following Royal message to the people of Agra through Mr. Hopkins, the Collector:—

"I am directed by Their Royal Highnesses to express their pleasure and their appreciation of the welcome given to them by the citizens of Agra. The beauty of the decorations and the illuminations and the affectionate enthusiasm of the people will long be remembered by the Prince and Princess of Wales."

Queen.—Gwalior has a better right than many of the natural rock fortresses of India to the epithet the Gibraltar of India. The great fort is perched on precipitous cliffs of sandstone 300 to 400 feet high, forming the edge of this isolated plateau, which is about a mile and a half long and 300 or 400 yards wide. Its striking situation, standing out boldly from the surrounding plain, adds to the impressive effect and suggests comparison with Constantine, in Algeria, perhaps its nearest topographical counterpart. The approach is equally impressive. It is reached by a colossal kind of stairway nearly half a mile long, formed of alternate rampes and steps. A continuous, winding road has, however, been built within recent years, and the flights of steps now serve merely as a short cut for pedestrians. The six gateways which defend the ascent should be especially noticed. The best is the Badalgarh, dating from about the middle of the fifteenth century. It was built, as the name indicates, by a certain Badal, the uncle of Man Singh. An ancient temple, which, according to an inscription cut in the stone, dates from A. D. 876, will be noticed just before the fifth gate, Lakshman. It is hewn out of the solid rock. Over the entrance is a huge sculptured relief of the Boar avatar, one of the nine incarnations of Vishnu.

The history of Gwalior abounds in romantic and picturesque episodes. The obstinate struggle between the Mahrattas and the Moghul Emperors lasted for centuries, Jhansi and Gwalior being the great strongholds of this turbulent people. When the East India Company began to acquire inland territory in India the Mahrattas were the dominant race, and had they not been crushed by the British at Assaye and Delhi, would probably have extended their rule over the whole of South India.

The most picturesque figure connected with the story of Gwalior is the famous Rani of Jhansi. After defeating the troops of the Scindia (who remained loyal to the British Raj throughout the Mutiny), this Oriental Queen Elizabeth promptly seized his stronghold, Gwalior.

The actual capture of the fort is a single example of daring initiative and disregard of military discipline, which only complete success could have excused. After the rout in June 1858 of the Rani's rebel troops under the walls of the fortress (which they still held), two subalterns of a regiment of native infantry, Lieutenants Ross and Waller, decided on their own responsibility to attempt a night attack, and led their small detachment in this apparently forlorn hope. Forcing the gates which commanded the Rampes, in turn, after a desperate hand-to-hand contest with the rebels they captured the fortress. This was a feat which for daring, dauntless courage, and gallantry is worthy to be commemorated along with the famous assault of the Kashmir gate at Delhi, which has, perhaps, captured the popular imagination more than any of the innumerable heroic achievements of our troops during the Mutiny. The capture of Gwalior seems still more remarkable when we compare it with that of Jhansi, which was only taken by Sir Hugh Ross after a fortnight's siege and the loss of some 350 killed and wounded.

In 1885 the Gwalior fortress was formally handed over to the Maharajah Scindia in exchange for Jhansi. Jhansi, as well as Gwalior, is included in the itinerary of the Royal tour. It is only some sixty miles south of the capital of the Gwalior state, and is another "Indian Gibraltar." In one respect it well deserves its title, for, though the rock on which it is perched is not so lofty or so striking as that of Gwalior, the fort has been fitted with strong armament, and the defences have been so much modernised, that, unlike the latter fortress, it is almost impregnable.

In the fort are several remarkable palaces and temples, which serve as landmarks in the history of what has been aptly described as the cockpit of Central India, which has been held in turn by Mussulmans, Pathans, and Mahrattas, who still hold it under the Scindia dynasty. The term fort is, of course, here something of a misnomer, as it is not merely a citadel, but a fortified encinte like that of Moscow (Krem. lin) or Cairo.

The Palace of Man Singh, called the Man Mandir, which was built at the end of the fifteenth century, is one of the most interesting examples of early Hindu palaces in India. Its situation is bold and romantic, perched on the edge of the precipice, with its walls towering a hundred feet high, relieved by towers crowned with open domed cupolas. The other palaces are for the most part ruined shells. Unfortunately, instead of imitating the tolerant policy of the Moghul emperors, we ruthlessly destroyed, during our few years' occupation of Gwalior a century ago, many of the architectural monuments, on the grounds of military necessity. Indeed, as Percussion has cogently observed, during the short occupation of the fort by the British more was done to disfigure its beauties and obliterate its memories than was effected by the Mogul Emperors in a century.

The most interesting temple is the Teli-Ka Mandir, on the west side of the fort. At a distance it bears little resemblance to a temple, and looks more like a confused pyramidal mass of ruins. Even on a near approach it requires some architectural knowledge to pick out and appreciate the structural and decorative details. Not far off is the Jain Temple of Sir Bahu, which bears a superficial resemblance to the Teli-Ka Mandir.

The rock sculptures executed in the cliff which form the great natural rampart of this Mahratta Acropolis are curious relics of Jain architecture. They consist of a series of arches or niches, with statues of all sizes, from ordinary lifesize to a colossal figure nearly 60 feet high, larger than any yet discovered in North India. Inscriptions show that all these sculptures were executed in the short period between 1411 and 1447.

The dirty and odoriferous old city, which lies at the base of the Eastern face of the fort, should be visited, on account of the Mogul cenotaph of Mohammed Ghaus. The gallery which surrounds the square tomb chamber is closed on all sides by a screen of the most delicately carved stone tracery.

The modern city is called Lashkar. Here the only sights are the new palace of the Maharajah Scindia (not accessible) and the curious modern temple built by the mother of Scindia, with remarkable straight-lined sikras (spires), which are singularly ugly compared to the curved towers and minarets, which are so pleasing and typical features of most ancient Hindu temples.

Rangoon Gazette.—Work is now proceeding on practically all the pandals to be erected for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales in Rangoon. In all some fifteen arches will be erected. The first will be on Sulo Pagoda Wharf, where the Royal visitors will be received by the Reception Committee and the address of welcome read. On the roadway outside the wharf will be the archway of the Burmese community and a little further on, opposite the Custom House, the Indian Mussalman pandal. All the public buildings on the Strand will be elaborately decorated and also the offices in Phayre Street, amongst the decorations being a handsome archway at the corner of Phayre Street and Strand Road, to be erected at the expense of house-owners in Phayre Street. The whole of the decorations, both street and building, on the Strand and Phayre Street, are in the hands of Messrs. Mason, Trevillion and Hunt. In Phayre Street, also, will be the archway of the Madras Hindu community, a representation of the famous Madura archway. The first archway to be met in Merchant Street will be near Messrs. Bowyer, Swoden's and is to be erected by the Hindu community. A little further on will be the Persian pandal; just beyond Mogul Street will be the spacious Surati archway. Then will come the Khoja arch, west of Edward Street, and a little further on the Chitagonian archway. In Latter Street there will be two arches, at the south end that of the Fokkien Chinese and near the north end that of the Canton Chinese. On Godwin Road, south of Commissioner Road, will be the pandal of the Rangoon College and Collegiate School, and, from Camp Road northwards, the arch of the school children of Rangoon, a structure 1,100 feet long in which fifteen thousand children will be accommodated. Finally in Leeds Road will be the pandal of the Karen Baptists. From the plans drawn up for these various pandals it may be confidently anticipated that Rangoon will make even a braver show next month than she has done on any previous occasion.

Correspondents with the Prince and Princess of Wales are working their superlatives hard. Having in the earlier stages described various functions as the most gorgeous ever witnessed in India, they are now hard put to it to find words descriptive of something better than the best. From the accounts of the Reception of the Prince and Princess at Gwalior on Wednesday it would really appear that the Maharaja did all in his power to eclipse in picturesque magnificence anything which has gone before. The Prince of Wales was no doubt duly impressed by the howdah of beaten gold in which he rode from the station to the palace with an escort of thirty-seven elephants. His imagination could not fail to have been stirred by the sight of the historic fortress, of the splendid Mahratta troops, once the terror of India now given over to ceremonial, and—the Maharaja's motor. Elephant and motor-car cover the story of locomotion from the ancient East to the West of now.

Spectator.—The Prince and Princess of Wales, starting from Agra, paid a visit on Tuesday to Fatehpur Sikri, the deserted city which for a few years was the centre and capital of the dominions of the great Akbar. What lends peculiar interest to Fatehpur, as we are reminded in the extremely interesting despatch of the Times correspondent, is the fact that the great Mussulman conqueror, with politic liberality of view, built this model city in the purest style of Hindu architecture. Though it has not been dwelt in for nearly three centuries, Fatehpur, profiting by its isolation, has suffered less from the scourge of invasion than many other Indian cities, while, thanks to Lord Curzon's keen and enlightened interest in the preservation of the historical monuments of India, the work of repairing and restoring Akbar's palace and his mausoleum at Sikandra has been carried out with remarkable skill and completeness. On Wednesday the Prince and Princess visited Gwalior, and were entertained with great magnificence by the Maharaja Scindia, who is not only the leader of the Mahratta chiefs, but honourably distinguished among the ruling Princes of India by his energy and enlightened views.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 23RD DECEMBER 1905.

Burdwan Sanjivani.—The Burdwan Sanjivani [Burdwan] of the 12th December regards the proposed purda party at Belvedere as an example of the extension of the authority of the officials of the land to a region hitherto considered sacred from such interference and as a violation of the promise of religious neutrality conveyed in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 and concludes by expressing a hope that the project will be abandoned.

Newspapers have been saying, writes the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 11th December, the great pressure is being put on those Bengalis, who are in the habit of intimately mixing with Europeans in order to make them agree to send their ladies to the proposed purda party at Belvedere. Let these Bengalis, remarks the writer, now reap the fruit of their Anglicism.

A correspondent of the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 15th December gives the names of the following ladies as those who have consented to attend the proposed purda party at Belvedere:—

- (a) The Maharani Shaheba of Hatwa.
- (b) Ditto Adhirani of Burdwan.
- (c) The Begum Shaheba of Murshidabad.
- (d) Ditto Shaheba of Dacca.
- (e) The wife of Raja Binay Krishna.
- (f) The ladies of the family of Kumar Girindra Narain.

- (k) Ditto Maharaj Kumar Prodyot Kumar.
- (l) Ditto the Raj. of Dighapatya.
- (m) Ditto ditto Kakina.

The following are those who are undecided about going and upon whom pressure is being put:—

- (a) The ladies of the family of Maharaja Manindra Chandra.
- (b) Ditto ditto Raja Peary Mohan.
- (c) Ditto ditto Maharaja Surja Kanta.
- (d) Ditto ditto Raja Ranjit Singha.
- (e) Ditto ditto Babu Jogendra Chandra Bose.

Khalsini.

- (f) The wife of the Maharaja of Nator.
- (g) The ladies of the family of the Nawab of Patna.
- (h) The Maharani of Dumraon.

- (q) Ditto ditto Maharaj Kumar Gopal Lal Roy.

- (r) (s) (t) and (u) The ladies of the families of the Rajas of Dimla, of Sushang, Bhagyakul, and Raja, Chhatrapat Singh.

The Maharaja Khatish Chandra Roy of Nadia and the Maharaja Rameswar Singh of Darbhanga are mentioned as two noblemen who have refused to send their ladies to the party; and the Maharaja Jagadindra Nath Roy of Nator is said to have yet given no decided reply as to his intentions.

Hilavadi.—Referring to the telegram which Reuter's special correspondent sent to London stating that during the reception of the Princess of Wales by the purda ladies at Bombay he contrived to have a view of what passed on the occasion, although males were strictly excluded, the Hilavadi [Calcutta] of the 15th December asks whether those persons in Bengali who propose to send their wives to Belvedere have thought over the device made use of in Bombay. It is not stated whether the correspondent had his beard and moustaches shaved and putting on a lady's gown shook hands with the ladies present. The worthies of Bengal would do well to ponder over the question whether at Alipore anybody would resort to any such artifice as was resorted to in Bombay and whether anything further would be attempted than the mere enjoyment of a spectacle. Before sending their wives Hindu and Muhammadan gentlemen ought to think over the shame of such reckless exposure.

Ratnakar.—The Ratnakar [Asansol] of the 16th December writes as follows :—

In the days of Musalman Sovereignty in India badshahs used to hold a festival called the khusrój or navrója on the occasion of which all magnates of the country had to send their ladies to the Emperor's Palace, and not infrequently this festival proved to the ruin of many chaste women. Although there is no such fear during the civilised British rule, still does it look well for old Sir Andrew Fraser to insist upon holding a khusrój-like purda party in his own palace? If it is desired that the ladies of the country should personally give a welcome to the Princess of Wales, why not do it in the house of a Bengali? If the people who will send their pardanishin women to Belvedere are ex-communicated from native society, how will Sir Andrew Fraser help them? The Brahmins of the country should now assert their power and refuse to work as priests in the houses of such traitors to Hindu society as, prompted by self-interest, will send their women to the house of a mlchchha.

Hilavarta.—The Hilavarta [Calcutta] of the 17th December has the following :—

A Reuter's special correspondent has sent a message to England to the effect that although the presence of any male person was not permitted in the purda Darbar held by Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, he could manage to see the ornaments of the purda ladies.

It is not clear how this correspondent could manage to see the limbs of these ladies. We do not know if the ladies of the Bombay side feel themselves honoured by this. Have the Bengalis who mean to send their wives to Belvedere thought of this trick? Did the above correspondent put on a lady's costume of having shaved his whiskers and shake hands with a native lady? Do people here know whether such a trick will be played here or not? Will the trick enable one to satisfy (warm) his eyes only or afford him an opportunity to try (to extend) his hand too? Whether it is proper to send pardanashin ladies to warm the eyes of others is a point well worth the consideration of both the Hindus and Muhammadans.

Sandhya.—The Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 20th December warns those Hindu and Musalman gentlemen who intend sending their ladies to the forthcoming purda party at Belvedere of the risk of these ladies being surreptitiously photographed, and of these photographs being taken or published in the illustrated English magazines.

Sandhya.—With reference to the programme of the public entertainment to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the Calcutta Maidan on the 2nd January next, the same paper writes that the King-Emperor and the Prince are both highminded personages who know how to respect a fellow human being. Cannot reverence be shown to His Royal Highness except by the performance of menial offices for him by the most tenuous men of the land? The sincerity of this method of showing reverence will probably seriously upset His Royal Highness. But this is precisely the sort of exacting reverence and respect which finds favour in the eyes of the insignificant feringees who are the Lords of the country. Can anybody like this sort of worship and reverence by hired slaves? What value has reverence which is shown by people who do not know how to reverence themselves?

Education Gazette.—A correspondent of the Education Gazette [Chinsura] of the 15th December writes a welcome to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in Sanskrit verse.

Hilavarta.—The Hilavarta [Calcutta] of the 17th December says that it is not the wish of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales that the local municipal address should be read by a European. This kind wish on the part of His Royal Highness is really praiseworthy, but will the privilege of reading the address carry the Indians to heaven in this terrestrial frame?

Sandhya.—With reference to the approaching Royal visit to Calcutta, the Sandhya [Calcutta] of the 18th December expresses the opinion that this visit is a matter of indifference to the more thoughtful section of the Indian community, for the Prince will not be permitted by the officials to know the actual condition of things in the country. The ordinary run of the public will, like so many fools, do their usual glancing and sight-seeing; and that is all that the visit will come to.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY FOR THE WEEK ENDING 23RD DECEMBER 1901

Jam-e-Jamshed, 20th December :

"His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has already given most ample proofs of his firm faith in the loyalty of the people of India towards British supremacy as well as their attachment to the Throne and person of his beloved father, their present Emperor. Most of the speeches delivered by His Royal Highness in this country contain appreciative references to the loyalty and attachment, but none of them could perhaps give one so clear an idea of the extent and the genuineness of the appreciation as the eloquent and generous speech delivered on the occasion of the opening of the Victoria Memorial at Agra. His Royal Highness said that when he first consented to unveil that statue of the late Queen-Empress, his intention was to perform the ceremony in silence, 'for on occasions like this when our hearts are full of hallowed memories, silence is often more eloquent than the sincerest words of praise and affection.' But His Royal Highness and the Princess were so greatly touched by the tribute of love and gratitude paid by the citizens of Agra to that 'Great and Noble Queen,' that His Royal Highness felt himself called upon to say how well both he and his consort appreciated the sentiments of veneration and love the people of India cherished towards the memory of that Gracious Sovereign, and how well they were impressed by their attachment to Her House and the British Throne."

Indu Prakash, 19th December.—When the tour of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was definitely decided upon, European as well as Native journalists made arrangements to send their representatives with the Royal Party so as to be able to publish full accounts of the tour in their respective journals. The Government also promised to do the needful for the comfort and convenience of the Press representatives accompanying the Royal Party. But we are sorry to learn from the columns of the Tribune that Government have not been able to fulfil that promise and that invidious racial distinctions are being made in the treatment of newspaper correspondents accompanying the Prince in his tour. The comfort of the representatives of native newspapers is utterly neglected, no tents or conveyances are supplied to them as is done to representatives of English papers, and they are left to make their own arrangements in these respects. The passes given to them are not recognised by the police, and many a time they arrive too late upon the scene of the Royal functions. It is not at all desirable that the authorities should show disrespect to the Native Press. The Prince is not expected to be cognisant of these matters, but it ill becomes those who are entrusted with the arrangements of the tour to turn a deaf ear to the complaints of the representatives of Indian newspapers.

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE PUNJAB FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 23RD DECEMBER 1905.

The Frontier Advocate (Dera Ismail Khan) of the 30th November (received on the 16th December) 1905, writing about the Royal Visit, says that it is the bounden duty of the Natives of India to accord a loyal and cordial reception to the Prince of Wales, although their grievances cannot reach His Royal Highness's ears, seeing that between him and their poor selves stand Anglo-Indian officials; who in spite of their living in "our" midst know nothing of "our" wants and grievances, do not care whether "we" have or have not the wherewithal to appease "our" hunger, have levied taxes even on "our" necessities of life, and throw obstacles in the way of "our" receiving education.

The following is from the Observer (Lahore) of the 23rd December 1905:—

"The echo of popular acclamation which has accompanied Their Royal Highnesses throughout their tour in different parts of the country brings one idea to the forefront. In the recent discussions over the policy of Lord Curzon, when the country was passing through a tempestuous whirl of rage and the Viceroy was not spared even the commonest gibes of the street, the timely visit of the Heir-Apparent and his princely Consort has lulled the storm of general discontent. * *

* * Times out of number it has been tried to insinuate that the people are not loyal, but Their Royal Highnesses have had unmistakable proofs of the unsullied devotion of the Indian people to the Royal House of England; and the longer they remain in their midst the stronger will be their conviction that India is the brightest jewel in the Imperial diadem."

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED PROVINCES FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 23RD DECEMBER 1905.

Kashmir Darpan.—The Kashmir Darpan (Allahabad), for November, referring to the grand receptions that have been, and are being given to the Prince and Princess of Wales in Native States and other places, expresses regret that before some of the Native Chiefs have been able to recover from their expenses in connection with the late Coronation Darbar at Delhi, they have again to spend lakhs of rupees in welcoming Their Royal Highnesses to their States. It is true that, according to Oriental ideas and customs, the Indians should leave no stone unturned to give a right Royal reception to the Prince of Wales. But those ancient Oriental sovereigns who were accorded such receptions, did not confine their visits to making a bare display of pomp and grandeur and enjoying expensive hospitality, etc., but went out at night incognito and roamed about the streets and lanes of the towns to find out the true conditions of their subjects. There are a lot of popular stories of such disguised visits of Ramchandra, Vikramajit, Akbar and Harun-Rashid current on the tongues of the people.

The system of Government is, however, now entirely changed. The sovereigns of the present day neither care to acquaint themselves with what is going among their people, nor are they in a position to benefit the people even if they did know their real condition. For instance, of what use will the tour which the Prince of Wales is making in India at present prove to the people? How can he know of the distress of the four crores of the people who do not get even a single meal every day? And even if he did manage somehow or other to know something of the distress of the people, he commands no means to redress it. Such being the case, the writer is afraid lest the Prince's visit, far from bringing any benefit to India, might cause His Royal Highness, in view of the most splendid and showy receptions given him, to carry an impression to England that the stories of the fabulous wealth of India current in Europe in the 17th and 18th centuries were not much far from truth even in the 20th century.

Hindustan Review.—The Hindustan Review (Allahabad), for December, referring to the Royal visit, says:—In his first speech the Prince said that he and the Princess were among their own people. No occasion will ever arise throughout the tour for the Royal visitors to change this first impression. They are among their own people—a people that, through all changes and all vicissitudes, have remained steadfastly loyal to the sovereign and the Royal Family—a people whose quality of loyalty is unsurpassed by any other people in the world. But this great quality is never appreciated at its real worth by the rulers of the country and the people belonging to the ruling class. From the evidence that is forced upon our attention every now and then, one feels a doubt about the sincerity of the frequent professions of a firm faith in the loyalty of the people of India. They are more often than not merely lip-deep. Whenever there is the least sign of irritation or agitation, ominous murmurs are heard that disloyalty and sedition are abroad, and next follows loud demand for repressive measures to which the authorities frequently and weakly yield. To-day one hears a Viceroy or a Governor loudly praising the loyalty of the Indian people. Six months later the air is said to be charged with sedition, and summary methods are devised for its repression. The educated classes, because they are articulate, are charged oftenest with disloyalty, and yet the first welcome to Royalty was extended by one of the most distinguished representatives of the educated classes. Our rulers and their countrymen in India have absolutely no conception of disloyalty or sedition because they cannot be now found in India. Therefore they invent and imagine the existence of these dangers and shout and sing by turns. But the truth is known on an occasion like the present one, when the heir to the British Empire is in our midst. Is it to please the Government or the Anglo-Indian community that the people, led by the educated classes, are turning out in their thousands to welcome the Royal visitors, wherever they go? The Government knows perfectly well that it is never spared either in the Press or on the public platform, and the Anglo-Indian community is aware that no love is lost between itself and the educated classes, but all differences are forgotten when Royalty is in our midst, and the people of India, loyal to the core and loyal by teaching and tradition, welcome the scion of the reigning house with a full heart. Nevertheless, the croakers are even now at their work, crying themselves hoarse that sedition and disloyalty are abroad, while the Prince and Princess of Wales are gliding smoothly down the full tide of loyalty.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 17th December, says:—It must have been noticed that even in the case of Municipalities which have official European Presidents the honour of reading the address to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has usually been conferred upon an Indian. This is not due to a mere accident but to careful deliberation. As a rule the Collector or the Deputy Commissioner, who happens to be the President of a Municipality never yields precedence to any Indian member of the Municipality, or stands on one side and allows an Indian to act as his spokesman. On the contrary, cases without number might be mentioned in which friction has occurred and an official President has tried to act as an autocrat. But on the present occasion it has been felt that the word of welcome to Royalty comes with the best grace from Indian lips, particularly when Municipalities are supposed to be self-governing bodies. In Bombay it was not by favour but by full right as Chairman of the Corporation that Sir Pherozshah Mehta read the address of welcome. In the metropolis of India the Chairman is a European Civilian and the Municipality itself has been reduced to a practically official body. On the present occasion it has been decided that the Calcutta address to the Prince and Princess of Wales should be read by the Vice-Chairman, who is a paid official of the Corporation. At other places also the official Presidents have stepped aside for the moment in obedience to a hint from higher quarters, and the addresses have been read by Indian gentlemen. This, if anything, serves to accentuate the lamentable state of local self-government in this country. Indian Municipal Commissioners are put forward as the spokesmen of our Municipalities when the time comes to greet Royalty, but they are thrust aside again when the Royal visitor passes, and the official Presidents resume all power and control. This travesty of local self-government calls at least for a word of protest.

Indian People.—The Indian People (Allahabad), of the 21st December, says:—The precedent of a Royal gift to the Amritsar Golden Temple has not been followed at any Hindu or Sikh shrine in the Punjab; but His Royal Highness has presented Rs. 1,500 to the Juma Masjid, Delhi, being precisely the same sum as that offered at Amritsar. It is to be hoped that His Royal Highness will make a similar gift to the Vishwar temple at Benares or the shrine at Kalighat in Calcutta, so as to ensure equal treatment for the principal religious communities in India. The Hindus are numerically the largest as well as the most ancient community in India, and their claim ought not to be overlooked on such an occasion. It is not the amount of the gift, but its association with the heir to the Empire that makes the gift valuable, and all communities should be treated alike. We remember that when Lord Curzon paid a visit to the temple at Kalighat the officiating priest brought some sugar and sweets for His Excellency's acceptance. His Private Secretary wanted to take the gift, but Lord Curzon promptly stretched out his own hands and accepted the gift and the priests were greatly pleased. The Prince of Wales having made a gift of money to a Sikh temple and a Muhammadan mosque, the claim of a Hindu Temple comes next, and we hope it will be recognised either at Benares or in Calcutta, as we have ventured to suggest.

24TH DECEMBER 1905.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The proposed purdah party, which is one of the functions to be held here in connection with the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales is raising much heart-burning in Bengali circles, and is being discussed in a not very favourable spirit in the Calcutta Native Press. The Statesman suggests that the best way to ensure the success of the party would be for the Government to widen its scope by inviting the co-operation of ladies belonging to the community which, like their enlightened compatriots on the other side of India, have outgrown the precinctary confines of the zenana.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had a successful shoot at Gwalior on Friday, and secured his second tiger. Several accidents occurred at pig-sticking, in which the remainder of the Prince's Party were engaged, one of the beaters being seriously injured by a boar, while a horse was badly gored.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Prince secured his second tiger this afternoon at Panjar. The beast, which appeared going at the trot, was despatched by a single shot in the shoulder. It was expected several tigers would have been secured to-day, but the beat was not carried out according to plans, and three animals which had been trailed down got away before the Prince reached the shooting ground. His Royal Highness shot from a tower erected on a hillside. His Royal Highness returned to the palace about six o'clock this evening. He goes out shooting again to-morrow.

While the Prince was tiger-shooting a party of the nobles and others had pig-sticking at Susera, securing five boars. Before the sport began a horse, about to be mounted, reared and, overbalancing, fell, striking its head against a rock, and was killed instantly. Later another horse was badly gored by a charging boar, and a beater was also seriously injured by a pig.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Mrs. Niaz Ahmad, of Meerut, a lady of high position in society, writes to the Watan of Lahore, to suggest that Mahomedan women should do something to commemorate the forthcoming visit to the Aligarh College of the Princess of Wales. The writer suggests the founding of some scholarships, to be called after Her Royal Highness, for Mussalman female students. In case her suggestion is approved by her Muslim sisters, she promises to collect a large sum of money from the relations of her father and husband. She calls upon the Khatun (Aligarh), an Urdu periodical for women, to interest itself in the matter.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales before leaving Agra invested Major Smallwood, who did excellent work in connection with the Durbar and laid out the Camp at the Circuit House, with an M. V. O. of the Fourth Class. He also presented Mr. Grierson, the officer in charge of the Taj Mahal gardens, and the sergeant at the fort with the Victoria Medal.

The Advocate of India writes:—When Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were at Amritsar on the 11th instant a part of the programme was a visit to the famous Golden Temple. On Their Royal Highnesses driving up to the place, they were informed that a rigid rule which could not be departed from, even for the sake of the future King of England, was that nobody was to enter the sacred edifice with shoes on. The objection is to boots and shoes of any kind, and of leather desecrating the ground in the temple. The Prince, on being told of the rule, readily agreed to remove his shoes rather than lose the gratification of seeing the interior of the holy temple in India. But there was a difficulty about the Princess. Her Royal Highness, it was whispered, also agreed to enter the temple shoeless, but after some consideration, it was arranged that the Royal visitors should view the temple from a certain position from outside, and this was eventually done. The explanation about the Princess not entering the temple without her shoes, vouchsafed by some of those who were close by at the time, was that her shoes being high heeled removing them would cause her dress to trip her; but a more sensible reason would perhaps be the piercing cold in Amritsar and consequent risk of illness from the damp floor. The readiness of Their Royal Highnesses to comply with the wishes of the Sikh priests in charge of the Golden Temple recalls the incident of a visit to the interior of this building by Lord Lytton when he was Viceroy of India. The story goes, and is still repeated with some show of indignation by orthodox Sikhs, that His Excellency threatened them by going into the temple with velvet socks over his shoes. The matter somehow got wind, and those who remember the occurrences say that it nearly cost the Viceroy his life.

Pioneer.—Any visitor who stays a few days here cannot fail to be impressed with the fact that the Maharaja Scindia is a most active-minded and talented ruler of his State. His personal interest in all affairs and his energetic direction of the matters both great and small become apparent in many ways. He seems never to give himself a moment's rest at present, for every arrangement concerned and ordered by him receives at the same time his superintendence, and he sees that no detail is neglected. He is seen everywhere, and his guests know him better than anyone else in Gwalior, his kindly presence and courtesy leaving the pleasantest of impressions. If any trifling difficulties arise His Highness seems the first to know of them, and they are put right in a moment. He leaves nothing to chance, and yesterday at the military display his share in all the working arrangements was by far the largest. His orders and directions were to the point and there was prompt action to make the sports and the sham fight a success. In the camp containing well over a hundred persons the accommodation is luxurious, and the host's attendants are in readiness to render help, but it is the Maharaja himself who takes care that there shall be no failure in the comfort and well-being of all, and if a motor refuses to start it will probably be His Highness who suddenly appears and puts some of its gear in order, for he is a great motorist, and can drive with a skilful hand. If there is a question as to this or that arrangement being modified, or some addition made to the programme he is at once conversant with the subject, and everything runs smoothly forthwith. Confusion or delay seems foreign to anything in which he has a hand. All is well ordered, and one man's authority is everywhere in evidence.

As it is in this palace and camp, so it is in the State as a whole under normal conditions. The Maharaja is a ruler with enlightenment and a wide knowledge of his subjects and their affairs, which have insured most remarkable progress in Gwalior since he was invested with full powers. He is only in the thirtieth year of his age, but in the decade during which he has administered his territory he has worked out reforms that were as happily conceived as they have been well carried out. He has had the ambition to rule in a manner that would make this State a model one, and there has been no pause in carrying out measures that would ensure the material prosperity of the people. The history of his public works policy alone, if it were given in actual detail, would show how he has recognised the advantages that follow upon the construction of railways and roads, the provision of proper buildings for official and public purposes, and in the opening out of the country generally. Here at his capital he has given a trial to municipal government, and he does not scorn to be president of this civic body in order to ensure success in its earlier stages. The administration of justice, the revenue system and domestic policy generally, are all on modern lines, though there is no rude and harsh disturbance of popular traditions and those privileges so dear to the Hindu race. Civilisation is seen in its most beneficent form, and the people welcome it as it comes direct from their ruler, who they know has their welfare at heart. There are three millions of souls in this State of Gwalior and only some fifteen thousand are Maharattas like the Chief. Yet one would have to go far in India before finding a better or stronger administration. Famine has left it unaffected in prosperity, for its resources are carefully husbanded, and even now, with drought in some districts the strain of relief will be easily met. There is personal rule here in its concrete form, but not the selfish and thoughtless form which is sometimes found in Native States. It is the rule of a young Chief with clearly defined ambitions that govern all his conduct and absorb all his energies, and the results are already such as must stimulate him to further action. In civil matters there is a concentration of effort by the Maharaja which makes for efficiency among officials of every rank. There is no sluggishness or indifference permitted, and the example set by His Highness reacts upon his Sardars who have their share of responsibility also in State affairs. We see them now in their glory of Durbar dress and surroundings, but they have their duties and obligations of everyday life, and these are not neglected. If one had to choose a new motto for Gwalior the most fitting would be "Loyalty and Progress", for it is here that we see there qualities in the fine flower of their maturity.

But the Maharaja looks beyond his State and plays a part in larger affairs. Imperial defence has peculiar attractions for him inasmuch as he has the instincts of a soldier, and is devoted to the study of military subjects in his spare hours. His support of the Imperial Service movement has been not only thoroughgoing but enthusiastic throughout, and only this year he has raised more troops and strengthened his transport. Now there are three regiments of Cavalry, two battalions of Infantry, and a most efficient transport train, all well equipped and kept constantly ready for Imperial Service when needed by the British Government. One remembers too how the Maharaja went to China on Sir Alfred Gaselee's Staff in 1900, and how he sent a hospital ship at his personal expense to Tientsin on the same occasion. One of his great ambitions is to see active service, and he takes every opportunity of exercising his troops in order to qualify himself for leading them in war. He is a most practical soldier, and one had only to see him yesterday handling nearly 5,000 men on parade to understand his keenness where his army is concerned. A compact and efficient force is what he aims at, and though the picturesque retainers and irregulars still figure on the scene here on great occasions, it is the Imperial Service regiments and the transport train which really absorb the Maharaja's interest. It is well that this should be so, for the days of levies and contingents in India have now passed away.

In respect of education the Victoria College, which has grown up out of the old Lashkar College, is well organised, both as regards instruction and discipline. It was in 1894 when the Maharaja was given his first ruling powers that His Highness appointed his tutor Mr. J. W. D. Johnstone to be Inspector-General of Education, and three years later the English Department of the Lashkar College was transferred to a new building which Lord Curzon opened. This is the Victoria College of to-day with its principal and eight professors teaching upwards of six hundred students. It is affiliated to Allahabad University up to the B. A. standard, and has a laboratory and a workshop for technical studies, while an engineering department turns out men for Gwalior Public Works. Connected with the College is a High School and an Oriental Department, the Sanskrit Section of the latter ranking, it is stated, second only to Benares for instructional purposes. Victoria College and its subordinate institutions contain fourteen hundred students, a goodly number, considering the scattered nature of Gwalior territory. Female education is provided for by the Maharani's Girls' School, founded in 1897, which has accommodation for a thousand pupils, but progress has been slow, and only about half that number are on the register. The two Maharanis of Gwalior, the mother and the wife of the Maharaja, take much interest in the school which has Hindi, Maharatti, and Mahomedan sections, so that persons of different religions may benefit by the teaching given. It is hoped that the sphere of usefulness of the School may soon extend.

This morning the Prince and Princess with the Maharaja and a small party motored out twenty miles to Paniar. The Prince then rode on about 1½ miles, the Princess being carried in a palaki. Here a shooting tower commanding a nullah was reached and Their Royal Highnesses took up their position while the beat was started. It was not however until half-past three that a young tiger showed on some leafy jungle. The Prince waited until he was within 80 yards and then killed him with a single shot behind the shoulder. This was the only sport of the day, and the party motored back to the palace. Another beat has been arranged for to-morrow when it is hoped better results will be got as more distant ground is to be tried.

25TH DECEMBER 1905.

Daily Telegraph.—GWALIOR, Sunday, December 24 (4-40 P.M.)—Saturday's tiger shoot provided a most exciting experience. The Prince of Wales had a country covered with thick, thorny scrub. The tigress gave His Royal Highness a difficult galloping shot, which wounded her. The Maharaja was amongst the beaters following her, and she charged on the group, comprising the Maharaja, Sir Partab Singh, and General Beatson, the Maharaja killing her when she was thirty yards away.

On Saturday the Prince of Wales secured another tiger. The scene of the beat was Tekanpur, twenty miles from Gwalior. A well-managed beat put a tigress in full view of the Prince, but in broken ground, intersected by small water-courses. Galloping at full speed the tigress did not give an easy chance, and it was difficult to say whether she was hit.

Sir Partab Singh declared that she was wounded, and this proved correct. The look-outs reported that the tigress had not left the slope of the second hill, which she climbed after being fired at, but every effort to drive her back past the Prince was futile. After lying for some time under a bluff, she was at last dislodged, and with a terrific roar came straight down the hill at the beaters. Sir Partab Singh, who was on foot, turned her at fifty yards with a bullet, following the shot up with another, which caused her to swerve towards the Maharaja, who jumped behind the tree and rolled her over with a bullet through the neck at thirty yards.

To-day Their Royal Highnesses attended Divine Service.

Indian Daily News.—Boat-races on the moat are being arranged for the Royal visit to Mandalay. Among the attractions will be two crews of Inthas from the Inle Lake, Southern Shan States, whose method of rowing with the leg will supply a novel sight for the visitors. Work is now proceeding on practically all the pandals to be erected for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales in Rangoon. In all some fifteen arches are being erected.

In the schools pandal fifteen thousand children will be accommodated.

In connection with the arrangements proposed for the reception and entertainment of Their Royal Highnesses at the Royal Lakes here on the night of the 15th January, the Prince and Princess will be rowed across the waters on the Karavik Pong in company with the Lieutenant-Governor, Lady White, Miss White, and a few officials. In view of further arrangements another allotment of Rs. 2,000 is to be obtained from the finance sub-committee.

While the Prince and the Royal party are occupied in shooting, the rest of the Maharaja Scindia's numerous guests are being agreeably entertained. The Camp is most elaborately and admirably arranged, and for visit to the Fort and other places of interest, elephants and motor cars as well as carriages are provided. The Maharaja of Gwalior shows his eclectic taste by maintaining probably the finest elephant stud and certainly the largest motor carriage of any Chief in India. The Prince has to-day gone out to Singhpur.

The Prince and party accompanying him had excellent sport to-day and a fine tigress, measuring over eight feet, was shot. The shoot took place at Tekanpur, twenty-three miles from Gwalior, the place being reached by motor. When the tigress made her appearance the Prince fired and wounded her, but not mortally, and she bounded off into the jungle. An interesting beat then began, and after about two hours the wounded beast appeared at the top of the hill. Meanwhile the Maharaja, General Beatson, and Sir Partab Singh had left their shooting tower and were at the bottom of the hill when the tigress came out at the top. She gave a roar and charged towards them, but the Maharaja and Sir Partab Singh firing rapidly put several shots into her and despatched her. The first shot fired as she charged down missed, but when the animal came to be examined four shots were found to have taken effect.

An interesting Gymkhana has been held this afternoon by many of the Maharaja's guests for handsome prizes given by His Highness.

Further details of yesterday's tiger shoot at Tekanpur give particulars of much interest. The position from which His Royal Highness waited for the beat was a small saddle joining two longish slopes, the tops of which rose in steep bluffs, the sides being covered with dense thorn jungle. A well managed beat put the tigress out in full view, but in ground broken with small water-courses. Galloping at full speed she did not give an easy chance, and it was difficult to say whether she had been hit. Sir Partab Singh, however, declared from the first that she was wounded and it was subsequently found that she had been hit in the leg. After being fired the tigress entered the second hill, and the look-outs declared that she had not left its slopes. The Maharaja with extraordinary quickness gathered his beat, worked them up the hill, and brought them back from the opposite direction. Attempts were made to drive the tigress past the Prince, but she refused to move in that direction. After lying up under the bluff she was at last dislodged and with a great roar charged straight down the hill at the beaters with whom were the Maharaja Scindia, Sir Partab Singh and General Beatson. Sir Partab Singh turned her within fifty yards of him with a bullet, following it up with another which made her swerve to the Maharaja Scindia. Jumping behind a tree, His Highness rolled her over with his second bullet sent through the neck at thirty yards distance.

This morning the Prince and Princess attended service at St. Peter's Church, Morar. The Bishop of Nagpur preached and the National Anthem was played at the close of the service.

The offertory was for the enlargement of All Saints' Church, Nagpur, which is to be the Cathedral Church of the Nagpur Diocese. Their Royal Highnesses drove this afternoon through the Morar Cantonments, and visited the Gwalior Fort which crests a lofty hill and is extensive and interesting. The ascent of the hill was made upon the elephants which were painted and decorated. Their Royal Highnesses will attend service at Morar church again to-morrow, and the Prince will afterwards go out for more shooting. Their Royal Highnesses leave Gwalior to-morrow night for Lucknow.

Madras Mail.—GWALIOR, 23rd December.—To-day the Prince of Wales went out after tiger, accompanied by the Maharaja. The Princess did not join the party on this occasion. The scene of the shoot was at Tekanpur, about 22 miles from the Palace. The shooters motored and drove out and the shoot, as on the previous day, was from a small tower. After beating for about two hours, a tiger was driven within range. The Prince wounded it badly, and then the beast disappeared in the thick growth. It was another two hours before it could be located, and then it suddenly broke cover. The Maharaja, who was ubiquitous as usual and was on foot amongst the beaters at once shot it dead. The tiger proved to be a fairly grown beast and measured a little over eight feet in length.

GWALIOR, 24th December.—The scene of yesterday's tiger shoot was at Tekanpur, twenty miles from the Palace. Leaving soon after breakfast, His Royal Highness motored and drove to the small shooting tower that stands there and with the completeness of details that marks all the Maharaja Scindia's arrangements the beat at once began. It provided the most interesting and exciting day's sport the Prince of Wales has yet enjoyed.

The Tekanpur shooting tower stands upon a small saddle joining two longish slopes which rise into stone bluffs. The sides were covered with dense thorn jungle affording plenty of good shelter and making the beat by no means an easy matter. Some hundreds of the Army were engaged in the task and a well managed and patient beat put up a tigress in full view of the Prince. But the ground was broken with small water-courses and as the beast was galloping at full speed she did not afford an easy shot. It was difficult to say whether His Royal Highness's bullet had struck her. Sir Pertab Singh was positive that it did, and, as subsequent events showed, he was right. The look-outs declared that the tigress had not left the slope of the second hill which she entered after being wounded. There she was in the thick thorny growth and she had to be dislodged.

But this was no easy matter. The jungle was so thick that the beaters could scarcely see fifteen yards from them and to turn a wounded tigress out of this growth required no little skill. With extraordinary quickness the Maharaja, who was the animating personality of the shoot, gathered his beaters, worked them up the hill and brought them back from the opposite direction. It was hoped to drive the tigress back past His Royal Highness and so afford him a chance of a second shot. Every effort, however, proved futile. She lay tight under a bluff, and it illustrates the thickness of the jungle to say that some of the beaters were for half an hour within 25 yards of the spot where she was crouching and did not see her. After nearly two hours' persistent effort she was dislodged. "A—woof" showed that her lair had been discovered and with a terrific roar she charged down on the line of beaters.

No one who knows the Maharaja needs to be told that he was where the scent was warmest and the beat most active. No one who knows those good sportsmen, Sir Pertab Singh, and General Stuart Beaton needs to be told that they were on foot with him, the latter with no more deadly weapon than a stout stick. With almost unerring fatality it was in the direction of this group that the wounded beast charged. Sir Pertab Singh turned her when within fifty yards of him with a bullet and followed it up with another shot, which made her swerve towards the Maharaja Scindia. Jumping behind a tree, the Maharaja rolled her over with his second bullet through the neck when she was only thirty yards from him. All's well that ends well, but this hot following up of a wounded tiger on foot in such thick jungle even by such experienced shikaries might easily have had a different termination. His Royal Highness returned by motor, reaching the Palace at six o'clock.

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales did not join the shooting party. Instead she spent the morning quietly in the Palace and visited the Maharani, who speaks English fluently and sings quite charmingly. In the afternoon she went for a short drive by the Victoria College and other buildings which line the parade-ground to the Hospital. In the course of the drive the Princess passed the maidan, where a small Gymkhana was in progress. The leading State officials have been absolutely indefatigable in entertaining the Maharaja's guests. Badminton competitions and Rifle matches, putting competitions and golf and croquet have been the order of the day, and the Gymkhana was a delightfully well arranged and varied little affair. Indeed, so well is Gwalior provided with facilities for recreation and so well have they been supplemented that the difficulty of the Maharaja's guests has not been to find pleasant employment but to make time to take part in all of them. The old Fort with its interesting archeological remains, is a never-failing source of interest, and all day the State elephants were busy carrying visitors up and down the steep pathway that leads to the walls.

The central hall is crowded with the four pillars which help to bear the pyramidal roof, but the extraordinary richness of the carving which covers the whole of the yellow sandstone removes the impression of heaviness and is typical of the most ornate Hindu school. Tea was served at the Sas Bahu, and Their Royal Highnesses returned to the Palace as the sun was setting.

The hospitality of the Maharaja Scindia is proverbial but never was it more splendidly exercised than now. Their Royal Highnesses and their immediate entourage are housed in the Palace, in the immediate vicinity of which is a small camp for the Staff. Quite recently the handsome Nautilao Palace was converted into a new Guest House and well appointed. Here and in a neighbouring camp 120 of the Maharaja's personal guests are being generously entertained. Amongst their number are General Sir Archibald Hunter, the Lord Bishop of Nagpur, the Viscount and Countess D. Humieres, the Count and Countess Quadt, Lady Locke Eliot, Lady Elles, Sir Allan Arthur, the Hon'ble Major Daly and Mrs. Daly, the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Russell, and Mrs. and Miss Russell. Nothing could exceed the solicitude of His Highness, of Mr. H. V. Cobb, the Resident, and of all the Staff for the comfort and enjoyment of this large party.

Boat races on the moat are being arranged for the Royal visit to Mandalay. Amongst the attractions will be two crews of Inthas from Inle Lake, Southern Shan States, whose method of rowing with the leg will supply a novel sight for the visitors.

Work is now proceeding on practically all pandals to be erected for the reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales in Rangoon. In all some fifteen arches are being erected.

Morning Post.—Bikanir, as we saw it last, was like the city of a dream. With twilight the mass of the fortress Palace seemed to rise dominant above the town, its great square shoulders thrust up clear of the huddled houses, the ivory whiteness of its soaring face, the rose-red bastions of its sandstone terraces alone able to challenge the desert's absorbing, obliterating emptiness, standing above the darkening waste of sand out of the evening's solemn purples, vague as the fabric of an Arabian entertainment, with towers that seemed builded of opal and of pearl. When Northern India lay at the mercy of Muhammadan raiders Bikanir was a city of refuge, where rich Hindu merchants built houses and kept their families and occasionally themselves. The desert was a fence about them, which the most reckless freebooter seldom cared or dared to cross. Thus were built in Bikanir, amid the rough mud huts, darkening its narrow alleys, the tall houses so richly carved from the soft red sandstone which hardens in the desert wind: and thus was given to the city that exotic air which makes Bikanir, set in those encroaching sands, seem to belong less to Hindustan than to Persia or to Syria. Almost in emulation of the desert colours, of the red city swept by yellow sand, seemed the use of red and orange in the Bikanir liveries. The Camel Corps, which did such good service in Somaliland, and is probably second to none, wears them in turban and cummerbund above a white blouse, but the house-hold troops are sheer concentrations of the desert's heat and glare. But the eye, however fond of warmth and sunlight, is grateful for a change from the undiluted red end of the spectrum, after even a few days of it, and Lahore had only to be herself to be most effective.

For Lahore is green, incredibly green to the traveller in Rajputana very short of rain. She taps one of the great rivers of the Punjab, and pours water over herself with a prodigality that takes the parched man's breath away. She lives in great gardens, deep in trees; so deep that the houses are scarcely to be seen, and each man hangs his name on his garden gate to let it be known where he is living. There are no streets of shops as in England we understand them; the shops are bungalows also, set back in compounds, and you have to approach your bootmaker and your banker by a carriage drive. The result is to make Lahore a city of far distances, in which it is impossible to do anything on foot, but it offers one in exchange miles of apparent park on either side of her wide avenues. She had spent water more lavishly even than her wont in keeping these at their greenest and, then most foolishly, she gave further expression to her loyalty by erecting a hideous screen of mottoes and bunting which almost hid them from view. The mottoes were the most mechanical expression of cordiality which such misconceived decoration can achieve, while lacking all the humours of misspelling and babuosity which lightened their dreariness in the Native States, the same trite sentiments being repeated in the same type hundreds of times over, while the bunting attained a pertinacity in disfigurement which seemed scarcely credible in anything so well meant. The native city and bazar, delightful also, but in a quite different fashion, dark, irregular, densely packed, were spoilt in the same way; even the camps of the chiefs assembled here to meet the Prince, and capable of so much in their barbaric manner, were packed away behind monstrosities of arches, and beribboned with meaningless school-feast flags.

Indeed, it is plain that we are going to pay dear in many directions for the privilege of accompanying a Royal progress. Among the privileges here must be reckoned the two most interesting events in Lahore; the review on our last morning of the Punjab Imperial Service Troops and the Punjab ball of the night before.

The review, as a review, was a small thing; Camel Corps, Cavalry, and Infantry, little more than three thousand in all, but representing a movement that means a good deal to India, not only giving employment to a class of men who are only fitted to be soldiers, and who make excellent soldiers, whose assistance some day we may be very glad to have, but providing an interest and occupation for their rulers whose position under our parental superintendence is often far from enviable. When we take them young we do our best to turn them into the likeness of English youths, while offering them only those outlets of youth on which we should not consider an English training to be worthily expended. What we practically offer them is a career of sport, and we are considerably relieved if we succeed in making them good sportsmen. We do so succeed—occasionally; but even our success has often undesirable consequences.

We have recently—and to Lord Curzon be the credit—given proof of our desire to offer a career to the sons of the native chiefs by the institution of the Imperial Cadet Corps. After a boy left one of the four colleges to which the sons of feudatory chiefs are sent there was nothing for which his tastes and training fitted him. He generally took the easy descent, for which every facility was offered him, and took it at a considerable pace. Now in the Cadet Corps he receives a serious military training, which will fit him to assist in the instruction of the Imperial Service Troops of his State, where any exist, with the chance, should he show exceptional ability, of obtaining Staff employment with the Imperial Army. His status in that position will need subsequent defining, but our obligations require that difficulties of that sort should be overcome. The Cadet Corps is a digression from the subject of the review, for the Imperial Service Troops date from a suggestion of Lord Dufferin, but both had their origin in the desire to provide congenial work for men, for whose idleness and its consequences the British Raj is undesirably responsible.

The troops which the Prince inspected were well drilled and well equipped. The Camel Corps was not up to the Bikanir standard, neither so well mounted nor so well trained; indeed the Bikanirs worked better trotting than did the Bahawalpuris at a walk. But the foot soldiers were very little inferior to a native regiment, and the Patiala Lancers, extremely well horsed, were as good as could be wished.

About the Punjab ball there was an interest of another kind. From some Indian cities there is an exodus at Christmas into others, and Lahore is one of them, the whole province flocks. Christmas week is one long joyous holiday. Cricket, polo, gymkhanas, dances leave in it scarcely an empty hour, and only a grudging space for sleep. In England—no! in England there could be no equivalent, there can be no comparison. In England we amuse ourselves apologetically; we make charity a background for our fêtes and balls. Here the background is plague, pestilence, and famine, and the feast needs no memento mori of other men's afflictions. In India they can amuse themselves without excuses, because life there is at the best an uncertain business, and sudden death is at everyone's elbow. A man came up from Mithankot for the Punjab ball: he was taken out of Lahore Station on a charpoy, his ulster wrapped round him in the roasting sunshine, and his helmet tilted over his face. That is what separates Indian gaiety from the thing in England with the same name. You cannot put it into figures because, of course, sickness and death are everywhere; but while at home they are things one mostly hears or reads about, here they are visible presences; you brush against them in the street, and never feel quite secure from their touch on your shoulder.

So Christmas week at Lahore is something more than a round of gaiety. For the men who take wing to it from every part of the Punjab—from the borders of Kashmir and Rajputana, of the Frontier and North-West Provinces, or from a stricken, sweltering district to which they have been banished—it is something of a roll-call after a hard year's fighting; a roll-call in which there are sure to be names unanswered; perhaps never to be answered again, and in which they are glad enough to be able to reply to their own. There is no show of sentiment; but in every greeting that least inflection of surprise which says so much in India, in the handshake a hard keenness of welcome, and much frankness in the talk, which covers the bygone months quickly and begins so often with dead friends.

The Punjab has called itself "the Sword Hand of India," and so thinks itself still, though robbed of its frontier; and "Punjab head" is the ailment which we call "swelled" at home.

But this sense of superiority, of being a select and second band, rather adds a charm to this yearly gathering; tempers the personal regret for its lost fighters with a grief for the public service, which is a pretty touch, and found only where men put faith as well as fondness into their work. This year the Punjab ball to the Prince and Princess brought the chief features of Christmas week a month earlier to Lahore. Every house was filled with friends for it, every hotel had its compound white with tents, for the exorbitant discomfort of which dozens were clamouring; dozens more, after the Indian fashion, which regards the railway station as something between an hotel and a home, dressed in waiting-rooms after a night and day's journey, and, left the ball-room for their special before the dawn. And so, one way or another, some nine hundred came, and, spacious as are Lahore's resources, there was need for every inch of its fine floors, for Lahore dances, as the saying is, "eighteen annas to the rupee," and, having come so far to fill it, saw the programme through. It was a soldiers' night; uniforms everywhere; the gayer colours of the Indian Army, mixed with the red and blue and gold one knew. For once the ladies' dresses did the toning, and the room was only adorned by groups of lances and wreaths of crimson pompons drawn up to a ceiling of sky blue.

Our last Royal dance was the Byculla at Bombay, in a streamy heat, well up in the eighties. Here, a mere thousand miles northward, we had stars that sparkled in an English winter sky, and an air that whitened our breath as we sought near dawn for our own traps in the tangle of carriages. Tum-tum, ekka, tonga were there, open all of them to the weather, for India never in the practical matter of a dance stands on the order of its going, and it was mostly to ladies perched up on high dog-cart seats, or tucked away under tonga awnings, muffled in furs, and wrapped in laces that the merry farewells were said and plans remade for the Christmas meeting.

Pioneer.—Gwalior Fort is one of the historic strongholds in India, and its natural advantages for defensive purposes before the age of long-ranging artillery were such that but few enemies cared to essay its capture. There rises isolated in the plain a long flat-topped hill of red sandstone, with precipitous sides, 300 feet high, and with a breadth ranging from 200 to nearly 1,000 yards. Where the rocks had a gentle slope scarping was employed, but this was rarely necessary, as the sides run almost sheer from the ground, though a ravine cuts into them at one point. Along the whole length of the summit run masonry and stone walls, crenellated for musketry and with embrasures for guns some of these being very modern. Six gates give access to the fortress, all placed so as completely to command the approaches. The Ganesh Gate was built as far back as the fifteenth century, while the Bansur Gate was the work of one of the earliest of the Kuchhwaba Rajas. The great Man Singh built the Elephant Gate, which was part of his palace, and which still remains with portions of its decorations of blue enamelled tiles to show what a splendid edifice it was. The decorations of the interior are well worth attention. Archaeologically immense interest attaches to the fortress, for the rock sculptures and the Jain temples still present many features worthy of study. The colossal figure of Adimath, the first Jain pontiff, and an idol fifty-seven feet high, which Baber ineffectually ordered to be destroyed, together with eighteen statues ranging from twenty to thirty feet in height, and extending over half a mile of the rock face, are the most prominent. Caves hewn out of the rock show where hermits lived centuries ago, and where byragis lurk even now. The large Jain temples on the small plateau which crowns the hill present fine examples of stone carving, and there are graven images ranged about there that were placed there as the result of exploration and excavation some twenty-five years ago. The fortress was captured several times by the Mahomedan conquerors of India, and British Troops have twice stormed it. There is one tank which has heroic and yet terrible memories attached to it. It is known as Johar, and as the name implies it commemorates the immolation of hundreds of Rajput women, who went to their death when the hordes of Altamash were storming the forts.

Fort Gwalior as we see it to-day is practically a deserted citadel. Well-graded roads lead up to its principal gates, moderating the steep ascent, and though the walls are kept in perfect repair the garrison is a small detachment only, and the guns are used for the ceremonial purpose of firing salutes. The stone barracks in which British troops lived from 1858 to 1886 still remain, but they wear a desolate air, and the old play grounds of the soldiers are bare and dusty spaces. The Fort and Morar cantonment was rendered back to Maharaja Gayaji Rao Scindia twenty-one years ago, Jhansi being acquired in exchange, and from that time onwards it lost its importance. It still stands guard, however, over the old town of Gwalior, lying close under its north-eastern walls, while two miles or so away is Lashkar, or the modern town, with its palaces and public buildings. The story of modern Gwalior is well known. Daulat Rao Scindia had his great camp pitched there from 1794 to 1805, and this naturally resulted in a town springing up on its site. There are now 100,000 people where Daulat Rao's armies lived under canvas at Lashkar, and old Gwalior has declined to the status of a big village. Looking from the walls of the fortress one has a grand view of all the surrounding country, prettily wooded in parts and with low hills breaking the even contour of the plain. The railway is seen near at hand, and four miles away is a pleasant oasis with a church tower rising from the trees, and marking the site of the old Morar cantonment, that station which the British soldiers came to dread, for cholera swept it again and again. The officers' quarters and barracks are used by the State for the Army which is kept here for training purposes, and thus the accommodation which the British Government provided for military purposes is not wasted. The church has still its local congregation, and its peaceful solitude is never likely again to be disturbed by the alarms of war.

To-day the Prince of Wales went out after tiger accompanied by the Maharaja. The Princess did not join the party on this occasion. The scene of the shoot was at Tekanpore, about twenty-two miles from the palace. The party motored and drove out, and the shoot, as on the previous day, was from a small tower. After beating for about two hours a tiger was driven within range. The Prince wounded it badly, and then the beast disappeared in the thick growth. It was another two hours before it could be located, and then it suddenly broke cover. The Maharaja, who was ubiquitous as usual and was on foot amongst the beaters, at once shot it dead. The tiger proved to be a fairly grown beast and measured a little over eight feet in length.

The Maharaja has taken care to provide plenty of amusements for his guests, apart from the Royal party, for whom tiger shooting has been arranged. The band of the 10th Royal Hussars plays beautiful selections of music from time to time. There are shooting, badminton, bridge and other competitions, while for this afternoon a gymkhana has been got up with events for ladies and gentlemen. Pigsticking is also to be had for those who care to go into the jungles. His Highness has been the most hospitable and thoughtful of hosts, and the Royal party, together with all the guests, will not readily forget their visit to Gwalior.

To-morrow and on Christmas Day Their Royal Highnesses will attend Divine Service in St. Peter's Church, Morar, the sermon each morning being preached by the Bishop of Nagpur. The offertories will be for the enlargement of All Saints' Church, Nagpur, which is eventually to be the Cathedral Church of the diocese, but which now seats only 250 persons, though the Church of England population there is over 1,000. Some Rs. 30,000 are required to raise the seats to 500, though even this does not include the cost of the improvement and decoration of the interior of the church. Some Rs. 6,000 have so far been obtained, including Rs. 1,500 as a grant from the Diocesan Building Fund.

Times of India.—In the pleasant coolness of the early afternoon Their Royal Highnesses visited the famous rock fortress which has played so conspicuous a part in the history of Central India. That vast mass of ochreous sandstone which rises like a huge battleship from the plain, a mile and a half long and at its maximum three hundred and forty-two feet high, marked Gwalior out as a seat of power as surely as did Chitor the Sesodia Rajputs. And hence it is that the ruins its walls protect form an epitome of the history of the State. Hindu, Jain, Rajput, each left their mark thereon, and there is an unmistakable ugliness about the disused portions which hall-marks them as evidences of the British occupations which went on at intervals until the affairs of Central India were ordered in their present shape. Motoring to the north-east entrance Their Royal Highnesses, who were accompanied by the Maharajah, mounted the gorgeously caparisoned elephants awaiting them and in this fashion made the ascent of the stiff slope to the Elephant Gate under the shadow of the nobly proportioned walls of Man Singh's Palace. Thence to the Man Mandir with its graceful courts and exquisite fretted tracery all carved out in the soft yellow sandstone which has such a restful air. The fine old Palace was carefully repaired in 1881, and the blue and yellow tiles are as fresh in colour as the day they were wrought into the fabric.

From the Man Mandir Their Royal Highnesses' itinerary lay to the Telika Mandir, or Oilman's Temple, supposed to date from the eleventh century, and the loftiest building in Gwalior. In the vicinity of the temple are the archaeological fragments discovered during Major Keith's restoration work, a quarter of a century ago; and it is interesting to note the strong Egyptian resemblance in many of the figures. Thence to the prow of the Fort to enjoy the grand view obtainable therefrom—the new city of Lashkar, the white palaces glistening amid their umbrageous surroundings, and the arid plain stretching away to the horizon. Retracing their steps, the Prince and Princess descended to the terrace to view the colossal Jain statues hewn out of the living rock. These colosses which stud the face of the rock are amongst the most interesting monuments in Gwalior. The largest is fifty-seven feet high, and the seated figure of Nemath, the twenty-second Jain Pontiff, is upwards of thirty feet high. The Emperor Baber, in a fit of iconoclastic zeal, ordered the figures to be destroyed, but only the faces were mutilated, and in some cases these have been repaired by the Jains with coloured stucco. From the terrace, Their Royal Highnesses walked to the Sas-Bahu, a temple which is supposed to be of Jain origin, though some give it a Hindu foundation. Whatever the source, it is an extremely picturesque fragment. The Central Hall is crowded with the four pillars which help to bear the pyramidal roof, but the extraordinary richness of the carving which covers the whole of the yellow sandstone, removes the impression of heaviness and is typical of the most ornate Hindu School. Tea was served at the Sas-Bahu and Their Royal Highnesses returned to the Palace as the sun was setting.

The hospitality of the Maharajah Scindia is proverbial, but never was it more splendidly exercised than now. Their Royal Highnesses and their immediate entourage are housed in the Palace, in the immediate vicinity of which is a small camp for the staff. Quite recently the handsome Nautilao Palace was converted into a new guest-house and well appointed. Here and in a neighbouring camp, a hundred and twenty yards off, the Maharajah's personal guests are being generously entertained. Amongst their number are General Sir Archibald Hunter, the Lord Bishop of Nagpur, the Viscount and Countess D'Humieres, the Count and Countess Quadt, Lady Locke Elliot, Lady Elles, Sir Allan Arthur, the Hon'ble Major Daly, and Mrs. Daly, and the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Russell, Mrs. and Miss Russell. Nothing could exceed the solicitude of His Highness, of Mr. H. V. Cobbe, the Resident, and all of the staff for the comfort and enjoyment of this large party.

Madras, December 23.—H. M. S. Renown arrived in Madras Harbour at daybreak this morning. She will stay here till the 3rd proximo, when she leaves for Saugor to embark Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales for Burma.

In regard to the reception by the Indian Ladies of Bombay to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, on the occasion of the Royal visit to Bombay, it may be interesting to state that the contribution amounted Rs. 14,017. After payment of expenses, Rs. 8,820, there is a balance to the good of Rs. 6,090. The accounts were unanimously passed at a recent meeting of the Ladies' Committee. The expenses are as follows:—Album, Rs. 3,000; hire of furniture, carpets, material of decorations including decorating throne, committee's badges, etc., etc., Rs. 2,140; refreshments, Rs. 1,032; lights inside the Town Hall, chandeliers, steps, Rs. 836; lights outside the Town Hall, Rs. 342; printing, stamps, advertisements, invite-cards and telegrams, etc., etc., Rs. 705; flower decorations, Rs. 381; school girls' conveyance, clerks' fees, assistance, supervision, police and Town Hall fees, Rs. 236; and sundries, Rs. 101. Owing to the paucity of attendance the question of the disposal of the balance was postponed to a meeting to be held on Thursday, the 21st of January 1906, at 3 p.m., at Begum Mumtaz Jehan Nusrulakhan's bungalow at Chowpatty.

26TH DECEMBER 1905.

Daily Telegraph.—It was a sweetly hot noonday, and Jammu had proved somewhat barren of interest except as a panorama from the Prime Minister's unfinished Afghan Hindu-Kashmiri palace-villa on Ramnagar. A month ago the museum—which had its origin as a spacious house run up so recently before the visit of the Emperor in 1875 that he wisely decided not to risk sleeping in the still wet, plastered rooms—was suffering, like many other things in India, from an energetic spring-cleaning and re-arrangement. So far only the necessary ordeal of dirt and a general state of locked-upness had been achieved, and the stag's-horn chandeliers of the verandah hardly repaid the trouble of the climb, though they had evidently impressed the Khansamah of the splendid guest-house which here condescends to act as a dāk bungalow. The great temple was not without interest, and it was a source of mixed gratification to note that the costly compliment of a tomb with a gilded copper dome had been paid to the memory of shrewd old Golab Singh, who, in 1846, bought out our interest in Kashmir, lock, stock, and barrel, for half the price of a new hotel in Piccadilly.

Once upon a time there seemed a chance that in sheer desperation and poverty Kashmir would have to be taken over again by the Indian Government, but this last chance of regaining control was thrown away when one Walter Lawrence was sent by the Viceroy to set the financial system of the country upon a sound footing. For the reforms he instituted—one of the most brilliant species of financial administration that India has ever known—not only set the twin States of Jammu and Kashmir on their legs again, but have resulted in such plethoric money-bags that the Maharaja's great brother, Sir Amar Singh, prime minister, commander-in-chief, and guardian tutelary of the territories, hardly knows how to spend the accumulated revenues.

The Palace is unimpressive—a large quadrangle, with every side built in a different style. One is an erection of no particular style, that sears the eye with its white-hot wash; a second suggests Venice; a third, departmental offices at Simla; and the fourth is frankly inspired by the Victoria Railway Station at Bombay. There is a curious custom symbolised by a wooden cage in an open structure in the market place. Into this a new Maharaja enters, almost on his hands and knees, to receive the tilak, or caste mark, from a priest, as a necessary preliminary to his full recognition as head of the State. This statement was denied in toto by one inhabitant of Jammu, so, like Fuller of old, "the Writer intricately leaveth all to the Last Day." This is a necessity that is more common in India than the glib narratives of many good writers would suggest. However, there the wooden cage is, and it seems ill-adapted for any other use.

The bazaar is indistinctive of anything. Babies, huge cup-moulds of raw salt looking like pink sugar-candy, and the usual crimson-bearded Mohammedans of a certain age which they are anxious to dissemble, the usual pirate bulls noising about among the sellers of vegetable stuffs, a few hill sheep, which always suggest that a paper-fastener must be used to keep in its strained position the huge, fat up-turned tail of pink and wool. Nothing was remarkable in all this. An officer of the Imperial Service troops and I wandered on, and then remembered a word of advice as we left the bungalow. We asked where the cage of tigers was, and we went to it. We found a strangely-interesting thing, something, indeed, that seemed better fitted to belong to a new Jungle Book than to the serious region of fact. Yet the story is exactly true. It was so curious that we took some pains to verify it. We had been told that the Maharaja of Jammu possessed the finest tiger kept in captivity anywhere in the world. This, I should say, was unquestionably true.

Our informant might have added that his mate was the worst-tempered prisoner of any menagerie on earth. The cage in which these two are kept is a jerry-built erection of bricks and plaster. The iron bars are as thick as a little finger, and are inserted in the mortar between the bricks at the top. A good deal of the mortar has fallen, and, thanks to the anger of the lady inside, some more of it fell while we were looking on. It did not increase our sense of safety to notice that the bars do not reach to the bottom, but are held in place by two or three traverses of iron. The tiger, a glorious brute of white and orange and black, with steel sinew and teeth like Sikh daggers, lay sulkily in his cage and growled. The attendant was a man of whom some idea should be conceived. Five-foot four, and thin, old, and a little wasted in face, with a long, thin beard of a hundred hairs stirring in the wind; his eyes sunken, but looking straight into your own, with heavy bistered circles low on his cheek-bones, his puggary of white gauze falling deep on either side below his ears, and his almost toothless mouth stained with red catechu—he made up an ensemble that was still dignified, a man to the marrow. Indeed, he let us know that he was of the lordly race of Nadaun, long exiled from the Punjab, and forced to adopt the faith of Islam. As he spoke the tigress again and again flung herself furiously against the flimsy bars; white people maddened her especially it seemed. Her lord growled steadily. The keeper put his anatomy of a hand under his kothi and pulled out a little white bag.

Some years ago, Mangal—I suppose the pair had been trapped on a Tuesday—found that the little back-door of his den was open. The assistant of the little menagerie returned to find him loose in the garden, and fled incontinently. In half an hour Jammu's streets were as those of a dead city. One informant told us that the soldiers, especially, were on the roofs of the houses. Tired of inaction, Mangal stole out and glided silently down the main street of the town, a beautiful vision of orange and black striped death. No man hindered him, and he went down to the jungle beside the Tavi, and vanished. An hour later the keeper came back to his work and heard the news. A few minutes later another solitary figure made its way down the still empty streets of Jammu, with bowed head, beneath the glare of the sun. He had no weapon. Only he had put on a leather coat to keep Mangal from scratching him, as he said. It was a touch that made the incident flash up before the eyes so instantly true that from a European it would have been an unpardonable touch of artistic affection. He had his little white bag in his hand, and he went quietly down the deserted ways and was lost to sight in the jungle. An hour later he returned bareheaded in the sun. At his heels, fawning and kittenish, slouched Mangal, and round the tiger's neck was loosely tied one end of Nadaun's white puggary.

Will you try to reconstruct what the sight must have been? Up over the hard hot cobbles and mud of the empty streets moved the pair. Nadaun, unhesitating and even-paced, never looking back or varying the steady exchange of his thin legs beneath the gaze of the thousands thronging the flat roofs overhead, all in the utter silence of excitement, that the only sound was the mutter of the Tavi far in the valley below. Behind him, ludicrously leashed with the long, frail puggary, the silken-coated brute padding uncertainly with dripping mouth and bared teeth. "Would your honours like to see the effect of this medicine?" Nadaun put his hand into the bag, and scattered a few whitish grains inside the bars. In a moment Mangal was upon them, and his great, rough, red tongue was searching out the tiniest scrap of it. In fifteen seconds he was yawning, and a slathering stream was dripping from his mouth. In thirty seconds he was on his back in the middle of the cell, wriggling from side to side, and beating the air with his huge paws, like a kitten played with by a child. Nadaun put his arm in and pulled his whiskers. Mangal smiled fatuously, and pretended to bite.

This is what happened. It is difficult to explain the reason. Nadaun very naturally refused to allow us to look closely at the powder. It was his livelihood, he said, and his secret, if our honours would pardon him, must be kept. Probably valerian enters into the compound, but it is difficult to recognise any drug that could have so immediate a result. The effect upon the tigress was as much more striking, as she had been more furious but a minute before.

It was all very odd, and the main street took on a new interest as we went back past the long caravans of bullock carts, which were even then slowly carrying out the innumerable necessities and furniture destined for the camp at Satwari, which was to be used by the Prince of Wales during his brief stay at Jammu. At the gate of the bungalow the guard-of-honour provided for the Maharaja on the occasion of his State visit to the Resident, six-footers every man, swung past us to the skirl of the pipes, beneath their colours of crimson and gold, with Lakshmi dancing decorously in the middle.

Daily Telegraph.—Gwalior, Monday, December 25 (8-50 p. m.).—Christmas Day opened bright, clear, and crisp, just cold enough to be bracing. The Prince and Princess of Wales were present at the early morning service.

Towards dusk His Royal Highness went shooting-at Tekanpur, and bagged a tiger measuring 9 ft. 5 in.

The Princess had prepared a Christmas-tree with toys brought from Home, and in the evening the toys were distributed among the clean-limbed young Sirdars and flaxen-haired English youngsters.

Their Royal Highnesses are charmed with the Maharajah's hospitality.

The Prince enjoyed another shoot to-day, and secured a fine male tiger, the largest yet shot during the tour. The beast appeared near the spot where His Royal Highness brought down the tigress yesterday. It was wounded by the Prince's first bullet, but escaped into the jungle. Elephants were brought up, and the tiger charged back in full view of the Prince, who killed it with a second shot.

Their Royal Highnesses leave for Lucknow at midnight.

26TH DECEMBER 1905.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The Royal party had another good day's sport outside Gwalior on Saturday, when a tigress measuring over eight feet was accounted for. The tigress, after being wounded by His Royal Highness, disappeared into the jungle. A two hours' beat followed, during which some of the members of the party left the shooting tower. The tigress emerged and charged towards them but was despatched by the Maharaja and Sir Pertab Singh.

Morning Post.—"Saturday, 2nd December, 10 a. m., Public Arrival. 10-30, Address from the Municipal Committee. 3 p. m., Garden Party. 8 p. m., Banquet." The quotation is from the orders of the day, and it is headed Peshawar. Attock and the Indus are behind us, our horizon lies beyond the frontier; Kabul River runs beside us, and Kabul itself is within two days' hard riding. Every name for miles around has a place in history; in history that reaches from the day before yesterday back to Alexander. Yet, so invincibly English are we, that the day's programme for an event that can happen but twice or thrice in a century is indistinguishable from what might be arranged in any country at home.

"Change here for Dargai," cried the guard at Nowshera. Dargai that seemed beyond the civilised border of the world so short a while ago, when one saw its name first on excited posters and heard it shouted through London streets, become now a little station at which any tourist may disport himself. Compared with that garden parties and municipal addresses seem even commonplace at Peshawar, though Peshawar is still a place of plots and the haven of the discontented. The Prince's drive through the city was a cause of grave anxiety to those responsible for his safety. For weeks before every house overlooking the route had been searched, and at the last moment the doubtful characters were quietly removed, and detectives planted at points of vantage. Police supervision in India is very thorough, and from the day of their landing a watch is kept on the unaccountable till they arrive, as they mostly do, up here.

Germans and Russians are the most frequent foreigners, and the Khyber their ostensible objective; but they probably seldom realise that the Political Officer before granting them a permit has been made acquainted with every turn in India that their feet have taken. So, too, no one enters Peshawar who is not overlooked and an entry made of his history and intentions. Yet, with all this care, those best qualified to speak proclaim their inability to foretell what may happen there to-morrow.

Afridi raids have come during the past few months within a few miles of the city; last year the station was burnt down, and in the dark of this morning Pathan rifle thieves made a successful descent on the Northampton's camp at Burhan. This contrast in securities, between a Royal garden party and thieves creeping between death and the dark into a camp hard by, may be felt during a drive through Peshawar and its cantonments. The city is a shrouded intricacy of streets, up of which no white man would venture. In the bazaar are hundreds of tiny shops, mere open-ended boxes in which two or three men squat and work; grinding corn, sifting flour, cooking sweets, hammering copper, casting solid three-foot wheels of sugar, brazing, tinning—the bellow-fires flaring up at the back of the dark boxes—casting silver, glazing pottery or moulding it on the wheel, weaving silken scarves, squeezing sticky patterns on to wax cloth; or merely sitting beside the piles of grain green and scarlet and honey-coloured; or the heaps of nuts and dates and almonds, or the stripped sugarcane, cut with such a dexterous wrist into little chunks for chewing, or the bell-shaped cages filled with strange breeds of birds.

Dozens more there are; the whole city is like a fancier's shop hung with a thousand cages, where men work squeezed for wall space together in squalid picturesque variety. And in the streets always a moving throng, chattering, chaffering or darkly staring. Men, all of them, with all sorts of faces, wild, cruel, cunning, quarrelsome, the fighting-trader face, beside others with the deceptive, gentle beauty that seems to have come straight from Mediaeval Italy. A queer lot plain men from this side of the mountains, and plain men from beyond the mountains and all the breed of rogues between. And every one of them catlike in movement, with a sly, dry look in the ends of their long eyes.

Only men are in the streets; you must look on the boy-tops for the women, where they sit like beds of flowers above the rough walls built with mud for mortar, and little enough of that, and left with lath and beam sticking out untrimmed. Houses huddled together like a frightened crowd, which has thrust some up above the others' shoulders, as though the whole town were shrinking from the menace of the hills which have poured despair and slaughter over it so often. That is Peshawar; a furtive, evil place that knows itself for what it is.

Now drive out about the cantonments! There are sentries, it is true, behind walls with barbed wire in front of them, and head protection along the top, and a somewhat unusual air of alertness, and at night it is unwise to dally in replying to a challenge; but these things are small matters in comparison with the calm prosperous air that pervades the wide tree-bordered avenues, the big green gardens, the plain stretching itself out in lazy tranquillity to the misty hills. Over it move wandering flocks and herds, the long caravans of camels crawl across it to or from the guarded pass on the days prescribed for them, while among the cantonment trees the Provence rose bushes are covered with flowers, pink and cream and crimson, amid beds of yellow and murrey and bronze chrysanthe-mums, and pale mauve and deep purple violets that colour the dusty borders and scent the evening air. That air, with its cool sharpness the instant the sun goes out of it, and the sun which one seeks for warmth at any hour of the day, are just the sun and air of Southern France in mid-winter, are that the nights are colder here, and dawn seems to warm the world more slowly so that one is often kept shivering till early noon; and in a field service tent the nights are as cold as one can endure with comfort.

But Peshawar cantonment has normally nothing to do with tents; it lies dis-spread amid its gardens, taking deep breaths of the winter air after the blasting heat by which its lungs have been seared; but summer or winter the same strange contrast, in its wide, quiet tree-filled spaces, with the crowded, treeless, muttering town. But no one has really seen or felt Peshawar who only knows the city and the plain. One must see it with the raider's eye from high up in the hills, see it as it looked to the Aryan, Greek, Scythic, Turki, and Moghul soldiery, to Alexander and Kanishka, Mahmud of Ghazni, Timur and Babar; see it lying in its misty purples from the hard red hills, and all that golden India lying beyond it; see it, that is, spread out before one after twenty miles of the Khyber's suffocating dust and heat. The remembrance that all the conquering hordes of Asia have roared and swept through that narrow gullet upon sun-steeped Hindustan, and that the blood of our own kin has been spilt so prodigally upon its stones must make impossible an unromantic view of it.

Yet apart from its glamour of impending victories the Khyber as a pass is almost commonplace. Bare rock it all is, barren, rugged, pitiless desolation; red reeking, scorching rock without relief or mitigation. In that alone its drama lies, and to taste it you must thread it in the wake of a caravan in the hot weather. Then if you are susceptible to the sun it is very possible that a winding sheet is all that you will require at Landi Kotal; for of one caravan last summer seven hardy hill men died in that blazing twenty miles. But beyond its heat, its barrenness, the chaotic crumpling of its great hill sides, and the use that the Life Force has made of it, there is nothing in the Khyber which is not surpassed by a dozen passes on our northern borders. There are no breathless edges to the road, no astounding precipices, no ineffable glaciers no eternal snows. It does not even offer, save perhaps at Ali Musjid, the suggestion of heroic contest, for it is not a pass that anywhere could be held against over-whelming odds. Three to one is the very outside superiority that would be required to force it, and one would be disposed to guess the needful difference at even less than that.

But one looks at it with altered eyes when one thinks of all it means to India, when one reflects that among these rocks perhaps, may be the burial place of our fame, that here the fatal challenge may be made to our greatness as a World Power, and the best of her sons may in vain be sacrificed, because in the hour of her prosperity England would not consider the years to come.

Standard.—Not till you begin to travel about India do you gain some idea of its size. To most of us at home India is a country like another, one country among many. We talk of India as we might talk of Italy and Spain, of "seeing India" as some of us try to "see" Switzerland or Portugal. I suppose our geography-books are partly responsible for this, and the Map of the World, drawn "on Mercator's projection," which delusive invention, too familiar in the school-room, colours all our notions of the relative size of different portions of the earth's surface. On Mercator's projection, the territories near the Equator are unduly shrunken, and those towards the Pole unfairly drawn out. India looks somewhere about the size of Sweden and Norway, and a quite insignificant triangle compared to the frozen wastes of Siberia.

But when you have been but a little while in Asia your views undergo a change. You appreciate the meaning of that shrewd remark of a great Oriental Administrator, who said that the first and most essential fact to be learnt about India is that there is no such country. There is no such country as India; the name includes many countries, which have some common characteristics, it is true, but also many and deep-seated divergences. For India is larger than all Europe without Russia, and it has a greater population, and almost as many varieties of climate, race, creed, and custom. We do not, as a rule, generalise about Europe; we are cautious about saying that a "European" does this or that, or has such and such peculiarities. We know that the Norwegian is a European, and so is the Sicilian; we hesitate before sweeping statements which would have to apply to the bourgeois of Aberdeen and the peasants of Andalusia. Yet, as Sir John Strachey says, Scotland is more like Spain than Bengal is like the Punjab. The mountaineer of the Northern Frontier is as far, physically and morally, from the Madrassi villager as the Londoner is from the Montenegrin. We have to do with a subcontinent, which includes many diverse countries, tribes, states, religions, and peoples, though not as yet a nation.

The Royal tour, if it did nothing else, should have brought home to Englishmen the exceeding greatness of the heritage which has been gained for them by valour, foresight, diplomacy, and good fortune. The Prince of Wales spent some three weeks in visiting the feudatory Princes of Central India and Rajputana. The public at home learns that he is passing a day or two with Holkar, at Indore, three days with the Maharaja of Udaipur, two at Jaipur, five with Scindia at Gwalior, and so on. A few telegrams and casual references in the newspapers, and one Ruling Chief is left, and another has his turn. But anybody who looks up his Atlas and his Gazetteers will discover that each of these "petty" Sovereigns, who individually count for so little in the great checker-board of Indian administration, would elsewhere be reckoned a somewhat important personage. We do not take very much notice of them in England; Simla is polite to them, but it has many other things to think of. Yet each of these Princes rules a territory equal to that of a second-rate European kingdom, and he has his Court, his army, his feudal aristocracy, and perhaps a couple of million of subjects. Indore is quite a minor State, but it is larger than the Kingdom of Saxony. Jaipur is much more extensive than either Holland or Belgium, and more populous than Greece. Gwalior is about the size of Scotland, and it has nearly as many people. And if we go a little further south, to the Deccan, we find the Nizam ruling an area bigger than that of the whole of Great Britain, with some fifteen millions of inhabitants. All these principalities are mere appendages to the Imperial throne, and they exist on sufferance, and by our good will and pleasure; and all together the whole of them do not include more than a fifth of the three hundred millions of human beings who are counted in among the inhabitants of "India."

But it is the diversity as much as the magnitude of the great Empire which impresses the imagination. It is a good object-lesson to pass swiftly—or as swiftly as the formidable distances permit—from Bombay to the land of the Rajputs. The change is quite as striking as it would be in travelling through from the Adriatic to the Baltic. In that coast port the visitor from Europe, even if he comes in the autumn, is pretty certain to complain of the heat. He finds himself plunged into a moist and sticky warmth which makes him perspire like the hot room of a Turkish bath. But on the upland plains he is in a more vitalising atmosphere. The sun burns fiercely at midday, even in the cool season, and in the summer, before the monsoon, it flames with scorching fury, parching the soil into brown waste of blinding white dust. But the air is dry and bracing, there is a snap in it at its worst, and even when pitiless it is not enervating. For the luxuriant greenery of the lower Ghats, you have exchanged the bare plains, the baked deserts, or the rugged kopjes of the table-land. Instead of the busy merchants and traders of Bombay, the pushing Parsis, the alert bunniahs, the foxy-faced, intriguing Mahrattas, you have a race of hunters, cattle-drovers, shepherds, and horsemen, squareheaded, square-shouldered, and upstanding, burly as Yorkshiremen, and independent as the farmers of the Lothians. At Jaipur, some friends and I borrowed a couple of tongas from the transport train, which is the Maharaja's very sensible contribution to the Imperial Service Corps, to drive to the ruins of Amber. When we got back, I offered one of the drivers a gratuity; but he declined to take it, pointing to a medal he wore, and murmuring something about the Maharaja. He was a soldier, and a servant of the King, and he did not need a present for doing his work. The custodian of the old Palace was equally dignified. He, too, explained that he was in the Maharaja's service, and did not wish to be "tipped" for showing a little attention. But the tips would have assuredly been accepted in Bombay or, for that matter, in most other parts of India and the world. Perhaps a Scottish Highlander, of the old strain, would have refused them too.

It is of the Highlanders that the Rajputs remind one in many ways even including physique, though the Indian sun has tanned them brown, and darkened their eyes and hair. But they are raw-boned, wiry, and muscular with something of the Caledonian build. As I stood looking at a highly dignified Rajput Chief, who was entertaining us in his Palace, I thought that with his robes and turban exchanged for a bonnet and kilt, and his black ragged beard dyed a sandy red, he might very well pass for some patriarch from the moors and deer forests, a great territorial magnate, a great sportsman, shrewd, kindly, domineering, and quick-tempered. The racial affinity may be nearer than we suspect. The learned Lieutenant Colonel James Tod, who wrote "The Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan," what time William IV was King, holds that the Rajputs are of Scythian origin; and the Celts and the Scythians are thought by some authorities to have had close family connections, in the early days when the fighting branches of the great "Aryan" stock were roaming Europe and Asia to find a permanent home.

Whatever they may be, the Rajputs are very different from the majority of the peoples who inhabit the plains of Hindustan and the Deccan. They came down from the north, settled in the upper Gangetic and Trans-Indus region, and in the early centuries of the Christian era they seemed likely to found a great empire. But they were a small people in point of numbers and they were always divided among themselves. Like the Celts once more, they have never shown a capacity for national or political unity. They were tribesmen and clansmen, devoted to their Chiefs, but incapable of combination on a large scale. The Mahomedans, more numerous, and directed by leaders who were statesmen and organisers as well as soldiers, gradually pushed them away into the deserts and arid sandy tracts, which lie south and east of the great rivers. Here the Rajput chiefs founded their kingdoms, started their capitals, Jodhpur, Chittor, Amber, Boondi, Alwar, built their white-walled Palaces, beautified them with enamel work and mosaics and painted ceilings, took their pleasure in marble summer-houses, by cool tanks and artificial lakes, hunted the wild boar, the tiger, and the sambhur, and ruled precariously over turbulent feudatories, each with his own clan of devoted subjects.

They were great builders and gardeners, and founders of Hindu temples, these Rajput kings, and they were always fighting; sometimes with the Moghuls, sometimes with their rebel barons, often with one another. When the generals and pro-consuls of John Company took to the work of pacifying India in earnest in the later 18th century, the Rajput princes were in a bad way. They had been so weakened by their contests with the Moghuls and their internal dissensions that they were making little head against the Mahratta raiders, who were sweeping over the country like locusts. To Rajputana, the English came not as conquerors, but deliverers. The princes accepted our supremacy without reluctance, and, for the most part, they have been loyal and steady supporters of the Power which has secured them in their ancestral thrones and rendered it possible for them to maintain their independence and identity without perpetual conflict.

Thus all Rajputana remains to-day outside the direct control of the Indian Government, and it is in some respects the most characteristically Oriental and unchanged portion of the Empire. It is ruled by its own Princes; with the old laws and customs we have interfered no more than is necessary; the Maharajas are still the heads of a feudal hierarchy, and they live in state, in the midst of a horde of retainers and privileged hangers-on, as an Oriental monarch likes to do. They have their cavalry, and their batteries of artillery and stout regiments of infantry, armed with flint-locks of Enfield muzzle-loaders; and their elephants, and camels and menageries of wild beasts, and their household guards, with ancient swords and halberds and coats of mail. Each has a British Resident to keep him in order; but the Rajput princes are as a rule honest and fairly capable rulers, and they are not interfered with unduly though a little pressure has sometimes to be put upon them to organise famine relief properly and to encourage education, and see after the making of roads.

It is an old-world, interesting land, full of primitive ways, the ways of a people of herdsmen, horsemen, and soldiers. Fighting is in their blood, though peace has long reigned, and it is seldom that a shot is now fired in anger. Now and again we may allow a Maharaja to levy execution upon a recalcitrant Sardar, or to coerce rebellious aboriginal Bhils with fire and sword. But the tradition remains, and a Rajput still clings to his weapons, and does not like to move without them. As you travel through the country you may see the peasant going to his fields in the morning with his curved scimitar hugged close under his cotton robe, or driving his bullocks with a long matchlock over his shoulder. They have something of the bearing of warriors, their gestures are free and animated, they are great talkers and as voluble and noisy in a crowd as any folks I have seen, and they are good-humoured and easy to deal with. The Rajput gentleman is frank and pleasant, a good sportsman, a manly and genial companion. He takes kindly to the English ways, is the best polo-player in India, and may be seen sometimes at Ranelagh and Hurlingham. But will the Rajputs keep their stamina and virile virtues now that the fighting days are over?

The young Thakors, who might have been leading their men in the battle and the march, pass their lives in a rather supine inactivity, relieved by sport and quarrels with their liege lord. Some who know them tell us that they are less pugnacious, less tenacious, less masculine altogether than their fathers before them. We used to get many Rajputs in our Indian army, and have still good companies of them. But the supply is falling off; the younger men, it seems have lost some of their taste for the military life and the whole population has been hard hit by the famine and the plague. The future of the race, and that of their barren, picturesque country is one of the problems of India, one of the many unsolved riddles which meet us at every turn.—Sidney Low.

Times.—GWALIOR, December 25.—The Prince and Princess of Wales bring to a close to-night their singularly successful visit to Gwalior, whereof one of the prettiest incidents has been the Christmas tree for the children of Gwalior sardars arranged and presided over with characteristic kindness by the Princess, who brought all the decorations and presents with her from home. The children, boys and girls, in the silken bravery of their native dresses, were first called up singly to receive their presents from the Princess. Then the tree was given over to them to plunder at their hearts' content. All formalities quickly disappeared, but none forgot their pretty inborn manners. The novelty and graciousness of the whole scene in the drawing-hall, where the huge tree blazed with lights and glittered with presents, will certainly live in the memory of many a Gwalior chief.

The Maharaja Sindhia's hospitality has been truly magnificent. The whole programme was carefully thought out in consultation with Mr. Cobb, who is not only the Resident in Gwalior, but the Maharaja's trusted friend, and every detail was personally superintended by His Highness. Nothing was probably have impressed the Prince and Princess more than the vigorous personality and versatility of their host, who, for instance, after directing a splendid review in the forenoon and a sham fight in the afternoon, and delivering a particularly felicitous speech at a State banquet in the evening, proceeded in the small hours of the morning to the scene of the forthcoming tiger shoot to inspect the final dispositions of the beaters, then returned in time to escort the Prince, and, some slight accident having occurred to the gear of the motor-car in which the Prince was to have driven, took charge himself of his Royal guest and drove him out in his own car with the skilful hand of a practised motorist, who, by the way, is equally at home on a railway engine. Every day and every hour, whenever anything had to be done, Sindhia always seemed first on the spot to do it himself.

This is doubtless the secret of Sindhia's success as a ruler and administrator. In spite of the strain of an almost continuous fight against drought and threatened famine, he has given within a dozen years a vigorous impulse to the material development of his State, endowed it with an excellent system of light railways, carefully husbanded its revenues, raised the standard of male and female education, and rendered in connexion with Imperial defence services of which the Prince conveyed to him a well-deserved recognition by announcing his appointment to be honorary colonel of a regiment of which His Royal Highness is himself Colonel-in-Chief. Nothing is, perhaps, more characteristic of Sindhia's many-sided interests than that during the Chinese troubles in 1900 he was not content to offer personal service and proceed to China on Sir A. Gaselee's staff, but, though the ruler of an inland State many hundred miles from the sea, chose as his special contribution out of his private exchequer to charter, equip, and despatch a hospital-ship to Tien-tsin.

Some critics may contend that is too much a one-man's rule in Gwalior, but its efficiency explains and justifies the high position which Sindhia has already achieved in the front rank of the ruling chiefs of India.

27TH DECEMBER 1905.

Catholic Herald.—The Capital of the Indian Empire is about to be honoured by the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and we trust the reception granted to our Royal visitors will be as loyal and magnificent as that accorded them throughout their progress in the greater portion of India, already visited. It is the first time that a future Empress honours her Indian subjects with her presence. All the greater reason that the Capital should put on her best attire, "call out a holiday" and rejoice in the presence of her Royal Guests.

It behoves all, without distinction of race, creed, or origin, all who live under the benign rule of Great Britain, to unite in welcoming Their Royal Highnesses. With deep respect and acknowledgment of the fair treatment we receive, in general from our rulers, and the liberty we enjoy under a non-Catholic government, we beg to join our humble voice to the universal concert which will greet our visitors at their arrival in Calcutta, and wish a "Hearty Welcome to the future Emperor and Empress of India."

At the same time we raise our hearts in prayer to Heaven that this visit may be fruitful in cementing union and peace between Rulers and ruled, and that God's choicest blessings may rest for ever on the Prince and Princess of Wales.

Civil and Military Gazette.—Her Royal Highness's Christmas tree in the early evening was one of the most charming episodes of the tour. In the midst of the distractions of the closing days of her stay at Home the Princess made the time to purchase the toys that were to accompany this Christmas tree. Her Royal Highness must have been more than repaid by the joy of her little guests. There was erected in the handsome durbar hall a real Christmas tree, a thing of beauty glowing with electric lights, ablaze with tinsel glories, and decked with all that can lure the juvenile heart. And this tree was planted in a very excellent imitation of real snow sparkling with frost. It was, too, in charge of a Father Christmas who made the heart warm. A snowy haired and bearded old gentleman, the rich blood mantling his cheeks, his crimson raiment breathing comfort, and dropping spangles wherever he went—a disguise in which it was hard to discover Sir Clement Filose.

And round the tree were grouped the sons and the daughters of the leading Sardars and a sprinkling of flaxen-haired Saxon children. And what happy nice little lads and lasses they were. The boys with their clean-cut features, their frank eyes, their cocked turbans and brodered surtouts and stockinged foot. The little maids with their braided hair, their rich saris, their quaint timid ways. Most conspicuous was a group of Kashmiri children with their small round turbans and handsome skirts. And what perfect manners. Some of the older boys from the Sardars' school spoke excellent English and bore themselves like true gentlemen. The smaller ones, although a little shy, were never gauche—indeed, they were so intensely pleased that they forgot to be shy. One gazelle-eyed young nobleman of the age of five had to be occasionally disinterred from his hiding-place behind a chair. A mite of three refused to be comforted away from his guardian, who to have been selected on the principle that governs the choice seems of small nursemaids—that it is not so far for the child to fall. But a more dignified and happy lot of juveniles could not have been found.

On this glad throng descended the Princess. Not the regal stately figure which graces every state ceremony but a beautiful gracious loving lady with kind smiling eyes, and a bright word for everyone. A lady whose presence will live in every little heart. Then the distribution of gifts began, the boys salaaming like courtiers, the lasses with a quiet confidence in this great lady which robbed them of all tremors. But when with much snapping of cord and rending of wrappers the treasures were disclosed, even the sedate gravity of the young Mahratta nobility gave way before a shrill burst of joy. And let it be said for their judgment that of all the handsome and apposite gifts none gave greater pleasure than the photographs of Prince Eddie and the other royal children which will be treasured even beyond magical pocket-knives and dolls which closed their eyes. But the appetite came with eating. It was "Saheb, the red one," and "Memsahab, the white one" until the Christmas tree was stripped of all that could be taken from it. And when the Prince in his shooting costume and the Maharaja in serviceable khaki coming straight from the shoot mingled their joyous personalities with the throng the cup of happiness was complete. And yet there was a little ache behind it all, for the thought of those who were not there would obtrude. Of such is service in the East.

With this happy picture let the visit to Gwalior conclude. These have been days of unrestrained joy. Of joy in the hospitality of the gallant Prince whose best has been in his eyes hardly good enough for his honoured guests. Of gratitude for the unflinching tact, prevision and courtesy of the Resident, Mr. H. V. Cobbe. Of thanks for the active consideration of all the State officials, notably Mr. Johnstone, Mr. Lake and Mr. Francis, who gave themselves up entirely to the entertainment of the Maharaja's guests. These have indeed been red letter days in the tour.

Daily Chronicle.—LUCKNOW Tuesday.—After spending our Christmas in the picturesque and mediaeval native state of Gwalior, with its elephants, its Mahratta swordsmen, and its splendid opportunities for tiger shooting, the Royal party have now returned to the spreading, well-kept roads, the formal ceremonies, and the regular khaki-clad troops of British India.

The city of Lucknow, with its avenues of bosage, its agreeable climate and its never-to-be-forgotten memorials of the great Mutiny, is the most interesting of the British stations in the plains of India. It was round the Residency here that the death struggle of our race centred in the blackest days of 1857. Here Sir Henry Lawrence, the peacemaker, died in the early days of the siege, and here Havelock, the gallant veteran laid down his life when his work was done. The names, too, of Colin Campbell and Outram, the Bayard of India, will endure as long as Lucknow itself endures. Thrice the British garrison in this capital of Oudh had to be relieved, and thrice the streets of the city ran with blood; and here some of the most heroic deeds in the history of our Empire were wrought.

On their arrival here to-day the Prince and Princess of Wales visited the scene of the defence of the Residency. Outside the ruined and shot-torn building were drawn up the survivors of the gallant band of Mutiny veterans, now, alas, sadly reduced in numbers. The Prince inspected them, addressing them in words of appreciation and encouragement. Before doing so he had already participated in a ceremony which showed the gulf separating these modern days from the Mutiny, with its savage reprisals and deep racial hatred. When a memorial of the Prince's visit to Lucknow was proposed the native gentry of the province subscribed so generously that ten lakhs of rupees (£66,000) were raised for a medical college of which the foundation-stone was laid by the Prince this afternoon. Moreover, the municipal address of welcome, which was read at the station at the time of their arrival, breathed the deep spirit of personal loyalty to the British throne, which has been felt in Oudh since the days when the Kings of Oudh said that they desired no higher title than that of younger brothers of the Kings of England.

We leave here on Thursday and journey straight on to Calcutta, which we reach on Friday. Owing to the Rawalpindi manoeuvres the Prince was unable to reach the capital in time for the race-week in Christmas time; but a number of ceremonies have been specially arranged for him, including a proclamation parade and public reception.—Stanley Reed.

Daily News.—There are few spots of more tragic interest to England in the wonderful story of her rule in India than that which the Prince and Princess reached yesterday. The Prince would be able not only to recall the story which tells of the magnificent pluck of his race, but to visit some of the ruins that bear the marks of that grim, but splendid, struggle. He would see the ruins of the old Residency where Sir Henry Lawrence died, and the remains of the famous Alum-bagh which Havelock and Outram with the relief force had to capture before they could effect the rescue of the brave little garrison which had kept the old flag flying, as Tennyson has so splendidly said:

Never with mightier glory than when we had reared thee on high.

Flying at top of the roofs in the ghastly siege of Lucknow—Shot thro' the staff or the halyard, but ever we raised thee anew,

And ever upon the topmost roof our banner of England blew.

When the Indian Mutiny of 1857 broke out on May 30 Sir Henry Lawrence fortified the Residency and garrisoned it with 750 British troops. Four anxious weeks passed. And then the hordes descended. An attempt was made on June 29 to check them about eight miles from the city, but failed, and on June 31 the British were besieged. Two days afterwards:

Death—for their spies were among us,

Their marksmen were told of our best,

So that the brute bullet broke through the brain that could think for the rest—

Sir Henry Lawrence was wounded by a bursting shell, and a couple of days later he succumbed:

Frail were the works that defended the hold that we held with our lives—

Women and children among us, God help them, our children and wives!

Hold it we might—and for fifteen days or for twenty at most.

"Never surrender, I charge you. But every man die at his post!"

Voice of the dead whom we loved, our Lawrence the best of the brave;

Cold were his brows when we kiss'd him—we laid him that night in his grave.

Three times in succession the little garrison, commanded first by Major Banks, and on the last two by Brigadier Inglis, beat back the assaults of the enemy:

Surging and swaying all round us, as ocean on every side Plunges and heaves as a bank that is daily devoured by the tide—

So many thousands that if they be bold enough, who shall escape?

Kill or be kill'd, live or die, they shall know we are soldiers and men!

* * * * *

Handful of men as we were, we were English in heart and in limb,

Strong with the strength of the race to command, to obey, to endure.

But the frail fort they thought they could not maintain for a month they held for 87 days. On September 22nd Havelock and Outram, with the relieving force, captured the Alum-bagh, and on the 26th reached the Residency.

Hark cannonade, fusillade! is it true what was told by the scout,

Outram and Havelock breaking their way through the fell mutineers?

Surely the pillbox of Europe is ringing again in our ear. All on a sudden the garrison utters a jubilant shout. Havelock's glorious Highlanders answer with conquering cheers.

Dance to the pillbox!—saved! we are saved!—is it yet! is it you?

Saved by the valour of Havelock, saved by the blessing of Heaven!

"Hold it for fifteen days!" we have held it for eighty-seven!

And ever aloft on the palace roof the old banner of England blew.

Again, however, the siege was formed by the rebels, both of the Residency and the Alum-bagh. The latter was relieved by Sir Colin Campbell on November 10th, and, after driving the mutineers out of their two principal strongholds, Sir Colin succoured the Residency on November 16th.

Only six days later the gallant Havelock died of dysentery. Leaving Outram with 3,500 men to hold Alum-bagh till his return, Sir Colin escorted the civilians and ladies to Calcutta. In the following March he was back, and after a week's hard fighting drove the rebels from their trenches. And that ended the Indian Mutiny.

Daily Telegraph.—This city possesses a golden temple in a square tank wherein a seated priest continually waxes a yak tail to keep the flies from settling on something hidden by silk coverlets. There is time also to see some old weapons in the gatehouse before catching a train for Lahore. This is a not unfair rendering of the usual knowledge of Amritsar possessed by the Indian traveller. If he be a deeper student of his guide-book he will also know that it is the capital of the Sikh religion, and that the object beneath the silken sheets is the Granth Sahib, or sacred book of the Sikhs. But there is yet more to know about this rich and crowded town, and here and there a crumb of interest may be picked up wholly apart from the political or moral aspect of the faith which is here centred or of its devotees. The tale of the founding of the Sikh religion is not to be read in guide-books, but it is more interesting than the man who lifts weights beside the golden temple. It is of such a nature though it happened less than 450 years ago there is, in the tale as it is told to-day, a trace of primitive simplicity which it is pleasant to hand down.

It seems that in old days, when the kings of the race of Lodi from Afghanistan oppressed all the land of the Punjab, and no man withstood their wickedness, that a man called Nanak, of great stature, was stirred beyond endurance by the remembrance of the burdens which were laid upon himself and all other Hindus by these infidel and alien conquerors. Therefore he took thought in silence for many months as to what he should do, and at the last he found a device whereby he might gather round himself such a company of desperate men as should form the beginnings of a new Hindu army, and drive the Mohammedans headlong from the holy places. So one day he bought five goats, and hid them in his house, and when the market was full to overflowing with men of all races and castes, Nanak suddenly threw open the door of his house, and with a terrible cry rushed forth naked into the marketplace, saying again and again, "Who will be a Sikh? Who will be a Sikh?" And as he cried he brandished the heavy steel-curved blade which you may still see in the gate-house of Amritsar. So all made way for him, for the finger of God was upon him, and after a while a lusty man of the people, as straight and tall as Nanak, came forth and said, "I will be a Sikh." Now, no one knew what this meant. So Nanak, with a great cry, caught him by the arm and dragged him within the house and the door was shut. Then he put him in an inner chamber and caught a goat and cut off its head, and poured the hot blood upon himself and upon his disciple.

Then, streaming with blood, he rushed out again into the market-place where there was a great crowd assembled, crying terribly, "Who now will be a Sikh?" And, after a while, a man came forward and said, "I, too, will be a Sikh. After all, death is better than the slavery we suffer." So he too departed into the house and the door was shut. And Nanak took another goat and killed it also, and poured the blood on himself and on the man. And again he opened the door and rushed out in the market place even more horrible to see than before with his sword dripping and his eyes rolling in his blood-smear face. And he cried aloud and said again and again: "Who now will be a Sikh?" and another man said "I, too, am weary of life; I also will be a Sikh, whatever it be." And again Nanak did as before, and again went out, and another man presented himself, and went within. Then Nanak, all blood from head to foot, cried out to the multitude, "There is room but for one more," and a young man answered and went into the house. After this Nanak armed the five men and gave them the five sacred emblems, and these five men thereafter, all besmeared with blood, sprang out from the house upon the multitude, and ceased not to slay the Mohammedan among the people until the setting of the sun. Thus were the Sikhs founded, and many thousands came to Nanak, and were baptised into the Sikh religion.

But the fortunes of the Gurus, and how a crow flew into the tank at Amritsar and came out white as snow, as you may see painted on the wall of the Durbār Sahib to this day; and how the wife of a leper came to Arjan Guru and told him of the miracle wrought at another pond twenty miles away, and how Arjan Guru built at Tarn-taran another golden temple to be as holy as Amritsar's, though unknown to the tourist; and how the leper settlement was founded; and how Har Govind ran four miles into Amritsar hewing a lane through his Moslem foes all the way, after that his head had been cut off just where a chorten still marks the spot to witness if I lie; and how the earthquake of last spring added, in strange fashion, yet another proof of the truth and divine origin of Sikhism—all these things there is here no room to tell. Yet it is these things, and such as these, which are the real Amritsar, and the soft threshing of the white "chowry" over the rose and yellow and lemon coverlets of the Granth Sahib; the dull monotone of the priest upstairs, at his eternal task of recitation; the myriad petals, white and red, upon the sacred carpet, among which stray cowries—widow's mites indeed, for a cowry is worth but the fifteen-hundredth part of a shilling—have reverently been thrown by the worshippers at dawn; the gold and jewels of the Treasury; all these have a special meaning if a little more is remembered than the bald narrative and appraisal of the best of guide-books; and Guilford also among his lepers and Hendley and Davys over their ever-filled operating table are part and parcel of the whole.

Loyalty is the keynote of Sikhism and of the Sikhs. Deep into the elements of their faith is their duty to their King rooted, and we have made full use of it. From far Hong-Kong to the Chaman you will find Sikhs, soldiers in the post of danger, policemen in the post of trust, great, tall men, standing shoulder-high above other men, and equally unmoved, whether among the crowd in the street or among the lights and uniforms and low dresses of His Excellency's ball, where, like the Scottish chieftain's candlesticks, the huge Sikh bodyguard, in crimson and gold, stand like statues, two and two, beside the doorways and the throne. The delight of the Sikhs is to hear of their Emperor, who lives far away across the black water, and one more short story must be told of this. The Sadhus—whom most travellers know as fakirs—are the holy vagrants of the faith, and for many years they have known the truth about the Empress Victoria's previous reincarnations before she entered into the body of the new-born baby in Kensington Palace.

Once upon a time there were three Sadhus meditating together beneath a tree, and before them was a bowl of milk for their midday meal. After meditation they rose up and scattered fresh wood-ashes on their faces and their bodies, and went out to the road to beg the alms of the faithful. And after they had gone a krait snake crept from a thicket hard by and flowed over the side of the bowl into the milk, and there lay waiting for the Sadhus when they should return at midday. But in the jungle, where there are many eyes, the action of the krait was seen, but no beast ventured to interfere, though the Sadhus are the friends of all that lives in the jungle, for the bite of the krait is death before a beast may drag himself under a bush to die out of reach of the vultures. But there was a frog who saw the thing, and she said to herself, "I, even I, will save these holy men, though I am a despised beastie." So she hopped to the bowl and hopped over the edge into the milk, and the krait bit her and she died.

At midday, therefore, the Sadhus returned to eat their midday meal and drink the milk, and, behold, a dead frog lay on the surface of the milk, and it was utterly defiled. So they sorrowfully poured away the milk on the ground, and at the bottom of the bowl they found the snake. Then they knew what had happened, and they took counsel together and inquired, and so found that the frog had been inhabited by a noble soul, who in her next reincarnation would be a great and good woman, more powerful and more virtuous than any other in the world. And when Victoria came and ruled over all the land of India, from Peshawar to Cape Comorin, they consulted again, and, behold, it was the soul of the kindly frog, which now found a fitting body in which to continue the work of piety and unselfishness, which had caused her death in a previous life.

So there was bitterness at Amritsar, even beyond other places, when the news came in the month of January five years ago. These things, and others like them, will give a better significance of Amritsar to the traveller, though, indeed, it is not all Amritsar that is remarkable for either piety or propriety, as the authorities—who have laboured for month to receive the Prince worthily—know well enough. But every man and woman in it is loyal to the core, and that—is it a small thing?

Daily Telegraph.—Tuesday 20th December 3-5 p. m.—Last night Their Royal Highnesses left Gwalior, with its recollections of wild Maratha days, for Lucknow, with its absorbing memorials of the Mutiny. On their arrival they met with expressions of loyalty on every hand. The municipal address spoke of the days when the Kings of Oudh desired no higher title than that of "Younger Sons of the Kings of England."

After the reception of this address the Prince laid the foundation-stone of the medical college, to which the native gentry had subscribed ten lakhs of rupees, as a memorial to the visit. He afterwards visited the Residency, with its memories of the epic siege, outside being drawn up survivors of the mutiny and veterans.

In the evening Their Royal Highnesses entertained the Talukdars of Oudh.

Daily Telegraph.—The Prince and Princess of Wales arrived here at half-past nine this morning. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the station by the Governor, who presented to them the Nawab of Rampur, the Raja of Tehri, and the principal civil and military officers.

An address of welcome from the municipality was then read in the central hall of the station, which was ingeniously decorated with every kind of railway plant and material from the works. The address was accompanied by a massive silver casket.

The Prince expressed his thanks, and said that time would not permit him to visit all the places he wished to see in the vast Indian Empire, but he had made a point of including in the programme a visit to this famous and interesting city. His Royal Highness continued:

"The name of Lucknow is very precious to us at home. It is a part of our history of which we are proud, and these sentiments of pride may be shared by the gallant veterans whom we hope to see this afternoon at the Residency. None of us can forget the significant fact commemorated in the monument erected by Lord Northbrook to the brave Indians, who fought by our side. I am told, and I believe it, that the same feelings which inspired them animate the people of Oudh to-day."

The Prince concluded by wishing the city all the prosperity which should attend the capital of "the garden of India."

Their Royal Highnesses afterwards drove to Government House, where at noon they received the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri.

In the afternoon His Royal Highness laid the foundation-stone of the new medical college, which is being erected in commemoration of the Royal visit. Sir John Stanley, Chief Justice, read an address, setting forth that the provinces of Agra and Oudh had united to promote this public work, loyalty and gratitude having made them one people.

The Prince, in reply, expressed his thanks for being identified with the institution, which he said, must have a vast influence on the health and happiness of the population. He rejoiced to think that by the generosity of the Maharaja of Balarampur and others, a great want would now be supplied. He congratulated the promoters of the scheme on having secured such a splendid site. He laid the stone with an ivory and gold trowel and mallet, and received also a silver tray and an ivory casket.

Englishman.—Lucknow achieved the seemingly impossible and at this stage in the tour struck out an absolutely new line in railway station decoration. The city is well known as a provincial centre, as the great epic of the Mutiny and as in the winter one of the most pleasant plain stations in India. It is not so familiar as a great railway headquarters, the administrative seat of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, one of the three State lines in the country. But it was this side of its activities that sounded the dominant note to-day when their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales alighted on their arrival from Gwalior. One looked in vain for the streets of bunting, the mottoes and the formal rows of plants in pots, and found nothing more suggestive of hackneyed decoration than the inevitable red cloth. Why does not some one imitate the bold example set at His Majesty's Coronation and substitute a Royal blue for the red of which everyone is growing a little tired. The reception room, however, was unique. It was lined with every variety of railway material from a locomotive to a guard's whistle and as all was arranged with an exact eye to effect the result was not only novel but extremely pleasing.

Gwalior, with its Imperial elephants, its picturesque reminiscences, of the wild Maratha days, has been left behind. Here we are in one of the handsomest, as we certainly are in one of the most interesting, plain stations of British India. But with its wide roads, its spreading cantonment, its absorbing memorials of the mutiny, Lucknow has brought the Royal Visitors back to the region of official routine and much ceremony. So it was that the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, Sir James LaTouche, received the Prince and Princess as they alighted from the train and presented to them first the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri. So it was that the Lieutenant-Governor and General Locke Elliot, commanding the Division, presented the civil and military officers, including the talukdars of Oudh, an interesting group in their handsome dresses and swaying aigrettes. And so it was that the Municipality of Lucknow presented their Address of Welcome which set forth that Lucknow had always prided itself on the special personal loyalty to the British Throne since the days when the Kings of Oudh desired above all other titles to be known as the younger brother of the Kings of England and were honored by their personal correspondence and friendship. His Royal Highness replied to the address.

There was, however, a gallant military display on the road to Government House. The procession was headed by the O. Battery of horse gunners and the Royals, the rear being brought up by the 41st battery of Field Artillery and the 6th Prince of Wales' Cavalry. It passed through the streets lined with the O. and R. Volunteers, the Oxfords, the East Surreys, the Durhams and the 24th Punjabis, the 10th Jats and a dense mass of people. One triumphal arch merits particular note, it preserved the railway character of the reception by being built up of railway plates and supporting a small dining car.

First came the Permanent Way Department with a smart trolley, mounted on a ballasted piece of line and the tools of the platelayers and gaugers formed into set devices. Then the Stores Department, the Prince of Wales' feathers worked in paint brushes and files and effective patterns were with the coloured bull's eyes of signal lamps. Afterwards the Works Department with steel tools shining like silver and cleverly displayed. The Locomotive Section ran a big engine half way into the room painted in brand new colours and surrounded with polished parts and red copper fire tubes. A small telegraph line was erected by the Signalling Department, and grouped round it were the telegraphs and telephones and lamps, which belong to their work. The Traffic Department brought together a multitude of objects of interest, badges and ticket punches, whistles and flags. Then the bare and unpretentious supporting pillars were veiled beneath handsome copper tubes. All this sounds rather bald in the telling, just as the mere enumeration of the weapons in the armoury of the tower of London would be dull and tiresome reading. It was far from bald as a piece of decorative craftsmanship. Their Royal Highnesses were charmed and warmly congratulated Mr. A. U. Pope, Traffic Manager of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, who conceived and superintended the scheme, upon his originality and skill.

After receiving formal visits from the Nawab of Rampur and the Rajah of Tehri, His Royal Highness accompanied by the Princess of Wales laid the foundation stone of the Medical College which is to be the Provinces' permanent memorial of the Royal visit. The history of the movement which culminated in this ceremony is one of which all connected with the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh may well feel proud. It was not until October 20th that the first formal measures were taken, when a deputation of influential gentlemen headed by Maharajah Sir Pratab Narain Singh laid the project before the Lieutenant-Governor. Four lakhs of rupees were immediately subscribed, including a munificent donation of three lakhs from Maharajah Bhagwati Prasad Singh of Bulrampur. Since then money has flowed in freely and the college is assured of an opening endowment of ten lakhs which, it is hoped, to increase to fifteen. The province will not only secure the college for which it has waited for thirty-five years, but will obtain it upon the completest scale with thanks to the liberality of the Raja of Jehangirabad—a branch college for women. The raising of so large a sum by voluntary contributions in so short a time is unprecedented. It is due to the entire co-operation of all classes of the community.

The scene of the ceremony was the site presented by Government, the expense of open high ground stretching from the old Machhi Bhawan fort to the tomb of Shahmina the patron saint of Lucknow. Originally a dense city it was like the Victoria Park, cleared of buildings after the mutiny and not the least of its advantages is that it will continue the fine park which commemorates the reign of Victoria the Good. There were gathered early in the afternoon most of the leading landowners and many of the prominent citizens. Conspicuous among this throng were the cadets of the Colvin Taluqdari School and a thousand students from the principal colleges and schools of the United Provinces, united in recognition of the part they have played in the movement. Of the simple dignified ceremony little need be said. The Hon'ble Sir John Stanley on behalf of the patrons read an address which set forth that the need for a medical college affiliated to the local university was an old one. The interest of the Royal family in all works of this character made the establishment of such a college a suitable memorial of the visit. It then went on to say "the proposal to start this movement was made by Raja Tasaduq Rasul Khan, C.S.I., of Jehangirabad. It was promptly taken up by Maharaja Sir Pratab Narain Singh, K.C.I.E., of Ajodhya and other prominent gentlemen in both provinces. The list of subscriptions ranges from the munificent donations of three lakhs of rupees by Maharaja Bhagwati Prasad Singh of Bulrampur, fifty-five thousand rupees by Raja Tasaduq Rasul Khan, C.S.I., and fifty thousand rupees by the Hon'ble Raja Ali Muhammad Khan Bahadur of Mahmudabad, to the not less welcome offerings of pocket money by students at our colleges and schools. Some of our most active workers have been journalists and busy members of the legal profession. Their Highnesses the Nawab of Rampur and the Maharaja of Benares have given fifty thousand rupees each, while Their Highnesses the Raja-i-Rajgan of Kapurthala and the Raja of Tehri have aided us with gifts of thirty thousand and the thousand rupees respectively. The movement marks an epoch in provincial history for the first time. The two provinces of Agra and Oudh have united in a public work of loyalty and gratitude to Your Royal Highnesses, and have made us one people. We shall endeavour with the help of Government to make this college the best in the East, and it is part of our scheme to open a branch college for women. We respectfully pray that this institution may bear the name of Your Royal Highness and that the branch college for women, when complete, may bear the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales."

His Royal Highness now spread the cement on the nether stone, and the memorial block having been lowered in its place, struck it with an ivory maul, made from the tusks of an elephant, which once roamed the forests of Oudh, tested it and declared it well and truly laid. Returning to the dais he addressed the gathering.

Thence Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to visit the historic landmarks of the siege, but the Princess was renewing her acquaintance with them. Soon after the ceremonies attendant on the arrival were over she drove to the Residency and spent some time reconstructing its story. So many of the original buildings have disappeared and so much has been done in clearing the surroundings that it is impossible to appreciate the desperate nature of the struggle without reference to the raised model maintained in what were the women's quarters. But General Locke Elliot had flags planted in the most salient places to show where the British lines ran and the rebels advanced posts stood. And Their Royal Highnesses were guided by Colonel Bonham, formerly of the Bengal Artillery, who fought at Chinput as well as through the siege. It was dusk before the Prince and Princess quitted the scenes which in their now perfect repose so little suggest the hand to hand fighting of half a century ago.

From the site of the College, Their Royal Highnesses drove to the treasured monuments of British valour, and constancy and Indian devotion that cluster round the Residency. Hitherto it had seemed as if the weather would mar the pleasure of the visit, for a high wind was blowing, raising the clouds of dust, which are the only blots on the perfection of an Upper Indian winter. But when the sun began to decline the wind died down and the Royal cortege passed through the gate. It was a strikingly beautiful evening and the visit was entirely informal, but for one happy exception. With the innate sympathy that characterises the English Royal family, it was arranged that those who fought so stoutly for the Raj should have the privilege of meeting the Heir Apparent to its wide dominions, so all the Mutiny Veterans, who could be assembled with their wives and their daughters, gathered to meet the Prince and Princess, but from the latter there was one conspicuous omission. There lives in Lucknow a Mrs. Lincoln, who passed through all the horrors of the siege. Its long drawn agonies bit so deeply into her memory that since the day when Sir Colin Campbell led the survivors along the bank of the Gumti to safety, she has never dared to venture within the walls.

They gathered under the shadow of the shot-torn tower, from which flew the flag which the armed horses of Oudh would not pull down, although their advanced works were not a stone's throw from it. Round the simple obelisk which commemorates the courage of Her Majesty's 32nd Regiment of Foot, some thirty in all, one half of whom passed through the siege, fresh faced Englishmen bearing the burden of years remarkably well, hard bitten Eurasians, who as boys from the LaMartiniere College played the part of heroes in the defence, grizzled Sikh and Panday, who were grown men when Havelock and Outram cut a pathway through the swarming city, a quiet almost homely group, but one which brought memories of the epic siege surging through the brain, for each the Prince had his handshake and frank sailor-like word and cordial appreciation; for each the Princess, a gracious smile and hand clasp. Then the veterans crowded round the obelisk to record the autographs, which are to be stored amongst the Prince's souvenirs of the tour, whilst the Princess crossed to where the women sat and Mrs. Abbott, Mrs.

De'Cruz, and Mrs. Ratcliffe who were amongst the besieged were presented to her.

In the evening their Royal Highnesses were generously entertained by the taluqdars of Oudh.

Englishman.—In connection with the forthcoming visit of the Prince and Princess to Rangoon, the Burmese ladies of Rangoon intend to give them a reception, all their own, in a special pandal, now under construction, within the grounds of the Zoological Garden, in the Victoria Park. The committee, which has charge of the arrangements, is presided over by Mrs. Hla Oung with Mrs. Shwe Oh as vice-president and Mrs. Ba Hla Oung as Secretary, and the meeting at which were present the leading Burmese of Rangoon was held at the President's residence, Elgin House, on Saturday to arrange for the collection of the necessary funds and also to give the girls, who are to take part in the Yein Pwe, their first rehearsal. At this Yein Pwe the songs to be sung, both in Burmese and English, have been specially written for the occasion and should prove of interest to the Royal Visitors.

Indian Daily News.—Christmas Day has been appropriately observed in the Gwalior Camp. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the Fort immediately after midnight, a recognition by the Maharaja of the religious faith of his illustrious guests. It was such an incident as the eclectic Emperor Akbar might have commanded, and was an illustration of His Highness's unusually enlightened views, which have distinguished him as an administrator, and have enabled him to make Gwalior one of the best managed Native States in India. A keen soldier and sportsman His Highness is one of the most energetic and capable of Indian rulers, and it has given him the greatest satisfaction to make the occasion of the Royal visit to his State one not easily forgotten. Undoubtedly the Prince and Princess will leave Gwalior with very pleasant memories how they spent the Christmas of 1905. This morning each of the Maharaja's guests was the recipient of a tasteful and interesting Christmas card, containing a portrait of His Highness, and an exquisite view of the great and gleaming Jaibilas Palace.

The Prince and Princess attended service at Marar Church at 10 o'clock. The service was of the brightest. The Christmas hymns "O Come All, Ye Faithful," "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," and "While Shepherds Watched" were sung, a military string band accompanying the choir. The lessons were read by the Rev. E. R. Clough and the Rev. G. E. M. Tongi. The preacher was the Bishop of Nagpur, whose sermon was suitable to the day, and touched upon the progress of Christianity in India, as illustrated by the fact that in ninety years the needs of the Anglican communion in India had so grown that eleven Bishops were now necessary instead of one. The offertory was on behalf of the enlargement of all Saints' Church, Nagpur. At the close of the service the National Anthem was sung.

A very delightful gathering took place this evening before dinner in the Jaibilas Palace. The Princess of Wales held a Christmas Tree, and distributed presents which she had brought out from England to fifty children. The tree was placed in the centre of the Durbar Hall, and was prettily decorated and illuminated by coloured electric lamps. The decorations as well as the presents had been brought out from England by the Princess, who had also brought candles and sockets which, however, the electric lights rendered unnecessary. The young guests included five European children, the rest being the sons and daughters of Sardars of the State, and a very brilliant and charming scene it was that a few privileged persons were enabled to witness. It was certainly a most unusual scene to take place in the great hall decorated in cream and hung with the pictures of the Maharaja's ancestors, who have been accustomed to look down upon imposing ceremonies of the State enacted, where Santa Claus and a British Princess now reigned over an assembly of delighted juveniles. The children of the Sardars wore rich and brilliant costumes, and the electric light from massive crystal lustres flooded the hall. Santa Claus was personified by Colonel Clement Filose, the Maharaja's Military Secretary and a member of a European family who have served the Gwalior State since the days of the Maharaja's ascendancy. Five members of the same family at present hold high military positions in the Maharaja's service. The gifts, which the Princess handed to the children, were enclosed in boxes, and consisted of dolls and other toys dear to the universal heart of childhood. The princess pulled crackers with the children. The Prince, returning from his tiger shoot about 7-30, joined the party with the Maharaja, and was quickly engaged with the youngsters.

The Prince went out after tiger about noon to-day, and was again successful in finding game at Tekanpore. The last discovered a fine male which the Prince wounded. The animal disappeared in thick jungle, and the elephants being brought the next beat was successful in driving the tiger past the Prince who fired again and killed it. His Royal Highness has had excellent sport during his stay at Gwalior, having been successful in each day's shoot. The tiger shot to-day is believed to be the mate of the tigress shot on Saturday. The tiger measured over nine feet.

Indian Daily News.—It was a very cordial and brilliant reception that Their Royal Highnesses received upon arrival at Lucknow this morning. The station was decorated in the most effective manner, and the scene was one of the brightest. At the Royal train steamed in punctually at 9-30, the Taluqdars of Oudh, resplendent in rich robes and jewels, formed the first of three sides of a square which was completed by the Ruling Chiefs, the Judges of the High Court in their scarlet robes, the civil and military officer. The Ruling Chiefs present were the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri, the former in a cerise coloured robe and the latter in a chocolate hue robe richly embroidered with gold. Among the Taluqdars the Prince of Balrampur was conspicuous for the wealth of diamonds, emeralds and pearls which he wore, and an interesting figure was the Maharaja of Ajodhya, dressed in a white kilted dhoti with tight pink trousers and a velvet coat heavily embroidered. His turban was richly bejewelled. The Prince and Princess were received by the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir John LaTouche, Major-General Sir E. Locke Elliot, Commander of the Lucknow Division, and Mr. Davis, the Commissioner of Lucknow.

The Prince proceeded to inspect the Guard-of-Honour of the 1st Oxford Light Infantry, and thereafter the Nawab of Rampur, the Raja of Tehri, the Chief Justice Sir John Stanley, and the Judges of the High Court, the Civil and Military officers present, and the Taluqdars were presented to Their Royal Highnesses by the Lieutenant-Governor, Major-General Elliot and Mr. Davis. Thereafter, Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the central platform of the station where the members of the Lucknow Municipality presented an address of welcome. The decoration of the station was of a unique and ingenious character, every department of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway being represented by its appliances, from the front of a locomotive to a telegraphic installation and a clay figure in a diving suit. An admirable effect was produced by an array of railway lamp glasses, and the decorative effect of boiler tubs and plates was ingeniously displayed.

The address was read by the Hon'ble Sri Ram Bahadur, President of the Municipality, and was as follows:—

May it please Your Royal Highnesses,—on behalf of the citizens of Lucknow we desire to offer our most cordial welcome and to express our grateful appreciation of the honor done to our city by the visit of Your Royal Highnesses. We know how great an undertaking it is for you to travel through the whole of this vast Empire, and how numerous are the calls upon your time, and we feel the more honoured at being distinguished by your gracious visit. Lucknow has always prided itself on its special loyalty to the British Throne, since the days when the Kings of Oudh desired, above all other titles, to be known as the younger brothers of the Kings of England, and were honoured by their personal correspondence and friendship. We have had the honour of welcoming His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII, when in 1875-76 he, as Prince of Wales, visited India, and we humbly ask Your Royal Highness to be graciously pleased to convey to His Majesty our fervent congratulations on his glorious reign, and our profound loyalty to his throne and person. We crave permission to present Your Royal Highnesses with this address.

His Royal Highness, replying, said :—

Gentlemen,—the Princess of Wales and I are very grateful to you for the kind words of your address. It is, indeed, a great undertaking to travel through this vast Indian Empire. Time would not permit of our visiting all of the many places we wished to see, but we made a point of including in our programme a visit to your famous and interesting city. The name of Lucknow is very precious to us at home. It is part of our history of which we are proud, and these sentiments of pride may be shared by the gallant veterans whom I hope to see this afternoon at the Residency. None of us can forget the significant fact commemorated in the monument erected by Lord Northbrook to the brave Indians who fought by our side. I am told, and I believe it, that the same feeling which inspired them animates the people of Oudh to-day. We both hope to enjoy our stay in Lucknow, to study its historical landmarks, and to meet the great Talukdars of Oudh. I shall not fail to convey to the King-Emperor your loyal assurance. We thank you for your friendly welcome, and we wish you all the prosperity which should attend the capital of the "Garden of India."

The members of the Municipality were then introduced by Mr. Saunders, the Deputy Commissioner of Lucknow and President of the Municipality. Mr. A. N. Pope, Traffic Superintendent of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, was presented to the Prince, and explained the unique scheme of decoration in the hall, the details of which were examined with much interest. Their Royal Highnesses left the station, attended by an escort of the 1st Royal Dragoons, the 6th Prince of Wales Cavalry, and a Battery of the Royal Horse Artillery, and drove to Government House. The route taken was by Station Road and Abbot Road, and was lined by large numbers of people, the troops keeping the road being the 1st Oxfordshires, the 24th Punjabis, the 1st Durhams, the 10th Jats, and the 2nd East Surreys. The 74th Battery Royal Artillery, which had fired a Royal salute on the arrival of the Royal train, had meanwhile moved their position and fired a second salute as Their Royal Highnesses drove into the grounds of Government House. Immediately upon the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the mirzapuri or ceremonial of enquiry after the health of the Prince and Princess by the Talukdars took place.

At noon His Royal Highness received a Staté visit from the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri.

This afternoon the foundation stone of the Medical College, to be erected as a memorial of the Royal visit to Lucknow, will be laid, and thereafter Their Royal Highnesses visit the Residency, where the veterans will be present.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Medical College for the United Provinces as a memorial of the Royal visit to Lucknow was a picturesque and impressive one, and was witnessed by a very large gathering. Over ten lakhs of rupees have been subscribed towards the Memorial since October last, and it is anticipated that a sum of not less than fifteen lakhs will be raised. Government has given a large area of open ground stretching from the old Machhi Bhawan fort to the tomb of Shahmina, the patron saint of Lucknow, as a site for the College which is to have a Branch College for women. The students of the principal colleges and schools have taken an active part in the movement for the establishment of the memorial, and thousands of them were among those present at the ceremony. Conspicuous among them were the Cadets of the Colvin Talukdars' School in bright uniforms, with light blue pugrees and cummerbunds. Their Royal Highnesses were received by the Lieutenant-Governor and members of the Reception Committee headed by Sir John Stanley, Chief Justice.

When Their Royal Highnesses were seated, the Chief Justice read the following address:—

The people of the United Provinces take pride in their loyalty and loving devotions to His Majesty the King-Emperor and the Royal Family and all classes of His Majesty's subjects of whatever creed have evinced an eager desire to commemorate the visit of Your Royal Highnesses—a desire continually accentuated by the gracious acts of sympathy which have marked the path of Your Royal Highnesses through India. The need of a Medical College affiliated to the local University has long been felt. The active support at all times extended by His Majesty and Your Royal Highnesses to all movements for the development of medical work has touched the hearts of the people in this province as in other parts of the Empire, and it seemed to all that no memorial of this glad occasion could be more appropriate than a Medical College. The proposal to start this movement was made by Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan of Jehangirabad; it was promptly taken up by Maharaja Sir Pratap Narain Singh, of Ajothya, and other prominent gentlemen in both provinces. The list of subscriptions ranges from munificent donations of three lakhs of rupees by Maharaja Bhagabati Prasad Singh, of Bulrampur, of Rs. 5,500 by Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan, and Rs. 50,000 by the Hon'ble Raja Ali Muhammed, Khan Bahadur, of Mahmudabad, to the not less welcome offerings of pocket money by students at our colleges and schools. Some of our most active workers have been journalists and busy members of the legal profession. Their Highnesses the Nawab of Rampur and the Maharaja of Benares have given Rs. 50,000 each, while Their Highnesses the Raja-i-Rajgan, of Kapurthala, and the Raja of Tehri have aided us with gifts of Rs. 30,000 and Rs. 10,000 respectively. The movement marks an epoch in provincial history for the first time that the two provinces of Agra and Oudh have united in a public work. Loyalty and gratitude to Your Royal Highnesses have made us one people. We shall endeavour with the help of Government to make this College the best in the East, and it is part of our scheme to open a Branch College for women. We respectfully pray that this institution may bear the name of Your Royal Highness, and that the branch for women, when complete, may bear the name of Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. That Your Royal Highness may graciously be pleased to lay the foundation-stone is our further humble prayer. The address was enclosed in a casket of carved ivory with gold hinges and lock, and resting on an ebony tray inlaid with ivory and supported by four ivory elephants.

The Prince, in reply to the address, said :—

The Princess of Wales and myself are very glad to meet you, the Talukdars of Oudh, in this great hall, where, just thirty years ago, my dear father, our King-Emperor, first made your acquaintance. I thank you for the splendid reception which you have given to this historic capital of Oudh, and I rejoice to hear that your connection with the British Crown has brought you prosperity and happiness. It is pleasant to hear that you can say in all sincerity that your rights and privileges have been recognized and respected by the British Government. The best guarantee of your valued privileges lies in your allegiance and loyalty to the King-Emperor, and your warm assurances shall be communicated to him without delay. The Princess and I am delighted to hear of the steady progress of Oudh in moral and material paths. The pleasant and hopeful account which you give in your address is due to the fact that though adhering to your status and privileges you still wisely move with the times. I hope that you and your descendants will follow this wise policy and that whenever other members of our house may like us be fortunate enough to visit India they will find the Talukdars of Oudh as contented and as kind and courteous as those whom I have the pleasure of addressing this evening. I heartily thank you all for the beautiful entertainment which you have given in our honour. We shall never forget the Talukdars of Oudh and their generous hospitality.

Sir John Stanley and Gentlemen,—On behalf of the Princess of Wales and myself, I thank you sincerely for the very kind sentiments to which your address gives expression. We also thank you for affording us this opportunity of identifying ourselves with an institution which must have a marked influence on the wealth and happiness of the vast population of these provinces. I gather from the papers which I have read that for many years the need of a Medical College has been recognised. I rejoice to think that, thanks to the noble liberality of the Maharaja of Bulrampur and of others whose names will be gratefully remembered by future generations, this great need will now be supplied. We deem ourselves fortunate that the year of our visit should have seen the fulfilment of this great idea, for I have inherited from my dear parents their keen interest and deep sympathy in all that concerns the noble art and profession of healing. I believe that there are many special points connected with this Medical College on which I may congratulate you and your Lieutenant-Governor Sir James LaTouche. The movement is spontaneous—the outcome of the people's wishes—and so a movement which is healthy and will endure, and it is a movement in which all classes, high and low, rich and poor, official and non-official, have taken a part. I must congratulate you also on the splendid site which you have secured, high and healthy, but still in the close neighbourhood of your city; and lastly, I am desired by the Princess to congratulate you on the special provision which, thanks to the initiative and generosity of Raja Tasaddiq Rasul Khan, has been made for the education of women. If the Medical College becomes, as I hope it will, "the best in the East," a very powerful stimulus will be given to the movement which will always be associated with the name of Lady Dufferin. I shall be delighted to lay the foundation-stone of the College, and we are proud that our names will be respectively associated with the institution of its Branch College for women.

The conclusion of the address was received with applause. The Prince then proceeded to lay the stone, which was of marble. He was presented with a gold trowel and an ivory maul with gold chasings on a silver tray, the latter designed in the old Lucknow jungle pattern with fish handles.

The inscription in the centre of the tray was an inscription in Urdu, a literal translation of which is "All living creatures who suffer pant for healing. God ordained that the great should come to give healing. Our Prince George lays the foundation-stone of the Medical College; may this memorial of our Prince give life and healing."

The Prince having declared the stone well and truly laid, several officials were introduced, and the ceremony was at an end. Their Royal Highnesses departing amid cheers. They drove to the Residency where they privately viewed the scene of the historic defence and relief, and the Lucknow veterans, some of them blind and feeble, were presented to the Prince and Princess.

Times of India.—A full rehearsal of the ceremonies to be observed on the arrival of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales took place yesterday. Calcutta is rapidly preparing for the Royal visit, and nearly all the big public and private buildings are covered with bamboos which will be utilised for the illuminations of the evening of December 30th. These will surpass anything ever seen in Calcutta.

Daily Telegraph.—Amongst the interesting presentations made to the Prince of Wales was that of the head of the Royal house of Oudh; who is a brother of the last King.

In the pleasant grounds of Husainabad Park Their Royal Highnesses entertained the most charming garden-party yet given. Many of the Lucknow palaces exhibit execrable taste, but its parks are the finest in the East.

In the evening a State dinner for the whole of the province was followed by a reception in the old Chutter Manzil Palace, now leased to the United Service Club.

28TH DECEMBER 1905.

Englishman.—The reception given to Their Royal Highnesses by the taluqdars of Oudh was full of life and colour. The scene was the Kaiser Bagh erected by Wazar Shah, the last King of Oudh, which has been known as the largest, gaudiest and most debased of all the Lucknow palaces. But Their Royal Highnesses saw it at night, when darkness mercifully hid the green ramparts, and the crude European influences which arouse the scorn of architectural purists. Then the really magnificent open square, known pre-eminently as the Kaiser Bagh, was ringed with lines of dancing flames. Of the confusion and tastelessness of the buildings nothing could be seen. The soft light of myriads of chirags, of a multitude of gently flickering tongues of flame, was a triumph in the art of decorative illumination. So thought the citizens of Lucknow who gathered in their tens of thousands and filled the air with their roar of myriad voices.

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of the ceremony was the wide variety of race, religion and feature represented by the taluqdars. This was most striking when Their Royal Highnesses, having been requested by a deputation of the taluqdars, who waited on them at Government House, graciously to honour the fete by their presence, were received at the baradari and conducted into the presence chamber, sitting on the dais, whilst their hosts were presented to them. There were Mahomedans, who might have sat for portraits of Shah Jehan or Jehangir, which are amongst the relics of Moghal power; Hindus with the cast of feature specially associated with the province; a Sikh or two bearing himself with the pride born of his martial instincts and stern militant faith, others with evident traces of Kashmir and Afghan ancestry and representatives of all the races for whom the rich province of Oudh was a happy hunting ground in the bad old times. And there was every variety of garb from the gold laced brocade and superb diamonds and pearls of the squire, whose income is credibly reported to reach two lakhs of pounds a year to the portly gentleman, who disdained anything more ornate than a surcoat of Swedish tweed.

Yet all these representations of conflicting races and creeds were met with a single object to do honour to the heir to the Imperial throne. There was a ring of sincerity as well of historical accuracy in the address of welcome read by Maharaja Sir Partab Narain Singh, K.C.I.E., of Ajodhia, which was happily embodied in this paragraph. "The Province of Oudh which has the reputation of being 'the Garden of India' was fifty years ago under Native Princes whose throne room was in a building of which the casket enclosing this, our humble address, is a miniature model. Though it has enjoyed the benefits of English rule for the comparatively short period of half a century only, yet under theegis of the British Crown its advancement in every respect has been so rapid and steady that it stands second to none of the older provinces in the moral and material progress of its people as evidenced by the spread of education, the opening of means of communication, the growth and development of trade, commerce and industries, the recognition and continuance of our rights and privileges and the enactment of special legislation for the preservation of our estates in our families. These are among the special measures taken for our benefit by the British Government for which we are much grateful and which have firmly strengthened our bond of allegiance and loyalty to our august sovereign, the King Emperor and the Royal family." Nor was His Royal Highness's reply less cordial.

The entertainment concluded with a fine display of fireworks.

All the morning the station resounded to the blare of bugles, the rattle of drums and the booming of cannon, for His Royal Highness was entirely occupied in receiving and paying State visits. The first to be received was Sulaiman Kadr of the ex-Royal family of Oudh, attended by his son. Sulaiman Kadr is the brother of the last King of Oudh and the son of his predecessor. He is the head of the survivors of the house which studied Lucknow with the memorials which indicate such an extraordinary variety of taste. Then nine representative taluqdars were presented, headed by the Maharaja of Balrampur, the Maharaja of Ajodhya and the Raja of Mahmudabad. Soon after noon, His Royal Highness drove to the Moti Mahal to return the visit of the Nawab of Rampur. This completed the purely ceremonial duties and lunch was served. Almost immediately afterwards Their Royal Highnesses passed by the way of the handsome Hazaratganj Club Road through the Chutter Manzil grounds, now occupied by the United Service Club, to the Husainabad Park, where the United Service Club and the Muhammad Bagh Clubs were "At Home."

Another relic of the old Oudh dynasty was the scene of the final ceremony of a visit, which has been more than usually crowded with incident. The Chutter Manzil palace, built by Nazir-Uddin Hyder as an abode for his queens, is leased to the United Service Club and by them has been converted into a handsome club-house. Here the State dinner attended by the leading officials and residents was held. The dining hall was handsomely decorated and afterwards His Royal Highness passed into the reception room, where a large company had the honour of meeting him. This brought the official functions to an end. To-morrow His Royal Highness drives quietly round the cantonment and the Royal train leaves for Calcutta at half past one o'clock.

One incident of yesterday's visit to the Residency must be recorded. When the Princess spent an hour of the morning in the historic grounds she placed a laurel wreath on the simple grave of him, of whom it is recorded "Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty. May the Lord have mercy on his soul."

Many of the Lucknow palaces and tombs exhibit the most execrable taste, but in the variety and beauty of its parks and gardens the station has no equal in the east, and although not the largest the Husainabad Park yields to none in its verdant loveliness. It has a history of its own. The old kings of Oudh left large sums for the maintenance of their tombs and palaces and dependants, these moneys are now vested in a single trust which includes amongst its activities the care of the gardens. The duty is fulfilled in the most perfect taste, the turf is smooth and velvety, the trees are varied and include groups of beautiful palms, and upon all sides are evidences of skilled and unremitting care. The route lay past the Residency with its shot-battered tower, past the Victoria Park, which replaces the quondam unsightly common, formerly disfiguring the vicinity of the Residency grounds, past the Imambara, the finest of the architectural memorials of the Oudh sovereigns through the graceful gateway which gives entry to the Park. Their Royal Highnesses arrived just as the sun was declining and saw the charming grounds with domes and minarets of the city, all pleasing at a distance in the soft chastening light which is the glory of the Indian day. All the station was there and the lawns were gay with pretty frocks and handsome uniforms. Here Their Royal Highnesses renewed acquaintance with many of the mutiny veterans whom they reviewed at the Residency yesterday and the native officers of the regiments in Lucknow were presented. The hospitality of the Clubs was gorgeously exercised and the garden party must be esteemed the most delightful that the Prince and Princess of Wales have graced with their presence since they arrived in India.

Englishman.—The Lieutenant-Governor yesterday inspected the children's pandal, under construction, in honour of the Royal visit. It has been decided to pull down the present stands in Godwin Road and re-erect them on a different plan in Canal Street, between the latter street and Godwin Road, the main feature of the new plan being considerable widening of seats. It is estimated that there will be room for 13,000 children.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales have been seven weeks in India, and they visit Lucknow after seeing much that must have impressed them greatly. From the scenes of the great welcome at Bombay, they passed to the native states of Indore, Mewar, Jaipur, and Bikanir, with their revelations of the ceremonial grandeur of the Central India and Rajputana Chiefs. To these aspects of India succeeded the not less interesting if less highly coloured scenes of the visit to the Punjab and the North-West Frontier Province. From Lumdi Kotal to Delhi were presented contrasts to the earlier impressions of the tour as sharp as any that have yet to be received. Central Asia was revealed within the confines of the Peshawar Bazaar, and the incidents of the drive through the Khyber gave an indelible impression of the undisciplined races which keep the borderland barriers. In the United Provinces their Royal Highnesses are in the midst of scenes which appeal most strongly to the historic sense. At Agra they saw the monuments of an imperial splendour which was too insecurely based to long subsist. The decline of the Moghal Empire yields its lessons for an imperial race as surely as does the story of the decadence of Rome. Lucknow too has its distinctive suggestions to offer to the Royal Visitors. The heroism of the men who helped to save India for Great Britain nearly half a century ago is justly perpetuated. While the incidents of the defence of the Lucknow Residency and the Relief of the Garrison are here recalled by Their Royal Highnesses, they have also had the satisfaction of seeing the beginnings of a memorial of their visit to the United Provinces of a nature which has greatly commended itself to their sympathies. The foundation of a Medical College for the Provinces was proposed as a memorial of King Edward's visit to the city thirty years ago, but the scheme failed then to go forward. It has been revived on a larger scale in association with the present Royal visit and has been taken up with an enthusiasm which has within a very short time assured its success, and which must be gratifying to the illustrious visitors in whose honour the College is to be erected.

Madras Mail.—Colonel Alan E. Tate, R.A.M.C., Honorary Secretary of the Indian Branch of the St. John Ambulance Association, has received the following letter in reply to an Address to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales from the Association:—

PRINCE OF WALES'S CAMP, INDIA.

8th December, 1905.

Sir,—His Royal Highness the Grand Prior of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England and President of the St. John Ambulance Association has received with great satisfaction the Address of the Central Committee of the Indian Branch of the St. John Ambulance Association, which was submitted to His Royal Highness by His Excellency Lord Kitchener, your President. I am directed by the Grand Prior to express his pleasure on reading this Address and finding what good work has been done in the four years since the Indian Branch was formed. His Royal Highness is much interested in the fact that the Native States are in sympathy with the movement, and to know that in Hyderabad His Highness the Nizam is Patron of the local centre, which is doing excellent work, and has lately been authorised to issue its own certificates of efficiency. His Royal Highness the Grand Prior offers his best wishes for the continued prosperity of the Association in India.

(Signed) ARTHUR BIGGE.

Pioneer.—Lucknow has received the Prince and Princess of Wales with a loyal enthusiasm worthy of its traditions, and vying with any city hitherto visited by Their Royal Highnesses. From the street gamins of the city to the most important Taluqdar of Oudh, all have been united by a common instinct of loyalty to the throne, and by a desire to see the Shahzada and take part in the general welcome.

The city has put on gala attire, all the routes traversed by Their Royal Highnesses being profusely decorated with Venetian mast flags and bunting, while here and there graceful triumphal arches span the roadways and loyal mottoes greet the visitors at every turn. This morning, as the Royal party drove from the station to Government House, hundreds of thousands of spectators lined the roadways, and the Prince and Princess were most heartily greeted. Prior to this popular welcome, an imposing initial ceremony of the visit had taken place at the station, which had been completely transformed by a most effective scheme of decoration devised by Messrs. Pope and Cooper. On either side of the entrance to the arrival platform stands had been erected, one for Europeans, the other for minor Taluqdars, principal Deputy Collectors and native officials of the United Provinces. The bare walls of the offices were completely hidden by effective draping and bunting.

In the Central Hall there was a wonderful scheme of decoration, illustrating every department of railway work, each panel being done by the department whose work it represented.

In the centre of the hall there was a dais on which were placed two silver chairs flanked by Union Jacks and a special Royal Coat of Arms made in the railway workshops, while over the exit door was the motto "A loyal welcome from the Oudh and Rohilkhand State Railway." Mention may be made here of the general railway offices in Hazratganj, where a magnificent archway spanned the road. It was made of broad gauge rails covered with implements used in the workshops, and surmounted by a model dining car a third of the actual size, flags being effectively draped on either side. The railway offices were decorated with thousands of railway lamps, which give a most effective illumination at night.

The Royal train arrived promptly at 9.30 A.M. The Prince and Princess were received by the Lieutenant-Governor, the General Officer Commanding the 8th Division, H.H. the Nawab of Rampur, His Highness Raja of Tehri, and the principal officers of the military and civil services, and nine of the leading Taluqdars of Oudh. A Guard-of-Honour from the Oxford Light Infantry was drawn upon the platform and presented arms as the Royal train came to a stop, while a Royal salute was fired by a field battery. The Prince having inspected the Guard-of-Honour, the Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri (the two rulers of Native States in these Provinces) were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, and subsequently officials and leading Taluqdars were also presented. The scene was one of gorgeous colour, in which the bright uniforms of the military officers were outshone by the splendid jewels and costumes of the Native Princes and Taluqdars. The Prince of Wales was in the uniform of a British General, and the Princess wore a lovely cream gown with the palest blue flower and a charming toque to match. The Nawab of Rampur wore flowered brocade of pale pink, and the Raja of Tehri a long red velvet coat with profuse gold embroidery, and the collar ribbon and star of a K.C.S.I., and a pugree of pale green and gold. The Maharaja of Balamprur wore red velvet with gold lining and pugree with a wonderful aigrette of emeralds. The Maharaja of Ajudhia wore black velvet with gold brocade and a white pugree with an aigrette of amethysts. The Raja of Mahmudabad was in yellow flowered brocade with silver embroidery, and had a splendid show of emeralds in his aigrette. The Raja Tassaduq Rassul Khan of Jehangirabad wore a dark blue velvet coat with much gold embroidery and a simple gold embroidered cape. He also wore the insignia of a C.S.I. and the Delhi Durbar Medal.

After the presentation had been made, the Royal party proceeded to the Central Hall of the station where the Municipal address was read by Rai Sri Ram Bahadur and replied to by the Prince.

The address was contained in a fine silver casket, which was surmounted by the Municipal coat of arms. In the centre of the front panel was the Prince and Princess's coat of arms flanked by views of the Chatter Manzil and the Residency.

On the back panel, the Municipal arms were flanked by a view of the Kaiser Bagh Gateway and Juma Masjid. The address was printed on yellow satin richly embroidered in gold, and was contained in a bag, also gold embroidered. The casket and address are both Lucknow work.

The Prince and Princess then left the dais and proceeded to the foundation stone where the President of the Reception Committee presented the Prince with a gold and ivory trowel, with which His Royal Highness laid the stone. Having done so, he said: "I declare this stone well and truly laid. The ivory of the trowel and maul were taken from the tusk of an elephant which once roamed in Oudh forests, and was presented by Razi Surat Kunwar of Khairigarh. They were offered in a silver tray of jungle pattern and Lucknow work, with 66 handles. In the centre of the tray was an inscription in Persian which may be freely translated thus: "All living creatures who suffer pain for healing. God ordained that the great God should come to give healing. Our Prince George lays the foundation stone of the Medical College. May this Memorial of our presence give life and healing." The address was contained in a lovely ivory casket made in Delhi. It rests on a tray of ebony inlaid with ivory, which in turn is supported by four elephants. Both the Prince and Princess expressed their pleasure at the splendid response that has been made to the appeal for funds for the College, and their surprise that so much had been done in such a short time. After laying the foundation stone the procession reformed and the Prince and Princess proceeded to their carriage and the Company gradually dispersed. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded direct to the Residency entering by the Cemetery gate. Their carriage drove up to the D.C.L.I. Monument where the Royal party was received by the General Officer Commanding the Division and the Commissioner of Lucknow. Mutiny veterans were drawn up in front of the Monument. Their Royal Highnesses inspected the Residency buildings and grounds, being taken round by Colonel Braham, himself one of the Mutiny veterans, who had marked out the positions held by the British and rebel forces with white and red flags. The visit to the Residency was a private one, the public not being admitted. After inspection of the buildings and grounds the Royal party returned to Government House. Since arrival in the morning Their Royal Highnesses had been fully occupied, but their day was not yet over, for after dinner they received a deputation of five Taluqdars who invited them to attend a fete given in their honour in Kaisar Bagh.

Their Royal Highnesses having graciously accepted the invitation arrived at the Baradari in Kaisar Bagh about 9-20 P.M., and were received by a deputation of Taluqdars, consisting of the President of the British Indian Association, Maharaja Sir Partab Narain Singh of Ajudhia, the Vice-President Raja Tasadduq Rassul Khan of Jehangirabad; Maharaja Bhagwati Parshad Singh of Bulrampur, Raja Mahommed Ali Mahommed Khan, Khan Bahadur of Mahmudabad; Rana Sheoraj Singh of Khajurgaon; and Kunwar Sir Harnam Singh Ahluwalia, who were ranged on either side at the top of the steps at the north-east corner of the Baradari. The Lieutenant-Governor, who had arrived before the Royal party, met the Prince and Princess at the foot of the steps and accompanying them to the verandah presented the President of the Association and other members of the deputation while the band played the national anthem. The scene presented to the view of their Royal Highnesses was picturesque and beautiful in the extreme. All the buildings in the quadrangle and the triumphal arches erected for the occasion were outlined with chirags and the Baradari itself was a blaze of light and colour. Inside and out, every available inch of space was crowded with guests of the Taluqdars, but at one end, a handsome canopy surmounted the dais on which silver chairs were placed for the Royal guests. The procession proceeded to this dais and the Prince and Princess being seated the Lieutenant-Governor took a seat on their right. The Princess wore a lovely gown of pale green chiffon over silk worked with mother-of-pearl and sequins. The front of the bodice was covered with diamonds, and she wore a diamond crown and a very handsome collar and necklace of precious stones. The President of the British Indian Association then read and presented an address which was enclosed in a casket of novel design, being a model of the building now occupied by the Museum but formerly the throne room of the Kings of Oudh. The casket was of silver richly gilt and of beautiful workmanship.

Their Royal Highnesses then sat while about 200 Taluqdars were presented individually by the President of the British Indian Association. Altar and pan were presented to Their Royal Highnesses by the President and the Prince and Princess then proceeded to the south verandah to witness a grand display of fireworks which took place in the open space in front.

When this concluded the deputation which met Their Royal Highnesses on arrival, reconducted them to their carriage and they returned to Government House along the brilliantly illuminated Hazratganj road. Other guests remained sometime enjoying the picturesque scene and the lavish hospitality of the Taluqdars. The entertainment was most successful and was greatly enjoyed by all.

Times of India.—An hour or so before the special train bringing Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Gwalior was due, a motor car bearing an alert, active, joyous figure was seen speeding to the station. It was the Maharaja Scindia, sparing time from the manifold preparations for his honoured guests, to welcome some of his large house party. A little later this intensely live personage, now clad in gold-broidered silk and wearing a necklace of pearls worth a King's ransom, was watching a recalcitrant motor car with ill-concealed impatience. His fingers were itching to have the bonnet on and be amongst the mechanism and no one knows what a struggle it was to remain an onlooker. And it was in the small hours of the morning that the same personage, after twice twelve hours of unremitting activity, in preparation with the triumphal elephant procession, at the Durbar, and at the opening of the memorial market, modestly inquired of the Chief of Staff if his duties as host might be considered at an end for the day, so that he might snatch a brief rest before those of the morrow began!

These little episodes are characteristic of the ruler of Gwalior. From the moment that the Royal train was due at his capital it was the virile personality of Scindia that animated every scene and every ceremony. It was Scindia who supervised the arrangements for Their Royal Highnesses in the splendid Jai-Bilas palace, and for his six score personal guests down to the fixing of the last tent peg. It was Scindia who organised the gorgeous elephant procession, who sat proud and happy beside the Prince of Wales at the State entry. It was Scindia who presented the Sirdars at the stately darbar, and who later read addresses of welcome as President of the Lashkar Municipality. It was Scindia who arranged the review, personally led the cavalry gallop, and directed the order of each item of the subsequent military display. It was Scindia who planned the tiger shoots, who was afoot amongst the beaters where the scent was hottest, when the wounded beast skulked in the thick undergrowth, who was at the danger point when the infuriated brute charged, who laid her low at a distance of thirty yards with a bullet in the shoulder. And it was Scindia who on Christmas morning presented each one of his guests with a graceful memento bearing a portrait of himself and a view of his handsome home.

And this was not a sporadic outburst of activity designed to impress his Royal visitors. Of all the busy administrators in this land of Ind none is busier, none takes his responsibilities more seriously than the Chief of Gwalior. At the age of twenty-eight and after ten years of personal rule, he combines the enthusiasm and bubbling activity of youth with the wisdom of the veteran statesman. He was never of those who conceived that God gave the Indian Princes sanad to do nothing in perpetuity. His own Prime Minister, who knows more of the details of administration than some of the heads of departments, and scarcely a rupee of his revenue of a crore and-a-half is spent without his knowing where it goes. His own Commander-in-Chief, he can lead his five thousand armed men with the skill of an old soldier, and it is to forget that you are in the leisurely East to see the head-quarter staff move when the Maharaja gives the word. The owner of a hundred miles of railway and a garage full of motor cars, he can drive an engine with his locomotive engineer and a car with his best chauffeur. Nor is this embodiment of personal rule this all-pervading activity, the clog on the wheels of the administration, it has been known to be in other cases. The Maharaja dwells amongst his own people, finding his work and his pleasures in his own State, and not in Simla, in Calcutta, or in London. His influence on the heads of departments is stimulating and progressive, not hampering. Although he can take his despatch-box to Bombay and discuss on terms of equality with grey-headed railway officers the detailed working of his line, he knows that interference with minor administrative matters is obstructive rather than helpful, and leaves to the able staff he has gathered round him a large discretion. The presence of many grown grey in the service of the State is evidence of his fidelity to those who serve him well.

It was a splendid heritage indeed to which the Maharaja Scindia succeeded a decade ago. Thirty thousand square miles of territory, with the fat lands of Malwa to counterbalance the thin soils of the north, three millions of hardy frugal people, a revenue of a crore and-a-half a year. All this in the strategic heart of India, centering in the proud fortress-crowned rock which nature raised as the destined capital of the central plain. And behind it the stirring story which tells how this was the spoil of the strong right arm and wise statesmanship of the Peshwa's slipper-bearer. The Maharaja Scindia was entirely worthy of it. His revenues have been so carefully conserved that his investments in Government paper are fourteen crores of rupees against a rainy day. A hundred miles of narrow gauge railway link up the scattered districts and pay a modest three per cent. on the capital outlay. Four hundred primary schools, four high schools, and an Arts College provide a solid educational foundation. In addition, a new technical school, with scholarships for the students, gives facilities for industrial training. Schools for the Sirdars, with a military and a civil curriculum, and a special school for the training of civil servants, supply recruits for the army and services, and rescue the sons of the landed gentry from a life of sloth. The hospitals are of the best, the streets of the capital city are as wide and clean as any in India, the roads are well-maintained, and the Jai-Bilas Palace, though modern, has been re-modelled in excellent taste. With all these utilitarian activities, the Maharaja has not been unmindful of his social obligations. Scindia's hospitality is proverbial in India and fittingly to exercise it the Nautilao Palace has been splendidly equipped for the reception of State visitors.

Nor has the Maharaja Scindia been so absorbed in domestic affairs as to exclude the liberal consideration of the Imperial responsibilities attaching to his great position. None realises more fully than he that to be a genuine partner with the British Raj he must bear his part in the burden of the common defence of India, as well as reap the advantages of the peace military efficiency secures. The three regiments of cavalry, to which were recently added two of infantry which passed in review before the Prince of Wales, are his permanent contribution to the sword arm of the Empire. The generous gift of his artillery horses and of many of his cavalry mounts helped to tide Great Britain over the most difficult days in South Africa. The splendidly-equipped hospitalship which he personally accompanied to China was of priceless value to the sick and wounded of the expeditionary force. Nor do Scindia's plans stop here. It is proposed ultimately to convert all his armed retainers into Imperial Service Troops setting an example to his brother Chiefs most worthy of imitation.

Honours have come thickly, and rightly so, upon the Maharaja Scindia. At the age of twenty-eight he finds himself a Grand Commander of the Victorian Order, as well as a G.C.S.I., an Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty the King-Emperor, a Colonel in the British Army, to which was added on Friday a colonelcy in the Prince of Wales' Own Regiment, the 1st Cavalry or Skinner's Horse. But what His Highness doubtless values above all this is the full knowledge that these are but the outward expressions of the fact that he has the trust and confidence of the Imperial Government, and that he is regarded not only as a most loyal and exemplary feudatory but as a valued co-adjutor in the complex task of the governance of India. The intense loyalty that animated every sentence of Scindia's speech at the State banquet was no more "facon de parler;" the gracious terms of His Royal Highness's reply came from the heart. Indeed, the Maharaja Scindia is one whom the Government are proud to call their partner in the great task to which they are committed, and they feel that they will never ask his co-operation in vain. Only one circumstance is needed to complete the happy prospect that seems to be in store for the State, the birth of an heir, and the Maharaja's own desire to see the direct ruling line continued could not be more ardent than those of the Imperial Government to which he pays such proud allegiance.

Although to some it may seem that the Maharaja Scindia is at the zenith of his career, he stands on the threshold of even greater opportunities. "The old order changeth, giving place to new." The old generation of native Princes is passing away. The Venerable Maharaja of Nabha the Maharaja of Jaipur, the Maharaja of Udaipur are amongst the few survivors of the régime that grew up with the consolidation of Imperial power in the last part of the century. It gave to India some of the finest types, to the Government some of their staunchest allies, but with the development of ideas and communications it could not endure. A new generation, a new school, is now seated on most of the gadis. Men trained in the traditions of this English public school broadened by travel, familiar with the traditions of English social life. No one doubts that the principles laid down for the education of the Indian Princes were in the main correct. There have been errors of detail, and though some have been remedied, do we not still expose them to the volcanic influence of western travel and unfettered power at too early an age? But the transition period is always one of trial and disappointment: of some disheartening failures relieved by a few successes. The Maharaja Scindia's sterling qualities and splendid character enabled him to pass through these disruptive tendencies unwavering, and to emerge therefrom only with greater capacity for usefulness. He is trusted and admired by all the younger generation of rulers. In helping them over the narrow bridge which leads from the old to the new, by sage counsel and sober advice as well as by his shining example, he can render service to India, and to the Government exceeding even his own conspicuous record.

The evening reception which it was proposed to hold at Government House on the evening of the 2nd January in honour of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales will not take place.

Maharaja Sir Partab Singh and Captain Hill of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's staff have arrived in Calcutta and are staying at Government House.

29TH DECEMBER 1905.

Englishman.—The Royal visit to Lucknow came to a quick close to-day. This morning His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was driven round the handsome cantonments which lie some three miles from the city. Though it is not often considered in that light, Lucknow is one of the great military stations in India, as it is certainly one of the handsomest, and in the winter the most agreeable. He was accompanied by General Locke Elliot, commanding the district, and under his informed eiceronage visited the hospital and the Dilkusha. The drive also brought him to the famous College of La Martinière, whose boys played their part so well in the great siege of the Residency. Of all the great adventures whose names flit across the pages of the history of India in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries none left a nobler monument than Clive's. The value of his foundation grows every year, and not the least of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's service to India is the place he gave to the college in the most vivid of his stories "Kim."

Hard by the college stands the modest monument to that dazzling figure of the mutiny days Hodson. Could man desire a finer epitaph than one who loved him caused to be written over his grave? "Here lieth all that could die of William Stephen Raikes Hodson." And then those words from the epistle of the great apostle:—"A little while." It deserves to stand with the beautiful words so much better known on the simple tomb in the Residency cemetery which reanimate the spirit of Henry Lawrence "who tried to do his duty." Hodson was one of those men born to make enemies. His rapid promotion, his fiery temperament, his fearless sense of responsibility which could not be understood of men of timid minds who had not seen the things he saw. But even to-day one cannot think without shame of the vindictiveness of those who sought to blacken his dying moments with the charge of looting. When we remember his unsurpassed courage and the greatness of his services in our hour of need should we not passionately put aside the unproven charges of financial irregularities and share the devotion of those simple sowers whose iron reserve broke down at his grave side?

The visit to Lucknow was all the too short in view of the heavy official duties which had to be accomplished and the absorbing interest of the Mutiny memorials. But prominent among the recollections that Their Royal Highnesses will retain will be that of the visit to the Residency in the peace and quietness of Tuesday afternoon and the parade of veterans. Their Royal Highnesses visited every part of the historic ground, the Princess returning on more than one occasion to confirm her impressions of the most conspicuous scenes. Before leaving, too, the Prince received the three ladies who passed through the siege, and was with the Princess when she laid the laurel wreath on Henry Lawrence's grave. Also before leaving, His Royal Highness accepted a copy of the guide book written by Mr. Hilton one of the Mutiny veterans and decorated him with the Victorian Medal. And from Mr. Davis the Commissioner, who has done so much to make the visit agreeable, one of the flags from the shrine at Bahraich which he used to decorate the tea tent.

One of the most interesting of the presentations to the Prince at Government House yesterday was that of Haji Mirza Yusuf Beg, Indian attendant of Her Majesty the late Queen-Empress from 1889 to 1893. During that period the Haji was in constant attendance upon the late Queen Victoria and is well known to the Prince and Princess. The interview with His Royal Highness lasted fifteen minutes, and the Haji received the signal honour of being asked to a private interview with the Princess to-day. Haji, accompanied by his son Mirza Mahomed Hosain, Naib Tahsildar, called at Government House and were presented to the Princess. At the close of the interview they received an autograph letter from the Prince and signed photographs of the Princess.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, after inspecting the guard-of-honour yesterday at the Hosainabad, said he was much pleased to see the strong muster of the cadets of the Martinière, and expressed the wish that an extra week should be added to the Martinière Christmas holidays. The Martinière College and Girls' School, will therefore, re-open this year on the 14th instead of 7th January.

Englishman.—Although the honour of being the first to receive the Royal visitors has not been allotted to the capital of India, there is this much to be said for the arrangement which resulted in the Prince and Princess landing at Bombay and thence touring in Western and North-Western India, that it has afforded Calcutta an opportunity of organising a more elaborate welcome than would otherwise have been possible. Besides, it is precisely at this season of the year that Calcutta is at her best. The weather is crisp and bracing and the social and other amenities that circle round the activities of Christmas in all parts of the world find very special and attractive expression in this huge city. Christmas week entices to Calcutta visitors from every part of India and from over the seas, and is, therefore, the more appropriate for the royal entry, which is to be made to-day. And certainly the fact that the Prince and Princess have already been some little time in India should only serve to make our welcome more loyal, more demonstrative, for, after all, all India forms but one Empire, and the Royal tour has been followed so closely by all classes of the community that Calcutta has already learnt to consider the royal couple in the light of old friends. It is known from the gracious words uttered by the Prince on the occasion of his landing at Bombay that he had learned to idealise and appreciate India in every aspect, and since then, whether at high ceremonials of state, or at military reviews, or in the jungles, he has shown himself possessed of those qualities of tact, and strength and nerve, which, when combined necessarily attract sentiments of love and reverence from the multitude. Calcutta, therefore, conscious of her power to excite admiration, is no less conscious that the Prince is worthy of the genuine enthusiasm of a great city and that he will as genuinely reciprocate every evidence of joyous and loyal greeting.

Calcutta possesses few natural advantages, but the preparations that have been made in the way of decoration and illumination have been so lavish and attended to with such care that it may safely be said that here at least art has superseded nature, and that our Royal visitors will be as deeply impressed by the signs of the immensity and wealth of this city as they were by the magnificence of Bombay harbour or by any of the cities of Northern India which depend on the beauty or strangeness of the surrounding scenery for their effectiveness. Calcutta can supply in a larger measure than any other city of the Empire, outside London, that element of serried ranks of spectators which so enhances the dignity and majesty of a Royal procession. To-day the Prince and Princess will detrain at Howrah, and if the new railway station cannot yet compete as a building with the Victoria Terminus the vast size of the yard will serve to emphasize the fact that Howrah station is tending to become more and more the outlet for the volume of Indian traffic. Then the short voyage down the Hughli will display to the Royal party the great river at its best. The ocean steamers will be a mass of bunting, the yards of the warships will be manned, and both sides of the river will be thronged with dense multitudes. But it is during the progress from the landing stage at Prinsep's Ghat, across the Maidan, up the Red Road, and so into Government House, that the royal party will finally have brought home to them both the immensity of Calcutta and the cordiality of Calcutta's welcome. It is true that the route does not lie through the streets, but the open space that has to be crossed will attract a more wonderful crowd than the Prince and Princess have yet seen in the Peninsula. Every nationality in the world seems to be represented in Calcutta, and as the races of the East insist on preserving their distinctive costumes, the richness of the decorations will be further enhanced by the splendid play of the sun on a hundred shifting colours. Nothing the Delhi Durbar could show will match the majesty of the setting as the procession advances up the Red Road with its towering Venetian masts with their emblems and banners floating in the breeze, and the shifting eager multitudes below.

The Maidan is so obviously the place for all great gatherings that it is not surprising that the ceremonies, which will afford the purely Indian portion of the community an opportunity of demonstrating their loyalty in their own way, are to be held there. The Maidan will also be the scene of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial, that building of marble which is to reproduce in Calcutta the glories of the Taj. It is on the Maidan also that the Prince will witness the race for the Prince of Wales' Cup, which, it is certain, will excite as much interest as does that classic race run last Tuesday. The city itself is to be seen by the royal party wrapped in a garment of light. The illuminations in Calcutta on the occasion of the celebration of the King's accession were said to have surpassed anything of the kind seen elsewhere in the British Empire. As on the present occasion all the efforts have been confined to the streets which the Prince will traverse, it is safe to say that the results, though on a smaller scale, will be even more magnificent than three years ago. The social functions at Government House will afford the Prince an opportunity of meeting Indian and Anglo-Indian society in a setting which will rival most things of the kind to be seen in the capitals of Europe. The stall in Calcutta is to be full of activity. One function succeeds another in rapid succession, and the result will be to add to the coming week a brilliance which will make it historical.

Indian Daily News.—To-day Calcutta welcomes Their Royal Highnesses to the Capital of India, and almost midway in their tour the Prince and Princess of Wales will spend eight days in a city which is not only the chief town of Bengal, but the centre of the supreme administration of India. Apart from these more purely official claims Calcutta is one of the greatest commercial cities of the world, and it holds within its boundaries the biggest aggregation of human beings of any city in the Indian Empire. It is apparent, therefore, that the hearty and loyal welcome which Their Royal Highnesses will assuredly receive this afternoon has something distinctive and apart from the enthusiasm that has greeted them at other stages of their auspicious tour. At Bombay the Prince and Princess saw the gateway of India, that magnificent door through which East and West pass and repass in their commercial dealings. At Peshawar they found themselves at the rough edge of the Empire, a place of big mountains and fierce men, so close to the actuality of things that only a few weeks after they had departed the border bandits were attacking a stubborn little village in the neighbourhood of ground which they had actually trodden. Then came Allahabad, a leaf out of old India, with the ruins of the dynasties which had disappeared before the English came to supreme control. Afterwards they saw the kings of semi-independent States; and, later, they have just left Lucknow, a town of heroic memories of which however it is unnecessary to dwell on a day like this when everybody, Indian alike with Englishmen, are welcoming the Heir Apparent and his consort. In Calcutta, we venture to think, the Prince and Princess will find nothing lacking in the sentiment and feeling of the people. The weeks' of careful preparation have converted the streets through which he will pass into scenes of pleasantly varied, though not over-garish decoration. There may be something lacking in colour, as compared with the cities of the Native States, in the men who will meet him and the retinues which will attend him. But he will probably see in them a relief to the eye and a return to the sober pageantry of Western ceremonies which will bring with them memories of Home. But apart altogether from the external sights the Prince and Princess will not fail to feel that the sentiment of the people in all its sections is one that any ruler might be proud to inspire. They will know in addition that the history of the past few months lends an additional significance to the unanimity with which they are greeted. India is a land of precedents from its intimate social life even to its very catastrophes, as when three invaders in long succession fought their critical battles on the same battlefield, Panipat. The organisers of the tour are therefore wise in allowing their Calcutta programme to adhere somewhat closely to the visit of the King in 1875. Thirty years ago the King, then Prince of Wales, came from Madras up the Hooghly in the Scrapis. He therefore landed, almost of necessity, at Prinsep's Ghat. To-day the Prince and Princess come by train to Howrah and the obvious line of entry that suggests itself is a state procession over Howrah Bridge, down Strand Road into Dalhousie Square, and thence by Old Court House Street to Government House. Against this there is, however, the precedent of the past and the route which is to be traversed this afternoon is the only one that is really possible or appropriate. Besides, it will give the Prince and Princess that water-journey down the river port of Calcutta which has a never-failing interest, impressing even the casual observer with the fact that Calcutta, however wide the hinterland it may control, is based in its ultimates, like the British Empire, upon the mastery of the sea. At Prinsep's Ghat they will see a sight slightly different from that which the King witnessed.

The background of Fort, maidan and city will be little altered, but the shore itself is changed. The river bank along this district was not then embanked as it is to-day. The Ghat, which was originally at the water's edge, was then sensibly nearer to the river, and between them stretched a low muddy area. Cartloads of sand had to be tilted into the water to furnish a firm landing. This afternoon the Prince and Princess will land dryshod on to firm land, and will see the Ghat at a distance, with stands and crowded people between. The difference might be taken almost as symbolic of the change in European life in India even within so short a period as thirty years. For in several respects Anglo-India is now more slender, less exotic as compared with England than it used to be. The change may not be altogether nor always an improvement, but it is there.

We venture to predict, and we think everyone will agree in the prediction, that the Prince's entry into the capital will be attended by scenes of ordered and well-restrained enthusiasm. If we may learn anything from previous occasions the welcome will not be a noisy orgy of popular acclamation. Calcutta accepts its ceremonials, even the greatest of them, in a mood of reflective calm. But the welcome, though comparatively quiet, will be none the less sincere. The city appreciates the visit of a prince who is destined one day to be the Ruler of the Empire, and it extends to the Prince and to the Princess its most cordial and sincerest welcome. Today there is no partition of feeling in Bengal and the muslims of the Indian becomes linked to the Englishman's muslim in common good wishes to the Prince of Wales.

We are requested to state that the presentation of the New Colours to the K. O. R. by the Prince of Wales will be a public one. The general public are invited to attend, but should arrive at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning, half an hour before the ceremony commences.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The 2nd Rajput Light Infantry, who arrived yesterday in the Canning from Calcutta, marched this evening into camp on the glacis where they remain till after the Royal visit. They then proceed to Secunderabad on re-til duty. Sir P. U. Krishnamurti, Dewan of Mysore, inspected this morning the arrangements for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses at Mysore on 29th January. The Jagan Mohan palace is being fitted up for the return visit of His Royal Highness at considerable cost.

The special Christmas number of the Indian Ladies' Magazine contains, among other features, an account of the parade party at Government House, Bombay, on 10th November, at which fifteen Indian ladies of rank were presented to the Prince of Wales. The account is written by a Mahomedan lady who was present, and is particularly interesting at the present moment in view of the ridiculous attitude of the Bengali press regarding the Pardah Party to be held at Belvedere, Calcutta, for the ladies of Bengal to meet the Princess. Her Royal Highness was standing on a dais, from which she graciously acknowledged the salutation of each lady as she was presented. Each saluted the Princess in her own particular style,—the Hindus by joining both hands, and raising them to their heads bending low, the Parsis by doing the "overma," i.e., curving the hands to the temples, while the Mahomedan ladies saluted by taking the hand of the Princess in both hands, raising it first to the right eye, then to the left, and then kissing it. Her Royal Highness was particularly struck by this style of salutation. The presentations over, the Princess had a long conversation with Her Highness the Beg Begum of Janjira. Her Royal Highness also conversed with Lady Agha Khan, Mrs. Hassan Ali, Miss Fyzee, Mrs. Karim-bhai Ebrahim, Her Highness the Rani of Sawantwadi, the Rani of Kurunwada, Mrs. Chandravarkar, Lady Bhalschandra Krishna, Lady Mehta and Lady Petit. Her Highness the Begum of Janjira, standing near the Princess's chair acted as interpreter for those who spoke in Gujarati, Marathi and Urdu. After refreshments, the party came to an end, the ladies being intensely pleased with the gracious manner of the Princess.

Pioneer.—Only a brief mention was possible yesterday of the visit paid by the Prince and Princess to the Residency, although it had unique interest for Their Royal Highnesses as well as for those privileged to be present. As already stated, the Royal party drove up to the monument erected to the memory of officers and men of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, where they were received by General Sir C. Locke Elliot, Commanding the Lucknow Division, and Mr. J. S. Davis, Commissioner. Mutiny veterans were drawn up on either side of the monument—on the right, survivors of the siege of the Residency, on the left, veterans who served in other parts of India during the Mutiny. On the other side of the road were the families of these veterans. There were fifteen survivors of the siege, and seventeen other Mutiny veterans with six women (four Europeans and two natives). The majority of the veterans were very old men, and most of them were three or four medals, but there were few younger ones who were boys in La Martinière College at the time of the siege. Considering the age of the men, they were wonderfully hale and hearty, only one needing a chair. Among them was Sergeant Owen, who is now blind, and the Risaldar Major of 6th Cavalry, with three or four other Native officers. The Prince and Princess shook hands with all the veterans, asked them questions and spoke a few gracious kindly words to each, and the old soldiers were intensely gratified and much affected by the condescension of Their Royal Highnesses, who asked that the signatures of all the veterans should be obtained and presented to them. After receiving the veterans, the Prince and Princess went to the model room, and Colonel Bonham, who himself took part in the defence of the Residency and was thrice wounded explained the plan of defences. After this, the Royal party had tea in a tent prepared by the Divisional Commissioner and then went through the Residency and round the defences, which had been flagged out to show exactly the lines held by the British and the mutineers in 1857. All the places of note were shown to Their Royal Highnesses, who were deeply interested and asked numerous questions of Colonel Bonham. The inspection concluded by a visit to the cemetery within the grounds, when the Princess placed a wreath on the grave of Sir Henry Lawrence.

This morning was spent receiving and returning official visits, and the air is full of the music of military bands and the thunder of salutes. Soon after breakfast the Prince received a deputation of representative Taluqdars, consisting of the following:—Maharaja Bhagwati Parshad Singh of Balrampur; Maharaja Sir Partab Narain Singh of Ajudhia; Raja Mahomed Ali Mohommad Khan, of Mahmudabad; Rana Sheoraj Singh of Thalrai; Raja Tasadduq Rasul Khan of Jahangirabad; Raja Rampal Singh of Kori; Sidouli Raja Partab Bahadur Singh of Kila Partabgarh; Sardar Narain Singh of Rae Bareilly district, Kunwar; Sir Harnam Singh Ahluwaria, Sulaiman Kader Mirza Mahomed Hasan Ali Bahadur. A member of the ex-Royal family of Oudh was also to have been received but he was too ill to be present. On the conclusion of this function, the Prince returned the visit of His Highness the Nawab of Rampur. A deputation consisting of the Nawab's four principal officers present in Lucknow waited on the Prince at Government House at noon to conduct His Royal Highness to Moti Mahal, the Nawab's residence. The whole route, via Hazratganj, Quenton Road and Chamberlain Road, was lined with troops of the garrison. The Prince left Government House at 12-20 attended by Mr. Winter, Chief Secretary to the Government of the United Provinces, and members of His Royal Highness's staff, and was escorted by a party of Cavalry, including the Rampur Imperial Service squadrons. The Prince was very heartily greeted by the crowds along the route. The Nawab accompanied by the Commissioner of Rohilkhand, who is agent to the Lieutenant-Governor for Rampur, received His Royal Highness as he alighted from the carriage and conducted him to the reception, where a seat was prepared for him at the right hand of the Nawab, the Prince's staff being seated on His Royal Highness's right, while the Commissioner and the Nawab's attendants were seated on the Nawab's left. After a short conversation, the Nawab's principal attendants were presented to the Prince by the Commissioner and offered nazars of one gold mohur each, which the Prince touched and remitted. At the close of the interview, the Nawab offered pan and attar to the Prince and Chief of his staff, the Chief Secretary and the Commissioner, while His Highness's attendants made a similar offering to the other British officers present. After this ceremony the Prince returned to Government House attended by the deputation and the cavalry escort.

After luncheon, the Rani of Khairigarh, the Rani of Tiloi and the Rani of Partabgarh had the honour of a private interview with the Princess, Mrs. Anderson, wife of the Civil Surgeon, acting as interpreter. The Rani of Partabgarh and the Rani of Khairigarh know English and have very advanced ideas for Indian ladies, while all three ladies are very charitably disposed. The Rani of Partabgarh went to England with her husband Raja Partab Bahadur Singh, C.I.E., at the time of the Coronation, and then had the honour of an interview with Queen Alexandra. The Rani of Khairigarh is a lady of high Nepalese family and has a large estate with splendid forests on the Nepalese border. The Tiloi family is well-known as one of the most important and most loyal in Oudh, and the Rani is celebrated for her good works.

This afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales were present at a Garden Party given by the members of the United Service and Mahomed Bagh Clubs in the Husainabad Gardens. The Royal party, attended by a cavalry escort, drove by the Hazratganj Club Road through Chutter Munzil grounds and thence along the Strand Road, and Husainabad Road, entering Husainabad Park by the gate opposite the Clock Tower. Here a guard-of-honour of the Lucknow Volunteer Rifles was drawn up, and they presented arms as the Royal cortège approached. The guard consisted mainly of boys from La Martinière, the remainder being from the Baillie Guard Company. They were under the command of Captain Gill, and His Royal Highness inspected them immediately after his arrival. The Prince and Princess were received by the presidents and leading members of the two clubs. The picturesque Husainabad Gardens, with their spacious lawns and the historic buildings which surround them, are admirably suited for social functions of this kind, and the scene presented this afternoon was a most animated one. The whole of Lucknow society with the many visitors were present, and the Taluqdars gave an additional touch of colour and picturesqueness. Massed bands of the 1st Royal Dragoons, West Surreys, Durham Light Infantry, and Oxford Light Infantry played the National Anthem on the arrival and departure of the Royal party and gave a delightful selection of music. During the afternoon, a number of ladies and gentlemen were presented to the Prince and Princess, as were also Native officers of the 6th Bengal Cavalry, the 10th Jats and the 25th Punjab Infantry. The Princess wore a tailor-made gown of pale blue cloth, faced with white and trimmed with silk braiding, with a toque of white and blue, and she also wore a large white feather stole. Lady La Touche wore a very becoming dress of mauve, with hat en suite, and Lady Elliot a charming grey blue voile with black hat.

In the evening, there was a State dinner at Chutter Muazil.

The route from Government House to the Club was prettily illuminated and there was a fine display of light and colour in the Hazratganj, while the tombs and public buildings in the neighbourhood of Chutter Munzil were charmingly outlined by chirags, which gave the whole scene a fairly-like beauty. The building known as Chhotu Chutter was a wonderfully blaze of lights, every archway, window and door being clearly and definitely outlined with chirags, and the club itself would have been equally striking, but for the fact that the wind was somewhat boisterous, which dimmed the illuminations. The Prince arrived at the Club shortly after 8 p.m. He was received by the Lieutenant-Governor, and proceeded at once to dinner. About 80 guests were present, including all the senior civil and military officials. After dinner, there was a reception, a large number of guests being invited by the Lieutenant-Governor to meet His Royal Highness. Many of the guests had the honour of presentation in an informal manner to the Prince, and His Royal Highness, who seemed in excellent spirits, chatted genially with all. The Prince left at about 10-45 and the gathering then dispersed.

To-morrow morning the Prince, accompanied by General Locke Elliot, will drive round the cantonments, covering the route taken by the relief column in 1857, and at 1-31 the Royal train will leave for Calcutta, the departure being private.

This morning the Tashi Lama paid a State visit to the Viceroy. Full ceremonial was observed, and the visit was one with picturesque surroundings. A Viceregal carriage was sent to Hastings House and in this the Lama was driven to Government House, accompanied by Mr. Claude White, Political Agent, Captain O'Connor, on special duty, and Mr. Holland of the Foreign Department. In the second carriage were two of the Viceroy's Aides-de-Camp and Captain Stein, I.M.S., Medical Officer at Gyantse. A travelling escort was furnished by the 4th Cavalry and the Lama had his retinue of fifty Tibetan officers richly dressed in coloured silks, and wearing their Chinese insignia of rank, with gold umbrellas held by retainers. They constituted a gay cavalcade as there were musicians with drums and Tibetan clarionets. A heavy sedan chair of State of Chinese pattern and carved in gilding was carried by twenty men, another score assisting to haul it along. The grounds of Government House were entered at 8 o'clock, and the scene was a striking and unusual one as a halt was made at the steps and the officers and retainers grouped themselves about the Lama, and the musicians played Tibetan music. The Lama was conducted to the Throne Room, and the Viceroy advanced to the threshold to meet him. The ceremonial customary to the visit of Native Chiefs was followed, a salute of seventeen guns being fired from Fort William. After a short conversation, tea was handed to the Lama by the Viceroy and leave taking followed. The Lama returned to Hastings House in his sedan chair, which is a mark of high rank, as in Tibet only three officials are allowed to travel in this way; namely, the Dalai Lama, the Tashi Lama and the Chinese Amban. The Lama was clothed in the plain maroon coloured dress of a monk. He seemed highly pleased with his visit, and is looking forward with much interest to another visit some days hence, when he will be presented to the Prince of Wales.

Occasion was taken by the Viceroy this morning to present Mr. Claude White and Captain O'Connor with their C.I.E., bestowed for services during the Tibet Mission and expedition. The Tibet medal was also given to Mr. Walsh, C.S., Mr. Hayden, Geological Survey, the Kumar of Sikkim, and Mr. Bayley and Mr. Newman, special correspondents. The Viceroy will pay a return visit to the Tashi Lama to-morrow morning.

Times of India.—The "Rast Gofar" says:—The lugubrious critic who eyes the Royal tour through the goggles of the croaker may revert with some advantage to the recent charity of the Maharaja of Jaipur. His Highness could not have given a happier turn to his charitable instincts which he has directed with remarkable foresight to serve twofold purposes. While his donation of 4 lakhs of rupees to the Famine Fund is devoted to a very worthy humanitarian object, it would serve, at the same time, to support and enhance the loyal devotion of the people to their Royal guests. No monuments that would be erected to commemorate their tour through India would be directed to a more humanitarian object than the one which seeks to help the starving needy in the throes of killing hunger. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is not unconscious of the strain which must be imposed upon the resources of the States that are threatened with scarcity and drought, were he to visit the places at such an inopportune moment. The Royal tour has, therefore, to be curtailed and so planned as to leave no traces of a burden on the States in distress. His Royal Highness made repeated references to the feelings of sympathy and commiseration with which the Royal family views the unpleasant prospect which awaits States in Rajputana and elsewhere and nothing certainly could be more gratifying to the Prince than that he should be made a medium to alleviate the distress of the needy and indigent poor, and bring timely succour to the ryot where he wanted it the most. We devoutly wish that the Government of India follows up the noble example of the Maharaja of Jaipur by subscribing a magnificent share of its own to the Famine Fund, which would not only serve to cement the bond of unity more firmly between the rulers and the ruled, but will be valued as a fitting demonstration of the sympathy and affection with which the Royal family regard India.

India has many a stately monument of Rulers and Princes that have swayed the destinies of her peoples in the past, says the "Jam-i-Jamshed." She lacks not in memorials at once grand and impressive to speak, to the coming generations of her children, of the worth and virtues of her philanthropists and public benefactors. But in all that mighty roll of monuments there is none that shall view in future ages with that which the pious hands of the present Maharaja of Jaipur have, to his eternal honour, reared for the good of the whole Indian people. Jaipur has the enviable reputation of being ruled by a Prince who has made the happiness of his people his chiefest care. He has not wasted his substance and his energies after pursuits such as have disfigured the annals of Native States in the past and have continued to be a blot on the history of India even at a time when so much is being done for the education and enlightenment of her native Princes. The Maharaja of Jaipur is looked upon as somewhat old-fashioned, but very few, if any, of his brother princes, even though claiming themselves to be enlightened and educated, have looked upon their duties and obligations as men and rulers from such an elevated and lofty standpoint as he has been known to do. Not content with serving his people, he has tried to serve others, and of the service the Famine Trust is the finest and most convincing proof. To their Royal Highnesses certainly no other form of memorial could have proved more attractive than the one chosen by the benevolent and none the less loyal Maharaja.

30th DECEMBER 1905.

Civil and Military Gazette.—The Muhammadan Educational Conference opened its nineteenth session this morning. About a thousand delegates representing the whole of Muslim India were present. The spacious Central Hall of the College was packed to overflowing. The president, Hon'ble Khalifa Muhammad Hussain, in his inaugural address reviewed the entire field of educational activity of the Muslims. The educational ideal being progressive, he said there could be no finality to our endeavours in that direction. He referred to the past work of the Conference, saying it had been a force of great educative value.

He considered the study of Arabic an indispensable factor of any scheme of Muslim education, but in his opinion it wanted remodelling on scientific Western lines, and he expressed gratification at the initiation of research work in Arabic learning undertaken at Aligarh. Next he invited the attention of the Musalmans to instituting a faculty of science, as being the greatest desideratum of the age. He further discussed the question of the emancipation of women, and pointed out that education was the sole remedy for raising the intellectual and moral level in Muslim homes. In conclusion he referred to the manifold blessings of British rule, and the deep sense of loyalty which permeates the Musalmans for the King-Emperor, terminating by calling for three cheers for the Emperor and the Prince of Wales. This was enthusiastically responded to.

The first resolution was unanimously adopted for the institution of a gold medal for a Muhammadan B. Sc. of an Indian University in honour of the Nizam's Jubilee.

Daily Telegraph.—Delhi, the mistress of every conqueror of India, Aryan or Afghan, Persian, English or Mogul, remains unconquered still. Over twenty square miles of sun-baked plain lie out the debris of her many pasts, relics of her dead and gone masters, some perfect still, some once more crumbling back into the levels of red-yellow marl that have alternately fed and housed and fed and housed again forgotten generations of men. Yet Delhi lives. Like some huge crustacean she sheds behind her her own outgrown habitations, as she crawled northwards from Tughlakabad and Lalkot, through Dinpana and Ferozabad, till the long, red lizard of the Ridge barred her way, and now she suns herself, a raffle of narrow and congested byways beneath the crimson walls of Shah Jehan's great palace-fort. But Delhi is more than her streets and temples. You may go round about her and count her towers; you may tramp from the Jumma Masjid to the Fort, from the Fort to the Pillar, from the Pillar to Humayun's Tomb and the great Minar; and when all is seen you will understand that these things do no honour to Delhi; it is Delhi that doubles their significance, and that of all that is found within her wide borders. Inscrutable and undeniable, her claim is different from that of all other towns of India, for she has no rival in greatness from the mountains to the sea, and all men know that whoso holds Delhi holds India. A wide and almost waste plain stretches along the eastern bank of a sandy expanse of river-bed. In the far distance low violet hills hem in the horizon, and almost every acre of the plain between the river and the hills bears its own monument of a bygone day. In among the tangles of thorn bush and mimosa, where no living thing passes by save a wandering buffalo or a kite wheeling high up in the sun, the walls and terraces of deserted temples crumble and the white datura or the raw yellow acacia flourishes beside the alter stones. Here and there an arch springs forty feet to where a bird-borne poppy-plant slowly threatens a lingering key-stone, and a peacock scraunches among the rotting stumps of last year's self-sown Indian corn.

Beyond the hard white shaded road—the only serviceable and well-kept thing in all the landscape—rises in a garden the dome of an ostentatious tomb. Some servant of an Emperor, some Emperor himself it may be, who sleeps soundly in his grave, all unconscious that the palace and city he believed so abiding and so loyal has drifted far from him and his all-powerful dynasty, and now darkens the northward sky, with the smoke of factory chimneys and locomotives straining across the iron-bridged Jumna. Far away to the south still stands the shaft raised by the slave-emperor from Turkestan, and underneath it the iron pillar of a yet earlier "conqueror of the universe" bears witness yet to its Royal maker's foolishness. Tughlakabad, hard by, is given over to the jackal and the cobra and the owl—the very bats have found in it no ceiling for their foul nestings. Lalkot lies a weed-grown fold of scattered half-hewn stone and mud; it needs an antiquarian to guess where here and there a gate may once have pierced the vaulted fortifications of old. Indraprastha is there still, but she has given up the struggle against fate, and her cornices and parapets fall unheeded across her exits and her entrances. Only the Grand Trunk Road endures between and beneath the shadows of the heavy banyans above, whose leaves are whitened daily by the shuffling bullock-carts, as when Shah Jehan's vast equipage trailed slowly in to his new capital from that old one, which had become a burden upon his heart too heavy for him to bear. A few minarets have pierced the skyline for some time, but as one follows along its clear metal strip, Delhi itself—Delhi, that is, of to-day—rises flat and uncomely behind her long, low, fortified, and battlemented walls. Outside the glacis is clear, save for a few yellow-flowered bebelis and a crumbling chailya or two: inside there is the well-remembered jostle and stench of every native quarter of the East, and so through eight foot thoroughfares below jutting eaves and, rarely, dirty balconies, one reaches the one great street that cleaves the town in halves, the famous Chandni Chauk. Meagre, ramshackle houses—one-storeyed, and plastered with torn paper, their dirty blue paint smeared over decayed whitewash—lean one against the other, and expose on their vermin-haunted walls and raised floors cheap European goods or trays of fly-blown native sweets, bowls of chillies or onions, framed oleographs of gods or English princes, American nickle clocks, or scrap-iron heaps. In between them some brick and mortar mission puts out its sigh-hopeless appeal, or some native chemist advertises his willingness to further indifferently the medical systems of either East or West.

But the real shops of the "Silver-street" are those which show little to the public eye, and you could hardly believe that those unpretentious little cabins, where the scarlet-teethed shopmen smile upon you as you pass, have within call half the jewels of India. Down the middle of the Chandni Chauk runs a line of bedraggled banyans, mud below where the bhisti sprinkles dust a-top, and at the end, across the burnt grass of the maidan, rise the dusty crimson walls of the fort.

There is much for a man to see in Delhi, there is even more waiting for him to understand. One might set him with muffled feet upon the gigantic courtyard of the Great Mosque or the blinding white marble of the dainty Moti Masjid; there are temples and halls of audience, and baths to be seen; there are crumbling memorials of the Mutiny, Hindu Rao's house, and the tree-encumbered sites of redoubt and battery; there is Asoka's pillar, for those who pick the worm-holes of long-vanished days; there is the already over-grown site of the Great Durbar, for those whose interests are of to-day. But among all these things two stand out significant. One is the Divan-i-Khas, or private throne-room, of the palace in the fort.

It is an open hall, supported on a double row of many cusped arches, lightly gilded, and heavy square columns, panelled and inlaid, of marble, here white, there ivory, there old gold in tint. One could swear that this forest of marble is translucent. The gilding upon it here and there stands forward and rejects the light that sinks softly into the onyx-like stone, upon which it is laid. And the inlaid flowers, whereof, every leaf is jade and malachite, every petal is agate and lapis lazuli, so stand out upon this pearly bed that you might vow you could put your fingers behind the stalk and snap it. You will not at first understand even the beauty and splendid skill of the Divan-i-Khas; if you try four afternoons to sketch you may begin to realise that Austin de Bordeaux, a dishonest and fugitive jeweller from France might yet be the first decorator of all known periods. Decorator—not artist, nor perhaps architect, the point is in dispute—quiet, restrained, and perfect to the veining of a poppy leaf or the stamen of one of those Crown Imperial lilies or blue-purple irises which his craftsmen never looked upon. Yet at the bidding of this immoral genius they faithfully translated into stone the humbled pride of the one and the cool transparency of the other. Everywhere the design is both natural and conventional and the harmony of this amazing casket for the Peacock Throne deserves the famous Persian inscription, "If heaven be anywhere on earth, it is here, it is here," it is here. Outside there is hot sunshine, the blaze of a scarlet hibiscus across the lawn, and the soft and stealing scent of jasmine and orange blossom. The Peacock Throne—of which, pace Lord Curzon, a noble fragment yet remains in the treasure-house of Teheran—was of gold. But you could not see much of the gold, because there were rubies, diamonds, and sapphires close set from end to end of the long low seat. A peacock "in his pride" stood behind at either end, and formed between them the greater part of the back. These two were of precious stones, only, I think, larger than those used in the seat. Also a parrot ensigned the centre of the back of the throne—the bird was cut from one single emerald. These statements appear to be the plain truth about the most gorgeous jewel ever made on earth. They would be incredible had not, luckily, a French professional jeweller seen the throne before it was stolen by Nadir Shah in 1739 and partly broken up. Tavernier has left not only a description of the thing, but an expert's estimate of its value—twelve million thirty-seven thousand and five hundred pounds sterling.

We have the casket of this jewel in the Diwan-i-Khas, and it is worthy of that royal seat, even if its design was equal to its cost. And in the Diwan-i-Khas we have the keynote and coping-stone of the policy of the Mogul dynasty in India.

Outside the battered Kashmir gate, whereto leans the plain stone which commemorates Home and Salkeld, is a stretch of uneven grass cut into by a diverging road. Across that, a little rise takes one through the cemetery gates, past the squat lodge of the keeper, up to a railed-off tomb underneath a neem-tree. Inside there is a flat stone, with these words upon it: "The grave of Brigadier-General John Nicholson, who led the assault of Delhi, but fell in the hour of victory, mortally wounded and died 23rd September 1857; aged 35." There have been many lives worth living in the last hundred years, but few indeed are fit to set beside John Nicholson's. There have been many deaths worth dying, but surely none since Nelson's that compares with his. Two men at the eleventh hour regained for us India as she was slipping from our very fingers' ends. One—Clive—has long been forgotten; in all the length of this statue-laden country there is not a bust or a tablet to him. Of John Nicholson it can hardly be said that he has been forgotten. In England he has never been recognised at all; but out here in India the money for the statue that is even now being modelled in his honour has come from such a variety of admirers that one is reminded of the general's popularity while he lived among the very tribes whose women to-day, as in his own time, scare their children into quietness with the mere name of "Jan Nikasain." For English rule in India John Nicholson stands, just as the gold and emeralds and marble of the Diwan-i-Khas stand for the Mogul and his ideals. But if there still survives a spirit of that dead and splendid dynasty, it does but breathe in the night wind that stirs the dead grasses along the Campagna of bygone Delhi, while Nicholson's ghost walks visibly abroad wherever sound and unselfish work is done by the lowest sahib-servant of this huge and helpless people entrusted to our care.

Englishman.—It is impossible to imagine a Royal entry into the capital of an Empire which more completely satisfied all the conditions of a dignified and splendid occasion than the arrival in Calcutta yesterday of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The weather was propitious, and the social and political atmosphere was charged with an electricity, which only the presence of enormous crowds and the stimulus of genuine loyalty and good feeling can supply. The streams of pedestrians who long before noon began to flow along the main arteries converging on the maidan were an impressive spectacle, the effect of which was intensified when the sea of humanity into which they poured themselves was surveyed. They conveyed a tumultuous impression of an unique occasion; indeed the spontaneous ease with which Calcutta rose to the height of it was one of the most notable features of yesterday's demonstration. We publish elsewhere the group of pictures which our special correspondents at various points have gathered up. We need not add to their graphic narratives except to note that the same spontaneous spirit of zealous loyalty displayed itself in the stately assemblage which welcomed Their Royal Highnesses on the banks of the river as thrilled the mighty concourse which surged around the royal route. On the demeanour of the Prince and Princess, the friendly ease with which they at once fitted themselves into their surroundings as they landed, it is also scarcely necessary to dwell. That is a picture which has already been graven on the consciousness of India. Nor can it be questioned that the welcome which they received, simple and speedy as were the formal proceedings, had a quiet dignity which was entirely worthy, both of Calcutta and her Royal guests. The Vice-Chairman of the Municipality has a fine presence, and his reading of the Municipal address was an admirable performance set off by the right touch of courtly grace. The Prince's reply was most appropriate and happily conceived. In two sentences it summed up practically all that is to be said about India under the British raj. "There is nothing more typical of the relations between the British and Indians than Calcutta, which has grown from a river swamp to be the second city of our Empire. If, as you say, the prosperity which blesses this place is common to all India, we may congratulate ourselves on the results of the bond between the Mother Country and India." And so after a graceful expression of thanks for the jewel which the Princess had been pleased to accept at the hands of the Corporation, this simple and yet notable ceremony came to an end, and the Royal couple passed through the arches of Prinsep's Ghat to gladden the eyes of Calcutta.

Englishman.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived in Calcutta yesterday and were received with an enthusiasm and a loyalty which were at once impressive and inspiring. The visit had been eagerly awaited, and the great event had aroused the keenest interest among all classes down to the humblest. The whole city put on a gala appearance and every quarter was gay with bunting, while the huge crowds which thronged the streets, especially those leading to the routes of the Royal procession were something to be remembered. The only occasion with which yesterday's can in any measure be compared was the visit of His Majesty the King-Emperor thirty years ago, and in this land of short memories that has passed into history. It is certain that the eager zest which was displayed on every side has not been equalled within the memory of many, who are now active among us. The weather was perfect—a little warm, perhaps, for the end of December, but the brilliant sunshine clothed Calcutta as with a glorious garment, and suffused the whole scene with a joyousness which was to be felt rather than to be described. The day was observed as an universal holiday, and as every one, who could walk or drive turned out to welcome Their Royal Highnesses, the crowds which thronged the route of the procession, or clustered in the more select enclosures of Prinsep's Ghat and Government House compound must have been numbered by hundreds of thousands rather than by tens. The general arrangements for the reception cannot be too highly praised and Mr. C. B. Bayley, upon whom the Chief responsibility for them rested, is to be congratulated. The police arrangements left nothing to be desired, and reflect the highest credit on Mr. F. L. Halliday and his able lieutenants.

The crowds started gathering at an early hour to view the entry of the future Emperor of India into the Metropolis, and all coigns of vantage along the route were soon taken advantage of. Thousands of Indians and hundreds of Europeans and Eurasians fought with one other to secure unobscured views of the roads along which the Royal procession would pass. Special anxiety was manifested to approach as near as possible to Prinsep's Ghat, and by noon there was a large concourse of men assembled on the maidan and the adjacent roads. They were soon driven back by the Police, with the help of the Military, and the approaches to Prinsep's Ghat kept clear for a reasonable distance to permit of the passage of the people, who had tickets for Prinsep's Ghat. Elsewhere along the new road from Prinsep's Ghat to the Dufferin Statue the crowds were growing momentarily denser. Despite the fact that there was a wait of three hours before them, the assemblage behaved in an orderly manner, and though there was the usual jostling and fighting natural to any crowd, any serious disturbance was soon quelled by the arrival of the policeman. The crowd extended from Prinsep's Ghat to the Dufferin Statue, and stretched away to the corner of Esplanade and down Old Court House Street. The dust raised along the Red Road by the passage of the swarms of men was blinding, and put one in mind of the roads at Delhi during the Durbār. The favourable trees all along the route were soon studded with men who were anxious to catch a glimpse of the Royal cortège. Right along the Red Road stands had been erected by the Executive Engineer of the Division, most of them being for the accommodation of the school children. All the local schools, both for boys and girls, were represented and each was provided with its own stands. Many of the hill schools whose pupils are largely from Calcutta also had stands of their own, while others were accommodated on the stands of branch institutions in Calcutta. All the local missions, Indian and European, had stands, so that there were some thousands of children all along the Red Road. Each school carried its own banners, some of which were exceedingly handsome, and generally contained words of welcome to Their Royal Highnesses, surmounted by the Prince of Wales' feathers. Each child was to have carried a flag, but the flags were not distributed to them, as it is believed, that there has been such a run on flags lately, that almost all the firms have sold out their stocks. By 3 p.m. the hurried tread of the passing multitude on the Red Road abated, and the stands were filled, and the crowds quieted. Beyond the balustrade of the Red Road the throng was immense. Carriages were driven up alongside and their tops were crowded with expectant men and women. Stools, chairs, packing cases, etc., were also requisitioned to afford better views of the procession. After a long wait the booming of the guns from the flagship announced the arrival of the Royal party. Shortly after when the Howrah had passed down the river conveying the Prince and Princess to Prinsep's Ghat, hordes of people were seen wending their way from the river bank, across the maidan to the Red Road. Here they strove hard to gain a second view of the procession. After another wait, the roar of many voices announced the approach of the Royal Procession. First the escort of the 15th Hussars clattered past, and their smart turnout was much admired. Then followed the 28th Field Battery and the Calcutta Light Horse. Immediately in advance of the Royal carriage were the Imperial Cadets in their dazzling uniforms, and they elicited much applause. The Royal carriage then passed, Sir Pertab Singh, Honorary Colonel of the Imperial Cadets, riding on a handsome black charger on one side of the Royal carriage and Colonel Peyton of the Hussars on the other. The remaining squadrons of the Hussars followed the Viceroy's Body Guard bringing up the rear. As soon as the procession had passed, the crowds broke up and wended home-wards, and till a late hour last night, crowds of men were flowing through Old Court House Street and the other main streets of the city.

From an early hour in the morning the East Indian Railway Station at Howrah was a scene of unusual bustle and activity, and shortly after 2 o'clock huge crowds began to gather in the vicinity of the station in the hope of catching a glance of the Heir to the British Throne. Punctually at 3-24 the special train with Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and suite steamed into the station, where the railway officials had transformed their usually dingy station into a really beautiful reception room. Palms and festoons with trophies of flags, shields, and arms, among which the Prince of Wales' feather stood prominently forward, formed charming decorations on the walls of the arrival platform. The building itself had been newly painted and every thing was wonderfully fresh and spick and span. Waiting on the platform to greet the Prince and Princess were the Commissioner of Burdwan, the Magistrate of Howrah, the Commissioner of Police and Mr. Huddleston of the East Indian Railway. Messrs. Douglas, Dring, Brown and Bamber of the Railway accompanied the Royal party from Lucknow. The arrival was, therefore, practically private. After the usual formal presentations had been made Their Royal Highnesses passed down through a charmingly decorated gangway to the wharf, where the Howrah was waiting to carry them down the Hooghly. This ferry steamer had been transformed into a yacht handsomely decorated and furnished. The wooden awning was picked out with gold, two balconies were thrown out over the paddle boxes, their awnings being supported by elegant spiral columns in blue and gold and the inside of the awning lined with gold coloured brocade. The decks were laid with a rich crimson velvet pile carpet, while groups of tropical palms, ferns and banks of red and yellow roses were artistically arranged on the upper and main decks and floral decorations introduced wherever this could be done with effect. One of the cabins was converted into a boudoir furnished with curtains and cushions of pretty flower chintz. The outside of the vessel usually painted entirely white with red below water, was now embellished with gold and Royal blue bands. In the centre of each paddle box was a large gold star of India and at the bows of the vessel two beautiful scrolls with the Prince of Wales' feathers.

It was certainly a happy idea to arrange that Their Royal Highnesses should make their public entry into Calcutta by the great water highway of the Hooghly, for they were thus enabled to at once form some conception of the magnitude of the port and of the immense trade which is carried on in Calcutta.

The trip down the river was delightful, a cool breeze was blowing from the south, and the scene was brilliant in the extreme. The great steamers of the British India and P. and O. Companies were drawn up along the left side of the river, in a splendid long line of unbroken bunting. On the right the wharves were also decorated, and far down the river stretched the tiny native passenger boats all gay with life and colour. The Howrah Bridge was bright with scores of flags and streamers, and on the Port Commissioners' office, the Bank of Bengal, the High Court and other great buildings floated standards of every description. As the Howrah left the landing stage and passed each vessel yards were manned and the guns of the flagship, the Hyacinth, and the cruiser Persus boomed out a Royal salute.

The river banks were lined with expectant crowds, and away down below the beautifully decorated Prinsep's Ghat lay more great steamers and a few of the fine old sailing vessels whose numbers each year grow less and less.

At length the Howrah flying the Prince of Wales' Standard and the Port Commissioners' flag reached Prinsep's Ghat and was quietly moored to her landing stage, and the Lieutenant-Governor, the Chief Justice, the Bishop of Calcutta, and the Lieutenant-General of the Eastern Command proceeding on board were introduced to Their Royal Highnesses by Sir Walter Lawrence.

It was four o'clock precisely when Their Royal Highnesses stepped on to the pontoon at Prinsep's Ghat. Long before this hour an immense assembly had been in occupation of the tiers of seats arranged in horse shoe fashion in front of the Ghat. The decorations were tasteful and effective. Red was the dominant colour, the pontoon itself being carpeted in this colour and a broad strip running up the centre from the landing stage to the dais, while a border of two shades of green filled the intervening space up to the first row of seats. Yellow covered shamianas were erected on either side of the entrance and around the enclosure were rows of masts surmounted by flags and Prince of Wales' feathers, the whole festooned with strings of flags and ever greens. The archway over the landing stage bore the motto in white letters on a red ground "God bless the Prince of Wales." The seating arrangements were excellent and all ticket holders commanded an admirable view of the reception ceremonies.

At the shore-end of the gangway Her Royal Highness the Princess halted for a few moments with the majority of the Royal party while His Royal Highness the Prince inspected the guards of honour provided by the Calcutta Port Defence Volunteers and the Native Infantry; a long list of presentations followed. The General Officer Commanding the Presidency Brigade was presented by the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Forces in the Eastern Command.

The Chief Justice introduced the Puisne Judges of the High Court and the Metropolitan presented the Archdeacon of Calcutta. The members of the Bengal Board of Revenue were presented by the Lieutenant-Governor as were also the Commissioner of the Presidency Division, the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, the Secretaries to the Government of Bengal and four representative Indian and four European non-official citizens. The European gentlemen thus honoured were Messrs. D. M. Hamilton, E. Cable, A. A. Aplear, W. D. Cruickshank and W. T. Grice, while the Indians were the Maharajas of Darbhanga, Gidhour, Sonbarsa, and Sir Jotindro Mohun Tagore. The Ruling Chiefs of Bengal and the Consuls-General were also presented. The gentlemen enumerated above had taken up positions on either side of the pathway to the dais and but a short distance remained to be traversed. When Their Royal Highnesses had taken their places on the dais which was surmounted by a heliotrope and tasseled covering and bore a couple of magnificent gold State seats, the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Members of the Calcutta Corporation, gathered in front of the dais and were presented in turn to Their Royal Highnesses. The Vice-Chairman, (Babu Nilambar Mookerjee), then stepped to the front, presenting in his native costume with flowing white beard and fine physique, a picturesque and striding figure. His duty was to read the address of welcome from the Calcutta Corporation, a task which he discharged with dignity and impressiveness. The Hon'ble Mr. Allen had also a pleasant duty to perform that of offering for the acceptance of Her Royal Highness an exquisite jewelled necklace which Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales received with evident delight and at once clasped round her neck. The address which the Vice-Chairman read was as follows:—

To His Royal Highness George Frederick Ernest Albert, Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, Duke of Cornwall and York, Duke of Rothesay, Prince of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha and Duke of Saxony, Earl of Carrick and Inverness, Baron of Renfrew and Killarney, Lord of the Isles and Great Steward of Scotland, K.G., G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., etc., etc., and Her Royal Highness Mary Victoria, Princess of Wales.

May it please Your Royal Highnesses,—We, the Chairman and Commissioners of the Corporation of Calcutta, on behalf of the inhabitants of this city approach Your Royal Highnesses with a most respectful, loyal and heartfelt welcome on this occasion of the visit of Your Royal Highnesses to the metropolis of this great dependency of the British crown, and to express to Your Royal Highnesses, and through Your Royal Highnesses to our beloved King and Emperor, our allegiance and devotion to His Most Gracious Majesty's person and throne.

This is the second occasion upon which the Heir to the Throne has honoured India with his presence, and the universal rejoicing with which our present King-Emperor, then Prince of Wales, was greeted 30 years ago, still lives in the hearts of the people of this city.

This visit of Your Royal Highnesses, while strengthening and cementing the bonds of loyalty and attachment which have ever bound the people of India to their Sovereign, affords us an additional pledge of His Majesty the King-Emperor's abiding interest in the welfare and advancement of His Indian subjects.

Calcutta is proud to be reckoned the second city in the British Empire, and Your Royal Highnesses will find here abundant indications of the prosperity which everywhere accompanies British rule. The continued moral and material progress, not only of Calcutta but of all India, as evidenced by the numerous works of public utility, the growth and development of trade, commerce and industries and the spread of education, is a lasting testimony to the fostering care for the Indian people which is the guiding principle of His Majesty's rule.

The present occasion is a source of special rejoicing as this is the first visit of a Princess of Wales to Calcutta, and we beg leave to offer for Her Royal Highness's gracious acceptance this jewel as a gift from the inhabitants of this city. We trust that it may serve to remind Her Royal Highness of the real love and affection of the people of this city.

We beg to subscribe ourselves with the highest respect—Your Royal Highnesses' most dutiful and most obedient servants, the Chairman and Municipal Commissioners of Calcutta.

His Royal Highness replied as follows:—

Gentlemen,—The magnificent spectacle which you have afforded to the Princess of Wales and myself, the vast crowds which are assembled to welcome us, and the eloquent words of your address will remain among our most memorable experiences of this great Empire and its peoples. We both know that we are merely the fortunate recipients of the loyalty which the citizens of Calcutta feel for the King-Emperor, and in conveying to him your utterances of allegiance and devotion, I shall endeavour to describe the impressive scene on which we are now looking.

There is perhaps nothing in the whole of India more typical of the relations between the British and Indians than Calcutta, which has grown from a river swamp to be the second city of our Empire. If, as you say, the prosperity which blesses this place is common to all India, we may congratulate ourselves on the results of the bond between the Mother Country and India. Every citizen of this great capital may feel a legitimate pride in the wonderful town which has sprung up on the Hooghly. And our fellow subjects in other parts of the Empire will see in Calcutta's present prosperity, and future growth, the sign which I recognise everywhere in India of a union which, under God's providence, seems destined to endure.

It is a great pleasure to the Princess and to myself that she has been able to accompany me to India, and on her behalf I thank you most heartily for the beautiful gift which Calcutta so generously offers her, and which she will always treasure as a charming remembrance of our visit and a token of affection and goodwill.

Cheers were raised at the successful conclusion of this interesting ceremony and passing between the pillars of the ghat, Their Royal Highnesses entered the carriages in waiting, being conducted thereto by Sir Andrew Fraser. Guards-of-honour of the Calcutta Volunteer Rifles and Native Infantry were in attendance on the maidan side of the ghat. The cortege moved off amid cheers and presented an imposing and animated sight. Included in the escort were the Calcutta Light Horse, the Imperial Cadet Corps looking very smart, and these with the Hussars were two features of the procession that attracted special notice. Huge crowds had collected, dozens deep, behind the troops lining the roads in the vicinity of the ghat and the maidan itself was alive with streams of humanity striving to gain a vantage point to view the procession.

Indian Planters' Gazette.—Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived in Calcutta yesterday and were welcomed by the whole population with an enthusiasm that knew no bounds. In spite of the recent happenings in the native quarter of the city—happenings we are all so wishful to forget—there was nowhere a discordant note or a trace of sulkiness. The Hindus vied with the Europeans and Muhammadans in demonstrating their loyalty to the Throne, and the Heir Apparent had grateful proof that the heart of Calcutta is as loyal to-day as in the dark days of the Mutiny. He came to us from Lucknow, where the local associations and the meeting with the Mutiny veterans deeply stirred his feelings, and he cannot have failed to remember how much the steadfastness of the natives of the metropolis and their ready alacrity to assist the resource of Canning helped the British power to survive the great convulsion. The pageantry at Prinsep's Ghat, where the Royal party landed, was gorgeous; and to those who were not present at Delhi, was perhaps the high-water mark of public ceremonial. The exigencies of time and space preclude any attempt at description in this issue. We may not pass over the event, however, without congratulating the authorities on their decision to make the procession from Prinsep's Ghat to Government House Royal in the true sense of the word. In their solitary grandeur the Prince and Princess became the cynosure of all eyes, and the slow rate of progression gave all, even to the meanest cooly, an opportunity of seeing the personage to whom will descend the divine rights of kings of the greatest Empire the world had seen. Considering the native estimation of the kingship, it was a happy inspiration that suggested such uniqueness and the success of the experiment must be gratifying to the people who carried it through. For the next six days Calcutta will be throbbing with excitement and we are glad to find that the programme affords the Royal visitors numerous opportunities of showing themselves to the people. The visit is an event of supreme historic interest and significance. Calcutta thoroughly appreciates this and the manner in which she has decked herself to do honour to the coming King and his Consort is worthy of her proud position as Queen of the East.

Madras Mail.—The approach to Calcutta by rail is totally unworthy of a great Imperial city. The engine slinks into Howrah as if ashamed of its dingy surroundings. Every alteration or improvement to the terminus only brings into more painful prominence the fact that, not without heroic measures can it be made a fit portal for the second city of the Empire. Then, when the depressed voyager escapes from the dimness and confusion of the station, it is only to find that the narrow bridge-of-boats and a series of mean streets divide him from the spreading opulence of the heart of the town. A more hopeless theatre for a meet reception of the Heir Apparent and his Consort at the fount of Imperial rule in India, is inconceivable.

Yet, it had this advantage, that it compelled the authorities to prepare other means of State entry and induced the organisation of a water pageant, which brought Their Royal Highnesses at once into contact with the two distinguishing features of Calcutta—the River and the Maidan.

For the Hughli is to Calcutta even more than the Thames is to London. It has the same life-giving purpose as the Elbe to Hamburg, inasmuch as it feeds it with the produce of a vast hinterland, as well as links it with the open. Broad as the Thames below London Bridge, without a span below the Pontoon Bridge to break the swiftly flowing tide, it embraces in one short mile the most distinctive features of Calcutta's activities. As the flower bedecked launch, on which they embarked at Howrah steamed slowly down the river, Their Royal Highnesses saw on the right, the smoking chimneys of the Jute Mills, which are the foundation of the city's industrial wealth. On the left, rank after rank of merchant steamers which bear the burden of her world-wide trade. Beyond lie the ramparts of old Fort William, and the fringe of the Maidan, the city's second most precious possession, which she does well to guard so zealously. In no other way could they have seen, in so short a time, so much of the mighty change that British rule has wrought in the industrial life of India or of the sources of power and wealth of the great Mother City, which has arisen on Job Charnock's mud bank.

The steamers in full gala dress gave a joyous shriek of welcome as the Royal launch approached, whilst the guns of the stern old Fort boomed out a Royal salute. These were succeeded by a double line of little dinghies gaily painted and as bravely dressed as their big sisters.

And these led direct to the barge moored at the foot of Prinsep's Ghat, where the Royal visitors were officially received. Here, draperies of amber and crimson and a broad red way led to the platform, on either side of which were grouped the wives and daughters of the Calcutta Port Commissioners. Here the Port Defence Volunteers, seamen in blue jackets, the Artillery also in blue, and the Engineers in red, as well as a stalwart band of the 13th Infantry stood to arms. This path debouched on a circle, where round a carpet of olive green and crimson were gathered the leading officials and citizens and all Calcutta society. Ordinarily, the row of the Corinthian pillars, which commemorate the long work of James Prinsep, would not be considered either graceful or appropriate, but they formed a fitting background to the animated scene with the green and red of the ground work; the military, political and ton-sular uniforms; the rich dresses of the native gentry; and the brightness and grace of the ladies' frocks. From the top architrave of the memorial, a small group looked upon the small dais, seated wherein were Their Royal Highnesses to receive the City's dutiful greeting, and through the archway could be discerned the thousands waiting to accord the people's reception.

As the launch touched the barge, the Lieutenant-Governor Sir Andrew Fraser, the Chief Justice Sir Francis Maclean, the Most Reverend the Bishop of Calcutta and the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Eastern District Sir Alfred Gazelee stepped on board. Preceded by these high officers, Their Royal Highnesses disembarked, and shook hands with all who had the honour of presentation. With Sir Andrew Fraser on the left and tall Sir Francis Maclean on the right, gracefully acknowledging salutations which met them on both sides, the Prince and Princess walked slowly to the dais, and sat in the Chairs of State. His Royal Highness was wearing the uniform of a British General and the Princess an exquisite gown of hand-painted, pale-blue silk, trimmed with fine lace and a smart toque.

Grouped in front of the dais the Corporation read their address, the Deputy Chairman reciting it in a full sonorous voice.

The Commissioners, after expressing their allegiance and devotion to His Majesty's person and throne, said:—"This visit of Your Royal Highness, while strengthening and cementing the bonds of loyalty and attachment which have ever bound the people of India to their Sovereign, affords us an additional pledge of His Majesty the King-Emperor's abiding interest in the welfare and advancement of his Indian subjects. Calcutta is proud to be reckoned the second city in the British Empire, and Your Royal Highnesses will find here abundant indications of the prosperity which everywhere is to be found in India as evidence of the prosperity which everywhere accompanies British rule. The continued moral and material progress not only of Calcutta but of all India is evidenced by the numerous works of public utility, the growth of development of trade, commerce and the industries, and the spread of education which is a lasting testimony to the fostering care for the Indian people which is the guiding principle of His Majesty's rule."

The Address was enclosed in a casket of silver-gilt with panels depicting a scene on the Hughli, the Ochterlony Monument, the Town Hall and the Temple at Kalighat.

Then followed a charming incident. To commemorate the advent of the first Princess of Wales in the Mother City, the Commissioner sought and obtained leave to present Her Royal Highness with a jewel. This was a necklace of pearls and diamonds, the pearls of large size and each one of a different colour. But, instead of passing it to the lady in-waiting on receiving the necklace from the Chairman, Her Royal Highness intimated her desire to wear it, and, placing it round her neck, Lady Shaftesbury snapped the clasp—a graceful act of appreciation which was deeply valued by the donors.

The route to Government House lay by the Ellenborough Course, a curve on the Maidan, until it joined the Red Road, the great evening resort by the statue to the late Lord Dufferin. From this point it was densely packed with people of all grades. These, mingling in their holiday garb with the decorations of tall Venetian masts with bannercets and laurel wreaths formed into shimmering streaks of colour. At the head of the Royal cortege rode the 15th Hussars. The 36th Field Battery brought their guns grumbling along. More Hussars followed and were succeeded by the Calcutta Light Horse, well-mounted and well-turned out in serviceable khaki. They passed and gave way to the Imperial Cadet Corps, the fruit of Lord Curzon's admirable policy to find military employ for the sons of those martial houses, who are the salt of India. Sitting easily their black chargers and faultlessly appointed in cream, blue and silver, they were as gallant a body as one could wish to see. Their Honorary Commandant, Sir Partab Singh, rode a superb black horse on the right of the carriage. In most of the places east of the Od Court House Street, the crowd approached suffocation dimensions, and, when it urged into the street after the procession passed, it looked as if neither man nor horse could move.

The arrival at Government House was a scarcely less imposing picture. The broad white facade of the stately home of the Governor-General receding in the centre to admit a wide flight of steps is a noble setting to any tableau. The softened light of the declining day brushed aside the garishness it wears at high noon, and made the smooth grounds even more beautiful. Here were gathered the Viceroy and the principal Civil and Military officials—Lord Minto, an erect soldierly figure in scarlet; Lady Minto in a trailing gown of pale blue, with a hat of the rich cornflower shade; the commanding, unmistakable figure of Lord Kitchener; and Admiral Poe. But conspicuous even in this group, was the Tashi Lama of Shigatse, with his refined features and inscrutable expression, in his rich robes. There were also our old ally in the Tibet Expedition, the Tongsa Penlop of Bhotan; and, in a corner of the verandah, the diminutive person of the Rani of Sikkhim in a quaint skirt and a head-dress like a spreading fan. They lent the Imperial touch to the scene.

As the hour for the approach of Their Royal Highnesses drew near, the Viceroy and Lady Minto descended to the lowest step of the carpeted approach. At the head were Lord Kitchener and Admiral Poe. On the right hand and on the left, the Scarlet Lancers of the Viceregal Body-guard and a big gathering of officials, whilst on the opposite side of the Red Road stood the guards-of-honour of black jackets from the Flagship and the King's Own. The greeting between Their Royal Highnesses and Lord and Lady Minto was most cordial.

It recalled the circumstance, that, only a few years ago, the same hosts were receiving the same Royal guests in far distant Canada, and accompanied them on their tour through the Great Dominions. Is not this one of those episodes which bring home very vividly all that is summed up in the words "The British Empire?" The time separating the two progresses is so short, the distances so vast, and the conditions vaster still. Yet the flag which flew from Quebec to the Pacific is the same as that which flies over Their Royal Highnesses from Bombay to Calcutta. The loyal acclaim that meets them has the same significance. It also brought home very forcibly what we mean by the Indian Empire, when the Imperial Cadets, the sons of the ruling families of Hindustan, were separately paraded, and individually presented the hilts of their swords to His Royal Highness in token of fealty.

The levee this evening was the largest ever held in Calcutta. The presentations were made in the Throne Room of Government House where a dais was erected for His Royal Highness. They occupied nearly two hours.

Pioneer.—An interesting feature of the Royal visit to Lucknow was the employment of the Rampur Imperial Service squadrons as a cavalry escort to the Prince. They are a fine stalwart body of men, very well mounted, and everyone was struck by their smartness and soldierly appearance.

On Thursday morning the Prince of Wales motored round Lucknow Cantonments, and among other things paid a private visit to the Station Hospital, where Nursing Sisters Kelly, Warrack, Ross and Quinn were presented to His Royal Highness. The Prince was much interested in the hospital, and asked many questions about the cases. General Sir E. Locke Elliot, the officers of the R. A.M. C., and the Nursing Sisters were the only persons present.

At Government House after breakfast to-day the principal officials, including the Lieutenant-Governor and his staff, were heartily thanked by Their Royal Highnesses and presented with appropriate gifts in connection with the Royal visit. Among them were Mr. Botting, Police Inspector, Mr. Michael and Mr. Hilton, who was a Martinière boy in the Residency at the time of the siege. Later, the Prince, accompanied by Major-General Sir E. L. Elliot, drove round cantonments in a large motor, the route taken being via the Mall, Hope, Olpheris and Grant Roads to Dilkusha Palace and the Martinière. En route, the Prince inspected the 6th Cavalry drawn up on the maidan to the east of Grant Road. At 1-40 p.m. the Royal train left for Calcutta. Among the privileged few to witness the departure, which was private, were Sir James and Lady LaTouche and Sir E. and Lady Elliot. A salute of thirty-one guns was fired by the 74th Battery, R.F.A., from close to the reservoir as the Royal train steamed out of the station.

It may be added that the Prince of Wales, after inspecting the guard-of-honour at the garden party at Husainabad yesterday, said he was much pleased to see the strong muster of the cadets of the Martinière, and expressed the wish that an extra week should be added to the Christmas holidays. This wish will, of course, be acceded to.

In connection with the approaching visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Burma there will be a naval pageant of a decidedly interesting character, which is certain to attract the citizens of Rangoon to the Strand bank in thousands, especially when the naval guns begin to salute the port.

The Hyacinth, second-class cruiser, the flagship of Rear-Admiral Poe, Commander-in-Chief of the East India Squadron, is due to arrive in harbour on the 11th of January, preceding the arrival of the Renown by a day. The Perseus, second-class cruiser, and the Fox, third-class cruiser, arrive on the evening of the 12th of January after conveying, in company with the Terrible, first-class cruiser, the Renown from Calcutta to Rangoon. Owing to their deep draught the Renown and Terrible will have to anchor below the Hastings. This will deprive the people of Rangoon of the rare opportunity of seeing one of the first-class cruisers of the British fleet, which are seen in riverine ports only on very exceptional occasions.

Saturday Review.—Seven weeks have elapsed since the Prince and Princess of Wales landed in Bombay. More than half the tour has been completed, and the record has so far been a triumphal procession, attended by all the gorgeous pomp and trappings of the East. There can be no doubt that the visit will leave a deep impression for good on the minds of the Princes and the people of India and their future Emperor. Indian loyalty has been enthusiastically proclaimed in places which bear indelible marks of the long struggle for supremacy between the native rulers and the East India Company, culminating in the Mutiny and the transfer of the Government to the Crown. This week the Prince has been in Lucknow—"a name very precious to us at home." Even the President of the National Congress has only appreciative words to say of the Royal tour. Whatever else the Congress may find to criticise—and its members do not hesitate to describe Lord Curzon's administration as "reactionary and repressive"—they are assured that the benevolent interest taken in Indian affairs by Queen Victoria is shared by the King-Emperor and the Prince of Wales.

Times.—Calcutta is a city of magnificent distances. Its rivals assert that that is its only claim to magnificence. This is a libel; for, though it is actually younger than Bombay and Madras, neither possesses so many stately public buildings and private mansions dating back to the earlier periods of British rule. Still less does either possess anything comparable to the Maidan, which is rightly the pride of Calcutta, a noble park-like esplanade, with two miles of river frontage on the Hooghly, and splendid avenues stretching from Government House, which occupies the northern end, to the Zoological Gardens and the Belvedere, the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, at the southern end. Fort William faces the river in the middle of the Maidan, and just below the fort is an embankment known as Prinsep's Ghat, which was wisely chosen for the State reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales to-day. Thus not only were the narrow and somewhat squalid streets avoided which lead from Howrah Station into the heart of the city, but the Royal visitors had an opportunity, whilst being conveyed down the river from Howrah to the landing place, of forming some idea of the busy traffic of the port of Calcutta, which represents an import and export trade of over 50 millions sterling.

The Ghat itself was gaily decorated and on either side of the silken dais prepared for Their Royal Highnesses raised stands were thronged with invited guests, the military and naval uniforms blending with the summer toilettes of the European ladies and the gorgeous robes of the Indian Rajahs into an effective play of colour under the radiant sunshine. The Royal party were welcomed ashore by the highest authorities of Bengal Province, Sir Andrew Fraser, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir Alfred Gaselee, the General commanding the Eastern Division, the Chief Justice, the Bishop of Calcutta, and others, who conducted them to the dais. Here took place an official reception by the Municipal Corporation of the city, who presented a loyal address, to which the Prince responded in felicitous terms. On behalf of the citizens of Calcutta a beautiful jewel was then offered for the Princess's acceptance—a necklace of rare pearls, all of different shades, which once formed part of the famous Dholpur jewels, and has now been mounted in a new setting of diamonds. The Princess marked her gracious acceptance of the gift by placing the necklace there and then round her neck.

A State procession, with the Imperial Cadet Corps of young native princes as immediate escort, was thereupon formed and proceeded to Government House, where there was an official reception by the Viceroy and Lady Minto on behalf of the Government of India, the other officials present including the military and naval commanders, the chief members of the Council, and the Secretaries to the Government.

By all accounts this has been a record day for Calcutta, the crowds which turned out to welcome Their Royal Highnesses being estimated at close upon 200,000. Certainly from an early hour a continuous stream seemed to pour forth from the city and suburbs, which together possess a population of about one million, all swarming into the Maidan. Their demeanour was everywhere respectful, and, though the cheering was mainly confined to the groups of Europeans and school children assembled along the route, it must be remembered that cheering is not an Oriental custom and the Bengalis are usually undemonstrative. But for the vast majority to-day was clearly a day of holiday and rejoicing.

Times of India.—The Bengali newspapers have been doing their utmost to discourage the Purdah Party in honour of the Princess of Wales to be held at Belvedere, the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor, next Monday. One cannot but suppose that all this is part of their present policy of discrediting the authorities in every possible way and of "making things nasty" for them. All kinds of innuendoes are subtly put forward and all kinds of difficulties are raised in regard to this Purdah Party, the general drift of which is to insinuate that "national" privacy is to be invaded and "national" sentiments regarding caste and gosha restrictions to be flouted. That these allegations are generally believed in, or that they are anything but a "move" in the Bengali Partition agitation nobody will credit; and when one peruses the elaborate procedure to be followed on the occasion, the precautions seem actually ludicrous. Read the following, for example:—

"Near the house the carriages will be stopped and the horses taken out. Three carriages at a time will be drawn by khalsis into the porch. As soon as the men have gone out of the porch the purdahs at each end will be closed. The carriage doors will then be opened by female attendants, who will usher the ladies into the house and close the doors leading into the hall. One of the female attendants will then ring an electric bell as a signal to the men in charge of the purdahs that the purdahs may be drawn, the empty carriages taken out, and three more carriages brought in; and the process will be repeated until all the guests are in the house."

It will be difficult for even the most subtle and clever "agitator" to pick a hole in this kind of "close purdah"! Moreover, to make assurance doubly sure, "any gentlemen, members of whose family will be at the party and who wish to do so, are invited to accompany them to satisfy themselves as to the completeness of the arrangements."

SELECTIONS FROM NATIVE PAPERS PUBLISHED IN BENGAL, FOR THE WEEK ENDING THE 30TH DECEMBER 1905.

Mihir-o-Sudhakar.—The Mihir-o-Sudhakar (Calcutta) of the 22nd December accords a most hearty and joyous welcome to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on behalf of its subscribers and the entire Musalman community in Bengal. The writer proceeds to address his co-religionists in the following terms:—

Down with all personal quarrels in the endeavour to do your duty. Do not waste time in political agitations. Do not forget your personal responsibility in going to discuss the good and bad points in your Sovereign. Try to perpetuate the memory of this Royal visit by some work of permanent national benefit. Above all, pray to the Almighty to bless Their Royal Highnesses.

All Uriya papers.—All the native papers of Orissa seem to take great interest in the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales through India, and they wish them a successful and safe journey back to home.

Indu Prakash, 25th December 1905.—"The King-Emperor and the people in England believe that the tour of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales in this great dependency of Britain will strengthen the loyalty of India. The Times, a truthful exponent of English opinion on many subjects, has expressed its perfect faith in such a result ensuing from the event. To the average Briton, who knows very little of India, the Times' assertion will probably appear as gospel truth. We propose here to subject it to a critical analysis. Is loyalty a thing purely unselfish? Some will answer 'yes,' and the British Government in India will be only too glad to endorse this comfortable answer to that question. But the pity of it is that loyalty is not an entirely unselfish sentiment. Even when the king is not an alien, loyalty can exist and grow only on the due discharge of the duties of kingship by the ruler. When the king is an alien, the demands of loyalty are much greater for the king has in that case to perform the onerous task of removing all traces of a feeling of alienation between him and his people, and unless this identity is established, not by mere kind thoughts and liberal promises, but by concrete acts, true loyalty cannot glow with all its genuine warmth in the heart of his alien subjects. The mass of the Indian people do not know and cannot conceive that the reigning or the future King-Emperor of India has but limited powers of directly influencing the course of practical administration. They have no idea of what is called limited monarchy. This peculiarity in the relations between the British Sovereign and the illiterate mass of his Indian subjects is the cause of misunderstanding on the part of the latter. Now, our future King-Emperor is in our midst, and his Indian subjects are doing all they can to manifest their love, reverence and loyalty towards him. The more cultured classes, no doubt, know that the Royal family is the fountain-head of that spirit of generosity which triumphs again and again in British administration. But the ordinary mass of the population can look only to actualities, and if their hearts are to be touched and their loyalty strengthened, some tangible boon must be bestowed on them. We wish most earnestly to impress on the Government here and in England and also on His Royal Highness the Prince that unless some boons are conferred upon the Indian people in connection with the Royal visit it will be a delusion for the authorities and the British people to entertain the belief that the visit will materially strengthen the loyalty of the ignorant masses of India."

Karnatak Patra, 25th December 1905.—"It is more than two months since His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales landed on these shores, and during this short period he has travelled all the way from Bombay to Rawalpindi. What, we ask, did His Royal Highness see in this vast region crossed by him? On landing in Bombay His Royal Highness in his reply to the Corporation's address told us that his object in visiting India was to know personally how his future Indian subjects fared under the British rule. In order to carry out this most laudable and praiseworthy object we all expected that His Royal Highness would like to see with his own eyes the bad features of Indian life much more than the good ones. But we regret to say that this has not been done. His Royal Highness in his journey through Rajputana spent nearly two weeks in visiting some four or five capitals of Native States, but did not think of visiting the relief camps which lay within a few miles from the road taken by him, and in which more than thirty thousands human skeletons were engaged upon the hardest work. The same tendency was shown by His Royal Highness in the course of his journey through the Punjab and the Frontier Provinces, where he spent more than three weeks. His Royal Highness cannot for a moment be supposed to be ignorant of the horrible catastrophe which befell the Kangra Valley only a few months ago. This valley lies within a few hours' journey from Peshawar, but no thought of visiting it appears to have entered our future Sovereign's head. An ordinary man, travelling in those regions, would naturally feel a strong temptation to visit the valley for the sake of gratifying his curiosity, if not for anything else. Is it not, therefore, strange that the Heir Apparent to the British throne did not feel any curiosity to visit the scene of devastation caused by the terrible earth-quake? How are these facts to be accounted for? Can we say that His Royal Highness came to India to enjoy feasts, fireworks and sports, or to witness military parades, and all that is beautiful and attractive in the country? The words of His Royal Highness, referred to above, contradict such a supposition. It would not be fair on our part to charge the Royal visitor with the English hypocrisy which is patent to the whole world. The only way left, therefore, to explain this unexpected course taken by the Prince is that he has left himself to the guidance of the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy, whose way of dealing with the conquered Indians must have considerably influenced His Royal Highness. The National Congress is to meet at Benares at a time when the Prince is expected to be not very far from the city, and dissatisfaction and discontent have spread throughout the whole province of Bengal. Unless His Royal Highness considers it his duty to acquaint himself with these and similar things connected with Indian politics, he will have done nothing to improve the conditions of the country and will rudely shake the high expectations formed of his visit by our countrymen, who would then be led to the belief that he undertook his present journey purely for the sake of personal enjoyment and for an exhibition of his imperial grandeur before the princes and people of India. A single visit to the National Congress will amply repay the trouble. It will reveal to His Royal Highness the dark side of the Indian administration."

Kal, 29th December 1905.—The Kal condemns the demonstrations of loyalty witnessed at the various places visited by Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. It says:—Wherever the Prince turns his footsteps, an extravagant demonstration of loyalty awaits him. But excess of loyalty, as of everything else, is bound to prove injurious. During His Royal Highness' visit to Gwalior the Maharaja, overpowered by a fit of loyalty, expressed his confidence as well as that of his subjects, that famine would disappear from the State owing to the auspicious visit of Their Royal Highnesses. This declaration will enable us to gauge the depth of loyalty of the people of Gwalior. The officials at the places visited by the Prince affect to be amazed at the display of loyalty on the part of the people and miss no opportunity to proclaim that peace and prosperity reign everywhere in the country. But no sooner is the Prince's back turned upon any place than the cry is raised that there is famine or sedition there.

Kesari, 26th December 1905.—The Kesari, commenting upon the speech delivered by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales while unveiling the statue of the late Queen Victoria at Agra, observes:—If the late Queen's love for her subjects, as evidenced by the Proclamation and by her other benevolent acts, be really inherited by the King-Emperor and the Prince of Wales, then the latter should not rest till they see the pledges given by her to the teeming millions of India redeemed to the letter. In our humble opinion this is a work of far greater importance than the bringing about of an entente between England and the Powers. It is undesirable as well as harmful that the pledges given in God's name to a country which has in the past produced kings who are known to have heroically suffered for the sake of keeping their word should still remain unredeemed.

Kesari, 26th December 1905.—The Kesari makes the following comments on the festivities at Gwalior:—While the old rulers of Gwalior brought the Emperors of Delhi at their feet, its present ruler takes pride in presiding over the Municipality of his own capital and in being appointed a Colonel of a British regiment. The subjects of the State must thank their stars that the Maharaja did not altogether forget their miseries in the midst of his transports of joy at the Royal visit to Gwalior, for in one of his speeches he admitted that there did exist some scarcity in a part of his dominions, but expressed a hope that the Royal visit would banish all famine from his territory. The chief aim of the Maharaja's rule appears to be to strengthen the British Empire, while the happiness of his subject occupies only a subordinate place in his eyes. His desire to strengthen British rule does not originate in his anxiety for the welfare of his subjects, but his efforts for their good have for their object the strengthening of the British Empire. It will be seen that this incongruity is the root of the present dishonourable and deplorable condition of our country and our Native Chiefs.

Advocate of India, 24th December 1905.—The Advocate (Lucknow) of the 24th December, says:—We accord Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales a hearty and loyal welcome to this city of many memories, sad and pleasant. Day after to-morrow the Royal entry will be made in the morning and for three days Lucknow will wear her gala dress.

* * * * *

The occasion of the visit of the Prince and Princess is going to be immortalized in two institutions—rather one institution with two departments, quite separate from each other—that are to prepare men and women to go out to the world to lessen the physical ailments of suffering humanity: and our loyal Barons have again come forward to bear the major portion of the cost of construction and equipment of the Medical Colleges as they will commemorate a cheerful event to the permanent good of the people. This is indeed very, very good of the Taluqdars. We think we echo their feelings well when we say that Government may justly be expected to generously make the cost of education such as to enable almost all classes of people to avail themselves of the blessings promised in the proposed institutions. That the poor and the destitute are also to be remembered on this joyous occasion by the distribution of food and blankets to them will make the Royal Guests more popular with people of all sorts and conditions.

During the short stay the Prince will no doubt meet many people of Oudh: Taluqdars and Municipal Members, and Raizes, mostly the first. The Nawab of Rampur and the Raja of Tehri will be received individually and their visits returned. In the crowd of engagements one very important function has perhaps been left out. If the visit is to give His Royal Highness knowledge of the country first hand, why should not private interviews with leaders of all parties be a regular feature of the visit, if not everywhere at least in one very important town of each Province? This was done in Bombay and will be repeated, we are told in Calcutta. Why not in other Provinces, The problems peculiar to each should, we think, be placed before His Royal Highness. The enthusiastic reception given to their Royal Highnesses everywhere and the loyalty evoked by their presence do require some sort of recognition. And nothing will so much appeal to popular feeling as the readiness on the part of the Prince to give a hearing to the leaders as to the problems of administration from the people's point of view. Be that as it may, Lucknow will not be behind any town in the outburst of loyalty.

31ST DECEMBER 1905.

Hindustan Review.—Two events easily detach themselves from the other occurrences of the last month and stand out prominent: the first is the visit of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales and the other, the departure of Lord Curzon, Viceroy of India. It is a coming and a going, occurrences with which we are daily familiar, but which gather importance in consequence of the personages coming and going. Royal visits to India, though necessarily few, are not now altogether rare. India passed to the Crown in 1858 and fourteen years later the late Duke of Edinburgh, the second son of Her late Majesty the Empress Victoria, paid a visit to India. That was the first Royal visit and was considered a very important event. Next came the visit of the Prince of Wales, who then stood next to the throne, and now occupies it, in 1875. Between the visits of the two Princes of Wales thirty years, or more than a generation, have intervened. But the interval has not been altogether devoid of Royal visits. The third son of Her late Majesty, the Duke of Connaught, came out to India not only as a visitor but as a public servant and held important commands in the army for some years. His Royal Highness made numerous Indian friends and he sincerely wished well to the country. Had he had his way he would have established an Indian Sandhurst. Later on, we had a visit from the late lamented Duke of Clarence, who, had he been spared, would now have been the Prince of Wales. The Duke of Connaught visited India again as the representative of his royal brother, the King, at the Delhi Coronation Durbar. The present visit of the Prince of Wales derives additional importance from the fact that he is accompanied by the Princess of Wales. With the exception of the Duchess of Connaught, no other princess of the Royal family has yet undertaken a voyage to India, and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales is doubly welcome on that account.

The departure of Lord Curzon is a more usual and common event. Every five years there is a change of Viceroys. That wholesome rule was violated in Lord Curzon's case with disastrous results. He went to England after serving for over five years, but he went with "intent to return", an intention which, in spite of several discouraging circumstances, he fulfilled. There is a marked difference between his first and his final home-going. And even more unfortunately for him his departure coincided with the arrival of the Royal visitors. In other circumstances there would have been merely a comparison between his departure and Lord Minto's arrival, and an attempt would have been doubtless made to explain away the disparity between the two events as due to the tendency to worship the rising and neglect the setting sun. It may also be said that no Viceroy of India can have the same hold over the imagination of the people as the Heir-Apparent to the Throne. That is perfectly true. At the Delhi Coronation Durbar all eyes turned oftener to the Duke of Connaught than to Lord Curzon. But at all events the departure of an outgoing Viceroy of India ought to be a more dignified event than it has been in the case of the last, but no longer the greatest, Viceroy of India. The outgoing of Lord Curzon has served merely as a foil to the incoming of the Royal visitors.

Two things are necessary to the success of such an event as a Royal visit, the loyalty and the cordiality of the reception and the bearing of the visitors themselves towards the people among whom they have come. Both have been eminently satisfactory on the present occasion. The cordiality of the reception accorded to the Royal visitors when they first landed on Indian soil was all that could be desired, and the distinguished Royal visitors have fulfilled every expectation about their graciousness and urbanity. The whole of Bombay turned out at its best and gayest to give the warmest and most loyal of welcomes to the future King and Queen of England and the Emperor and Empress of India. The scenes that were then witnessed in Bombay are yet too fresh to be repeated, nor is it necessary here to summarise the full and vivid descriptions that appeared in the newspapers. We can understand, however, that both the Prince and Princess of Wales could not fail to have been impressed by what they saw on their first landing in Bombay. First, there is the splendid natural scenery in and around Bombay. The magnificent natural harbour, the imposing coast view from Apollo Bunder to Colaba, with the handsome mansions on Malabar Hill, arrest the admiring attention of every newcomer to Bombay. Next, the landing and the first welcome must have left an indelible impression upon the minds of the Royal visitors. By great foresight and wisdom the Municipal Councillors of Bombay had elected Sir P. M. Mehta their Chairman for this memorable year. No other citizen in Bombay has rendered more important or more strenuous services to the Municipality. Sir Pherozeshah, however, had twice been President of the Municipality, and he was no longer a candidate for civic honours. But the Councillors felt that upon an occasion as auspicious as memorable, there was no other citizen so worthy to represent them as the man whose name stands pre-eminent on the records of the Municipality, and accordingly they justly elected the foremost citizen of Bombay to offer the city's first welcome to their future Emperor and Empress. We will leave out of account the pettiness of the arrangement by which Sir P. M. Mehta and his colleagues were to be kept out of the enclosure reserved for the Royal visitors on their first landing, for the implied slight was amply made up by the Prince of Wales, who duly appreciated the honour that was paid to him, and when he had replied to the address read out by Sir P. M. Mehta in his full and sonorous voice, came down the steps of the platform and instead of merely bowing his thanks, shook the Parsi knight warmly and cordially by the hand. So did the Prince of Wales justify his proud appellation of being the first gentleman in England. When the Prince's father, then Prince of Wales, made a slight error due to unfamiliarity with the custom of the country, in accepting a garland of flowers offered him by a young Parsi girl and merely bowing his thanks, he immediately set it right by handing back the garland to the girl and graciously bending his bared head so that she might put it round his neck, an instance of his gracious geniality which is still gratefully remembered in this country.

As a demonstration of enthusiastic loyalty that first welcome in Bombay will remain always stamped upon the memory of the Royal personages who touched Indian soil for the first time. In the course of their Indian tour Their Royal Highnesses will not witness again an exact counterpart of what they saw in Bombay, for in India, there is no other city like Bombay. It is the most representative and the most cosmopolitan city in India. The plaudits of the crowds through which the Royal visitors passed may not be materially different from the cheers of an English crowd, but no such crowd can be seen anywhere in Europe and America. The kaleidoscopic variety of colour, the picturesque and pleasing variety of costumes, the striking difference in the various head-dresses, produce an effect in marked and brilliant contrast with the sombre monotony and uniformity of European costume. The Parsi, the Gujrati, the Malhatta, the Kutchi, the Sindhi, the Madrasi, were all in the crowd, and each was dressed differently from the other. In another sense the gathering was unique. In no other city in India will the Royal visitors see such a large number of Indian ladies as they saw in their first drive through the streets of Bombay. Except among the Mahomedans and a very small section of wealthy Hindus there is no purda in Bombay and the ladies took part in the welcome to Royalty as freely as the other sex. The open windows of every house on both sides of the streets through which the procession passed, were crowded by Indian ladies, who waved their handkerchiefs and threw flowers into the royal carriage. This is an experience which will not again befall the Royal visitors, as everywhere else, the custom of the country will keep women indoors and they will not be able to take any part in the welcome accorded to Royalty.

If the first impression on the minds of the Prince and Princess of Wales was gratifying, it has been equally pleasant on the minds of the people. The remarkable functions in which the ladies of Bombay presented an address of welcome to the Princess of Wales, with different Indian ceremonies and amidst surroundings of oriental and historical splendour, will be remembered not only because of its striking originality, but also because it brought the Princess close to the ladies of India, who expressed themselves delighted with the simplicity and natural courtesy of their Royal visitor. Outside the Zenana the Prince and Princess have won all hearts, wherever they have gone, by their frankness, simplicity and amiability. They are sincerely pleased with all they have seen and they are invariably responsive feelings and demonstrations of the people. The speeches made by the Prince during his tour so far have also a distinctive character about them. They have no pretence whatever to rhetoric or oratorical effect. They are simple almost to the verge of severity. There is in them a simplicity, a genuine ring of sincerity and a directness of expression which have been universally admired, and which have won for the Royal speaker the approbation and gratitude of the whole country. The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to India has been a most successful undertaking and we are glad at it as it is an event of the first political and social importance.

From the spectacular point of view the tour has been a memorable one for the Royal visitors. The panoramic and striking change of the landscape has kept pace with the wonderful variety in the costumes and characteristics of the people. Think of the change from the coconut palms and the stately mansions of Malabar Hill, with magnificent sea-view, to the bleak sandy desert of Bikanir, from the enchanting natural scenery of Udaipur to the perfect work of art in Jaipur, the striking change from the Malhatta to the Marwari, from the Parsi to Rajput! The whole of Northern India, from the Punjab to Bengal, will be a different experience altogether. The almost breathless rapidity of the change may, it is to be feared, help to blur the impression on the mind somewhat but the predominant effect about the vastness and the variety of this country will be clear, and the Royal tourists will doubtless remember their visit to India as the most memorable tour they have yet undertaken.

One word as regards the attitude of the people. In his first speech the Prince said that he and the Princess were among their own people. No occasions will ever arise throughout the tour of the Royal visitors to change this first impression. They are among their own people—a people that, through all changes and all vicissitudes, have remained steadfastly loyal to the Sovereign and the Royal family, a people whose quality of loyalty is unsurpassed by any other people in the world. And this great quality is never appreciated as its real worth by the ruler of the country and the people belonging to the ruling class. From the evidence that is forced upon our attention every now and then one feels a doubt about the sincerity of the frequent profession of a firm faith in the loyalty of the people of India. They are more often than not merely lip-deep. Whenever there is the least sign of irritation or agitation, ominous murmurs are heard that disloyalty and sedition are abroad, and next follows a loud demand for repressive measures to which the authorities frequently and weakly yield. To-day one hears a Viceroy or a Governor loudly praising the loyalty of the Indian people. Six months later the air is said to be charged with sedition and summary methods are devised for its repression. The educated classes, because they are articulate, are charged oftenest with disloyalty, and yet the first welcome to royalty was extended by one of the most distinguished representatives of the educated classes. Our rulers and their countrymen in India have absolutely no conception of disloyalty or sedition because they cannot be found in India. Therefore they invent and imagine the existence of those dangers and shout and sing by turns. But the truth is known on an occasion like the present one, when the heir to the British Empire is in our midst. Is it to please the Government or the Anglo-Indian community that the people, led by the educated classes, are turning out in their thousands to welcome the Royal visitors, wherever they go? The Government knows perfectly well that it is never spared either in the press or on the public platform, and the Anglo-Indian community is aware that no love is lost between itself and the educated classes, but all differences are forgotten when royalty is on our midst and the people of India, loyal to the core and loyal by teaching and tradition, welcome the scion of the reigning house with a full heart. Nevertheless, the croakers are even now at their work, crying themselves hoarse that sedition and disloyalty are abroad, while the Prince and Princess of Wales are gliding smoothly down the full tide of loyalty.

Note.—Archbishop Colgan has signified his inability to attend. [It will be remembered that a note is inserted with reference to the Most Rev. Archbishop Colgan's inability to attend on the occasion. It seems necessary for us to explain in this connection that His Grace (who, it may be mentioned, is a member of the Executive Committee of the Prince and Princess of Wales' Reception Fund) has been obliged to come to this decision with regret. There has lately been a difficulty with regard to the order of precedence assigned to His Grace and in the interests of the Catholic community, not particularly of himself personally, His Grace has felt bound to refuse to accept the position which would be assigned to him owing to the place previously given to him by courtesy in the Precedence List having been lowered from above to below the Members of Council, and owing to his predecessor Bishop Fennelly having been assigned precedence above the Members of Council at the reception of the present King-Emperor when he visited Madras in 1875.—Ed.] The Consuls and Vice-Consuls at Madras are invited to be present in the Reception enclosure.

The Ruling Chiefs, the Prince of Arcot and the Zemindars invited by the Government to be present at Madras in honour of Their Royal Highnesses' visit are also invited to be present in the Reception enclosure.

Certain presentations will be made to Their Royal Highnesses by His Excellency the Governor.

Their Royal Highnesses will then proceed to a dais prepared for them, when an address of welcome will be offered to Their Royal Highnesses by the Corporation of Madras.

After the presentation of the address, Their Royal Highnesses will proceed to Government House. The route will be along the Beach Road as far as Parray's Corner; thence along the Esplanade as far as the Law College; thence along the Fort Glacis Road over the Wallajah Bridge across the island, over Government House Bridge, along the Mount Road to Government House.

A Guard-of-Honour with band and colours will be drawn up opposite the entrance to the Reception enclosure from which Their Royal Highnesses will depart.

Their Royal Highnesses will be attended by an Escort detailed under orders which will be issued by the Lieutenant-General Commanding the 9th (Secunderabad) Division.

The route will be lined by troops to be detailed under the orders of the Lieutenant-General Commanding the 9th (Secunderabad) Division for such portion of the route as he may direct.

The seating in the carriages of the Royal cortège will be regulated under the orders of Major General Beatson. The Royal cortège will be followed by a carriage procession.

The Commissioner of Police will maintain order and keep the streets clear.

The carriage of Their Royal Highnesses will on entering the Park, drive to Government House by the road leading round the east side of the Banqueting Hall, preceded and followed by the Escort.

Of the carriages following Their Royal Highnesses' carriage, only those of Their Excellencies the Governor and Lady Amptill and of the suite of Their Royal Highnesses and of His Excellency's Staff will enter the Park Gates. The carriages of the ruling Chiefs and others following in the procession will not enter the Park Gates but will proceed past the Gates up the Mount Road as far as the Wallajah Road.

When Their Royal Highnesses' carriage reaches the porch of Government House, the Royal Standard will be hoisted and a Royal salute will be fired from the ramparts of Fort St. George.

Seats will be reserved in a pavilion to be erected on the shore end of the Pier for the gentlemen mentioned in paragraphs 12, 13, 14 (except those who are in the immediate attendance on Their Royal Highnesses) and for the Commissioner of the Corporation. Tickets for these seats will be issued by the Chief Secretary.

Seats will also be reserved in the same pavilion for Civil, Naval and Military Officers at Madras who are not on duty elsewhere. Tickets for these seats will be issued by the Under Secretary in the Political Department.

A limited number of seats will also be reserved for the members of the families of those gentlemen to whom tickets are issued under paragraphs 26 and 27. Tickets for these seats will be issued by the Under Secretary in the Political Department.

Full dress will be worn by all Officers of Government entitled to wear uniform and morning dress by others. Military Officers in Civil employ will appear in the same order of dress as the troops.

Madras Mail.—MYSORE, 30th December.—Out of a second larger herd of 40 elephants driven, 22 escaped and the remaining 18 entered the Kheddahs on the 27th evening. Messrs. Mutannah and Ramarao went the following day to drag the elephants and successfully surrounded them after two days' trapping. The Dewan Sahib and the Conservator of Forests were present. The Dewan took a keen interest in the operations so much so that he was sending instructions to secure the herd without taking any undue risk. A beautiful camp, 6 miles from Kakankote, is being arranged for Their Royal Highnesses at Kharapura, overlooking the Kapila River, from which the Prince is to motor to and from the Kheddah and the tiger-shooting camps. The Maharaja, accompanied by Mr. Maconochie, left the Capital in a motor to the Kheddah Camp to inspect the camp arrangements, and are to return this evening. Mr. Sparkes is staying there arranging for tiger and bison shooting in Bhimanahalli and Kakankote jungles.

Observer.—DELHI, December 31.—In seven days of a Royal tour are crowded the experiences of seven generations. We descend the pass of the Khyber, through which generations of fanaticism have ebbed and flowed, and come to the plain of Rawalpindi where the armies of India display their strength and magnificence. We linger for a night at Jammu, on the beautiful threshold of the Vale of Kashmir, and wake in the Golden Temple of Amritsar. A wave of the magician's wand and we are in Delhi, with its memories of war written on the ruins of seven cities.

Every step is a chapter in history. From the walls of Lundi Kotal the Prince and Princess saw the menace of the North—the wild and warlike tribes on the frontier. At Rawalpindi they saw the defence of the Empire—tens of thousands of armed men united under one banner. Here were men of our own race marching side by side with the warriors of India—fierce little Gurkhas who are ready for any desperate enterprise, Rajputs, who are the sons of Kings born with a sword in their hands, Sikhs who revive the traditions and character of the Ironsides. It was an inspiring spectacle of the power that holds the East—this gleaming array of battle that rippled in the sun and vanished in the fog of war. At Jammu was opened a new chapter. In the shadow of snow-capped mountains Their Royal Highnesses breathed an atmosphere of peace. The Maharaja of Kashmir may be an indifferent ruler, but he is an ideal host, and had built a city of canvas the like of which has never been seen. Lapped in these luxuries it was hard to realise that beyond the snows is a frontier to guard, and that away in the clouds men watch like eagles the coming of the enemy. But it is people not places that have abiding interest, and we came with delight to the Mecca of the Sikhs.

Amritsar is the holy city of these Ironsides, who are the flower of the native army. They are dour-looking men the Sikhs, with their dark-bearded faces, their unshorn locks and spindle shank. What made them different from the Hindoos, for they are a sect, not a race apart? What gave them the obstinate courage that has served the Empire on many a hard-fought field? It is the story of a faith and of persecution. Four centuries ago there arose in the Punjab a Luther who preached a crusade against idolatry and superstition, and ended by founding a religion. His Doctrines are embodied in the Granth and enshrined in the Golden Temple that springs from the pool of Immortality. Against these marble walls and gilded domes the fury and fanaticism of the Moslem beat in vain. The impiety of Massa polluted the shrine with the blood of oxen and set a price on the head of a worshipper, yet Sikh horsemen "might be seen riding to pay homage to the Granth, and none was ever known to shrink from martyrdom." Out of these persecutions arose an army of saints who, like the soldiers of Cromwell, knew how to smite with the sword and the Gospel. The spirit that created this strange communion still survives. It has withstood a peril even greater than Moslem fanaticism, for it has resisted the insidious and inviting polytheism of Hindooism, which opens the doors of its Wallhala to every stray ghost and demon. There was a time within the memory of men still young when the faith of the Sikh seemed to be on the wane. But the wisdom of their rulers saved it from extinction, and every man who enters the ranks of the army must submit to the initiation of baptism by water sprinkled from a two edged dagger. Thus are the Ironsides preserved, for every Sikh family boasts at least one soldier.

But even men who have earned the right to style themselves "singh" or lion, cannot live by the sword alone. They have felt already the competition of peace, and have turned their energies into channels that carry into the desert the waters of prosperity. They have recognised the needs of modern education and have established in their Holy City a college. The Prince and Princess paid a visit to this institution, and must have been impressed by the contrast between the yellow turban students and the strange figures that haunt the Golden Temple and wash away their sins in the waters of the pool of Immortality. In this Royal Progress through scenes bewildering in their multitudinous variety they have witnessed no more significant spectacle. Here were youths who would do credit to any college in Europe. There, scattered over the marble causeway leading from the silver gates to the shrine were ascetics wrapped in rags and meditation, and pundits reciting prayers that have lost their savour.

From Amritsar the Prince and Princess came to Delhi—the Queen of the Cities of India. It is a place of many memories. Its ramparts have been dyed with the blood of heroes. The gate through which they entered is consecrated with the blood of gallant men who breached the walls of the mutinous city. Every stone is a record. Hero at the Cabul Gate fell Nicholson, who was a soldier and is worshipped as a saint. Here is the old gate that led to the arsenal, where nine valiant men held at bay an armed multitude and lighted the train that scattered death among their assailants. But this is not a history of the Mutiny. The Prince was interested and made a pilgrimage to the battle-fields. With the Princess he drove along the ridge—the rampart of low hills which commands the city and from which the assaults were delivered. A forest has crept from the Ridge to the ramparts, and masks the walls and the gates against which the batteries pounded in those dread days. A new Delhi has risen. Through the still air comes the murmur of its markets and over the grey walls rises the smoke of its factories.

Over the barren plain that stretches to the horizon are scattered the remains of the seven Delhis. To these also Their Royal Highnesses made a pilgrimage. Aryan and Moslem and Hindoo have left their impress on this wilderness of walls and Temples and tombs of saints and warriors.

Pioneer.—Calcutta has accorded a hearty welcome to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and no such crowds have ever been seen as collected this afternoon along the route from Prince's Ghat to Government House. This was really the feature of the reception of Royal visitors, for it is calculated that upwards of 200,000 persons were gathered together, or one-fourth of the whole population of Calcutta and Howrah. Fortunately the open spaces on the Maidan and the broad roads used for the procession could accommodate this mass of humanity with ease, and still leave room for more. No other city in India can thus offer room for enormous crowds along a comparatively short route, and at the same time afford ready means of marshalling them so that the chances of accidents shall be so small as not to count in the general arrangements. Thus to-day, while tens of thousands swarmed at various points and moved in great waves so as to see the ceremonial at more places than one, there was no misadventure. The vehicular traffic, too, was very great, and though blocks inevitably occurred from carriages converging on the crossings in the neighbourhood of Eden Gardens and at the northern ends of Red Road, these melted away in an amazingly short time. An air of joyous good humour and placid pleasure which are so characteristic of great popular gatherings here on occasions of public ceremonies was everywhere apparent. The people had assembled to welcome Their Royal Highnesses and this they did quite thoroughly, the roar of a multitude of voices going up from time to time, while bursts of cheering on sections of the route emphasised the heartiness of the reception. It was a day on which loyalty had its opportunity of full expression, and Calcutta honoured itself in the honours which it eagerly bestowed upon the Royal visitors who had come into its midst. One universal sentiment seemed to pervade all classes, and there was a common bond of unity which could not but give the most gratifying impression to the Prince and Princess as they passed on their way.

Having thus shown in general terms how a popular welcome was accorded to Their Royal Highnesses it is necessary to give details of the formal reception and the Royal progress from the historic ghāt on the Hooghly to those equally historic steps of Government House which have been silent witnesses of many arrivals for over a hundred years. The Royal train entered Howrah Station which was admirably decorated, about half past three, and here the first official reception took place, Mr. Walsh, Commissioner of Burdwan Division, Mr. Forrest, Magistrate of Howrah, Mr. F. L. Halliday, Commissioner of Police, Mr. Douglas, Mr. Dring, and other officers of the East Indian Railway, being on the platform to receive Their Royal Highnesses. From the station to the ghat, where the Port Commissioners' ferry steamer Howrah was waiting to convey the Royal party down the river, was but a short distance and soon the Prince and Princess and suite were on board. The Howrah had been made worthy to carry such distinguished passengers. The decks were covered with crimson velvet pile carpets, palms, ferns, and evergreens were artistically arranged, and floral decorations were not wanting. Over each paddle box were built balconies shaded by awnings lined with gold brocade, while gold and blue bands adorned the steamer, whose bows bore the Prince of Wales's feathers in scroll work. A delightful boudoir had been prepared for the Princess, and the Howrah was made a picture of luxurious comfort. Her voyage was but a short one, occupying just twenty minutes, as she steamed slowly down the Hooghly and through the shipping at anchor. On board were Mr. Dumayne, Vice-Chairman of the Port Commissioners, Captain Beaumont, Port Officer, and Captain Petley, Deputy Conservator of the Port. His Majesty's ships Hyacinth and Perseus notified the departure by a salute of 31 guns, the smoke rolling up-stream in white clouds as a light southerly wind was blowing. As it cleared one could see the Howrah steaming along with the Prince of Wales's standard flying, and we knew that His Royal Highness was following the route which his father took on his visit to Calcutta thirty years ago. All ships lying in the river were gaily dressed and several manned the yards, while moored on either side of mid-stream were strings of native boats prettily decorated with flags. Through these the Howrah passed, the river beautifully touched with sunshine and the air almost clear of the smoke and dust which make a sunset on the Hooghly something worth remembering with its marvellous colour effects. The vessel came alongside the pier at Prinsep's Ghat. A Port Commissioners' steamer was at hand throwing up jets of water, which shaped themselves into the well-known feathers, while the sailors on the yards of another vessel cheered heartily.

The scene here at the landing place was a striking one. Prinsep's Ghat stands high and dry on the bank, as the left bank of the Hooghly has been reclaimed, and there is thus a considerable space between the old columned building and the river's edge. This had been enclosed with a ring of Venetian masts, linked with flags and streamers, while a broad path of crimson cloth flanked with green and red had been laid down to the stage. On the latter stood two guards-of-honour furnished by the Port Defence Volunteers and the 13th Rajputs, while some 2,000 spectators were ranged in tiers of seats on either hand. On a dais near the northern face of the Ghat were two gilded chairs under an awning with silver fringes, and on low tables to the right were the handsome gold casket containing the Corporation's address of welcome, and the necklace of many coloured pearls to be presented to the Princess. The scheme of decoration as arranged by Mr. Gwyther applied not only to the approaches to Prinsep's Ghat, but all along the route, and it was very happily conceived. Each mast was surmounted by the Prince of Wales's feathers, below which were crossed Union Jacks and a wreath of evergreens. On each side of the taller masts was a shorter one, as a rule these being joined by streamers of yellow and red, yellow and blue, or the three colours, single or combined. A wealth of flags, streamers, and bunting generally added to the colour effect, and there was none of that tawdry display which often runs a decorated roadway in Indian cities. The telegraph store-yard had been indented upon for its iron posts and hundreds of Venetian masts could thus be readily put up and draped so as to conceal their usual plain appearance. Once for all it may be said that no route has ever had such simple and yet such excellent decorations.

When the Howrah had come to its moorings Sir Andrew Fraser, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, accompanied by Sir Francis Maclean, Chief Justice, Bishop Copleston, Metropolitan of India, and Lieutenant-General Sir Alfred Gaselee, proceeded on board and were introduced to the Prince and Princess by Sir Walter Lawrence. In a few minutes the Royal Party landed, and the usual honours were paid. The Prince then inspected the guards-of-honour, and a procession was formed to the dais, various introductions being made on the way, including the Maharajas of Darbhanga, Burdwan, Sonbursa and Gidhour, Sir Jotindro Mohon Tagore, the Judges of the High Court, the principal Bengal officials, and the members of the Bengal Legislative Council, Mr. A. A. Apcar, Sheriff of Calcutta, Mr. D. M. Hamilton, Mr. Cable, Mr. Cruickshank, and Mr. Grice, Master of the Trades Association. The Maharaja of Cooch Behar and the foreign Consuls-General were introduced and then followed the civil welcome. Mr. C. G. H. Allen, C.S., President of the Corporation, Babu Nilambar Mukarji, Vice-President, and the other members were presented to Their Royal Highnesses, who took their seats on the dais. The Vice-Chairman read an address to which the Prince replied.

Loud applause greeted His Royal Highness at the conclusion of his speech, and the Chairman of the Corporation then presented the jewel in the shape of the necklace of pearls to the Princess, who graciously accepted the gift. This concluded the ceremony at Prinsep's Ghat, which was the welcome of Bengal and Calcutta also. There remained the Royal Procession to Government House with the popular reception along the route.

Looking from the point of vantage given by the roof of the Prinsep Memorial on the Ghat, one could see that the military pomp of the procession would lack nothing either in picturesque effect or impressiveness. The escort was a strong one, the 15th Hussars, Calcutta Light Horse, the 28th Field Battery, a squadron of the 4th Cavalry, and the Imperial Cadet Corps being drawn up ready to start. The road curves round the Napier Statue, and the leading squadron of the 15th with the Battery, were on the Ellenborough Course hidden from sight by the trees. This in itself indicated the length of the procession. The 15th Hussars were perfectly turned out, and their Arabs were a beautiful sight, a grey squadron in particular being very noticeable. The Imperial Cadet Corps, 24 strong, with Sir Pertab Singh as Colonel Commandant, Major W. A. Watson, Commandant, and Major D. H. Cameron, Adjutant, were the object of much admiration, just as at the Delhi Durbar when they made their first appearance in public, their white uniforms with light blue facings and their black chargers with snow leopard skins over the sack-cloth were as attractive as ever to the spectators, and the compact little unit had a place of honour immediately in front of the Royal Carriage. Colonel Peyton, 15th Hussars, commanded the whole escort. The Calcutta Volunteers and the 63rd Palamcottah Light Infantry furnished the guards-of-honour outside the memorial, and the route thence to Government House was lined with troops in the following order:—63rd Palamcottah Light Infantry, 13th Rajputs, 5th Light Infantry, Bengal and Nagpur, Eastern Bengal and East Indian Railway Volunteers, the two battalions of Calcutta Volunteer Rifles, Cossipore Artillery Volunteers, a detachment of the Highland Light Infantry, the King's Own Regiment, and a small naval contingent. Colonel Carter, King's Own, was in command of the troops. But impressive as this military display was it paled before the thousands of the native spectators, who thronged upon the Maidan and stood a hundred deep or more at several points. They had poured from the densely populated northern parts of the town; Howrah had sent a big contingent from across the river, the southern suburbs had almost emptied themselves, while from greater distances by rail and road country people had hurried to gaze upon the Prince and Princess. It was a crowd or rather rows of crowds so immense that looking across towards Chowringhee one could only marvel at its density, and even to the last moment a stream was setting down Strand Road and singing past Fort William that swelled the sea of humanity already breaking upon the line of troops and the outer cordon of police. As the procession started at a walk there was one great rush of people from the southern glacié of the Fort, and it seemed almost as if progress would be impeded, so anxious was the populace to get a close sight of Their Royal Highnesses. But the pace of the escort quickened to a trot, the crowd held back, and in another moment was dissolving with that wonderful rapidity which is known only in the East. The Royal procession passed on along the Ellenborough Course, across the Maidan, turned sharply to the left and so gained the Red Road at the point where Lord Dufferin's statue marks the meeting of the ways.

Thousands upon thousands had greeted the Prince and Princess so far, but before them lay other and even greater crowds lining each side of the broad long stretch of roadway, at the end of which rose the spire of the old Scotch Church, with the dome of Government House almost in the same line, and the Prince's standard floating above.

An avenue of flags and banners seemed to open out, with shields garlanded with foliage, and the statues decorated with bunting. Dufferin, Roberts, and Lansdowne, these were passed and then came the statue of Queen Victoria, which faces the southern entrance of the Viceregal residence. The Royal Progress up the Red Road was a triumphal one. The public stands were crowded, the footpaths and adjacent parts of the Maidan were packed as densely as those at Prinsep's Ghat, rows of carriages were parked in continuous lines, and so eager had the people been to be present in good time that from noon onwards they had taken up their position and patiently waited for over four hours. There was loud cheering and applause as the procession appeared, school children in special stands sharing in the loyal greeting, and at last Old Court House Street was reached. Here the trades had done right well in bright decorations, and the frontages of the places of business and large shops were beflagged and festooned in gay colours. There was not a foot of standing room left unoccupied, and the house-tops, balconies and windows were tenanted with enthusiastic spectators. The procession swung sharply to the left and entered the ground of Government House. So ended a public reception which has had no equal. It was when the crowds began to disperse that one realised their tremendous size. The whole Maidan was alive with people and knowing its spacious limits even an expert in numbers would have hesitated to say how many thousands had been gathered together. The roads were congested with traffic, and even some of the troops had to halt at times on their march back to quarters. Excellent as were the police arrangements they were taxed to their utmost at the cross-road, but no more even-tempered masses had ever to be dealt with than these, which moved in such density to every point of the compass. No untoward incident was reported, and the popular welcome was complete in its loyal enthusiasm.

In the comparative quiet of the grounds of Government House there was meanwhile proceeding the final reception of the Prince and Princess of Wales. His Excellency the Viceroy, attended by Lord Kitchener, Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Poe, Naval Commander-in-Chief, all the high officials of the Supreme Government, Army Head-quarters Staff and Mr. Fuller (the sole representative of the local administrations outside Bengal), welcomed Their Royal Highnesses, the most cordial greetings being exchanged. There were present also the Maharaja of Hill Tipperah, the Tashi Lama, the Raja of Sikkim and the Tongsa Penlop of Bhutan, all deeply interested in the ceremonial of reception.

Guards-of-Honour furnished by the Naval Contingent and the King's Own Regiment were in attendance, and the Imperial Cadet Corps formed up on the right flank of the former so as to share the inspection by the Prince. After this inspection the Cadets were presented individually to the Prince, and offered their sword hilts, which His Royal Highness touched. The Viceroy presented the principal officials to Their Royal Highnesses, Lord Kitchener presented the officers of Army Head-quarters Staff, and Sir Louis Dane, Foreign Secretary, performed similar offices as regards the Native Chiefs present. The Prince and Princess then passed into Government House, and a salute of 31 guns fittingly closed the arrival and reception of Their Royal Highnesses in Calcutta.

To-night the Prince is holding a lovée, at which between two and three thousand gentlemen are expected to attend. To-morrow he will present colours to the King's Own Regiment in Fort William. In the afternoon Their Royal Highnesses will attend the races, the principal event being the Prince of Wales's Cup, and in the evening they will dine with the Lieutenant-Governor at Belvedere. On Sunday the Prince and Princess will attend Divine Service at the Cathedral, afterwards proceeding by river to Barackpore and returning in the evening.

1ST JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—Although it was nearly midnight before the ceremonies connected with the levée terminated, His Royal Highness was early astir on Saturday morning, and at half past eight o'clock presented new colours to the King's Own Royal Lancaster Regiment. It was a dull heavy morning in marked contrast to the cloudless skies of Upper India. A bank of sombre grey vapour threatened rain and a jagged rent torn by the sun only exaggerated the pressure of the atmosphere. The scene of the ceremony was the oblong stretch of turf enclosed in the venerable walls of Fort William, which is known as Dalhousie Square. It made an effective spectacle as His Royal Highness rode on to the ground. On the one side were the barracks with their unfailing British mark. Then the smooth lawn-like ground ringed with trees and walked with spectators. In the centre the long line of scarlet and blue and khaki. With the Prince there rode the Commander-in-Chief, erect and soldierly, and the youngest General in the British Army, Sir Archibald Hunter, who came to see his old regiment, the King's Own, receive their new colours from the King-Emperor's eldest son.

Of the ceremony accompanying the presentation of colours nothing new can be said that is worth the saying. But although the routine is so familiar one can never tire of its simple dignity and quiet earnestness. And so it was everyone watched, as intently as if the scene were entirely novel, the old colours played round to the tune of Auld Lang Syne, the line break up and form into a hollow square.

The Prince, General Officers, and their staffs were at the opening of the square, mounted. Immediately after the new colours were brought in a gap was made in the square, and the Cathedral choir, in surplices, and wearing college caps, led by Mr. Slater, F.R.C.O., marched in. The Bishop of Calcutta then approached, attended by his chaplain and Archdeacon Saunders Dyer. The singing was conducted by Mr. Slater, accompanied by the King's Own Band, under the direction of Bandmaster Tyrrell. The hymn "Brightly gleams our Banner," in which the choir and the regiment were accompanied by the regimental Band, preceded the recital by the Bishop of the Lord's Prayer and the Prayer for the King, and then the act of consecration followed. Laying his hands upon the colours the Bishop said, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, we do dedicate and set apart these colours, that they may be a sign of our duty towards our King and Country in the sight of God. Amen." A prayer for the regiment and the Benediction, pronounced by the Bishop turning to each side of the square and finally towards the group of Royalty and distinguished persons, concluded the consecration. The new Colours were then handed to the Prince by Major T. C. F. Somerville (King's Colours) and Major W. Houghton (Regimental Colours), the same being received back by Lieutenant O. M. Conran and Lieutenant J. M. Young, respectively, both officers kneeling to receive them.

The following is the Prince of Wales's speech:—

"Colonel Carter, Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and men of the King's Own Royal Lancaster Regiment,—I consider it a great privilege to be associated with a Regiment on such an important occasion in the history of its life as when, by the Sovereign's permission, it receives new Colours. And there is an additional satisfaction to me in performing this ceremony in the fact that my dear father the King is your Colonel-in-Chief, and also that your Regiment, since the time of its formation more than 220 years ago, has earned a splendid record of services in all the great campaigns in which our Army has taken part.

"The names of those campaigns emblazoned on the colours of your Regiment testify to the gallant deeds of those who have gone before you. And I feel certain in committing these new colours to your keeping you will not only maintain the grand traditions of which they are the emblem, but, should opportunity occur, add to them fresh titles of distinction and honour."

On behalf of the Regiment Colonel Carter replied:—

Your Royal Highness,—The gracious act which you have just performed is one of many with which The King's Own Regiment has been honoured at the hands of your illustrious House. It is an interesting coincidence that just 100 years ago this year both battalions of the Regiment were reviewed at Dover by the then Prince of Wales, afterwards King George IV. On four previous occasions have Colours been presented to the Regiment by Your Royal Highness's ancestors; the last occasion being in 1878, when the Colours now borne by our second battalion were presented at Windsor Castle by her late Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, and I am now the only officer still serving in the Regiment who was present on that occasion. More recently, about three years ago while quartered at Malta, His Majesty the King conferred on the Regiment the almost unique distinction, to which Your Royal Highness has so graciously referred, of appointing himself our Colonel-in-Chief, and of which we are justly proud. On behalf of all ranks of the King's Own Regiment, I thank you from my heart for the honour you have done us to-day, and for your gracious words, and I can assure Your Royal Highness that it will be the earnest endeavour of every officer, non-commissioned officer, and man who in the future is fortunate enough to serve under these Colours, to maintain the high reputation always hitherto borne by the Regiment, both in peace and war, and to prove himself worthy of our very proud title—The King's Own.

The ceremony was now over. His Royal Highness and His Staff rode off, followed by the Commander-in-Chief and the assembly melted away in a few minutes.

The King's Own Regiment is one of the most distinguished and old in the entire British Army. Its history has been a varied and honourable one from the day on which it landed in Tangier, two hundred and fifty years ago, when only four months in existence, until the present time when it can with justifiable pride point to the great military triumphs of the Empire to which it has so gallantly contributed to its share of the victories."

Briefly the history of the Regiment is as follows:—It was raised in the year 1680 and, as originally constituted, consisted of sixteen companies, each of sixty-five men. The then Earl of Plymouth became its first Colonel and he was succeeded by Lieutenant-Colonel Kirke. Strangely enough, of the whole strength of the regiment eight companies were raised in and about London, and eight from the West of England, principally from the vicinity of Exeter, where the corps for a long time was known as the "Exeter Guards." The first official name bestowed on the regiment was "The Second Tangier Regiment" and within the short period of four months from its formation the corps was in Tangier on active service. In 1684 the corps returned to England. Its personnel was reduced to twelve companies, and it acquired the name of "The Duchess of York and Albany's Regiment." In the year following the Duchess of York became Queen, and the regiment was promoted with its patroness and became the "Queen's Regiment of Foot." In 1703 the character of its service was changed and it became a corps of Marines, but still retained its connection with the Royal house, being known as the "Queen's Marines" and, as such, played a distinguished and gallant part at the capture and defence of Gibraltar. In 1710 the corps' connection with the navy ceased, and five years later, being then stationed at the royal borough of Windsor, it received from King George I. the proud name of "The King's Own" which it has retained ever since. In about 1881, when the system of connecting regiments with certain countries and towns was established, the "King's Own" was allotted to Lancaster, and to the designation already existing was added the alternative name of "Royal Lancaster Regiment."

The service of the corps has been gallant and proud and bears the name of the following victories, namely:—Corunna (1809), Peninsula (1810-1814), Badajos (1812), Salamanca (1812), Victoria (1813), Nives (1813), Bladensburg (1814), Waterloo (1815) Alma (1854), Inkerman (1854), Sevastopol (1854-1855), Abyssinia (1868), South Africa (1878-1879), South Africa (1899-1902), and the Relief of Ladysmith, but, as it does not appear to have been the custom until the beginning of the last century to record war services in this manner, it can be well understood that the victories mentioned do not represent all the services of the regiment, and that some of its hardest and most gallant services are unrecorded on its banner. The regimental badge is the Lion of England, and tradition has it that it was bestowed by William III, on his accession, in token of the corps' attachment to his person and Government. This badge is a remarkable distinction inasmuch as it is worn by no other regiment in the service. The old regimental colour, now faded and worn by the stress of long and honourable service, is of royal blue, and in the top corner nearest the colour-pole is a miniature Union Jack. In the centre is the Royal Cypher within the Garter, the scroll of which bears the well-known "Honi soit qui maly pense." The scroll encircles the Cypher and is surmounted by the Crown of England, and a wreath composed of the rose, thistle and shamrock surrounds all the emblems. Inscriptions of the victories in which the corps has played a part are also set out more or less conspicuously. The original regimental colour is now kept in the Town Hall at Exeter, where was the first home of the regiment. In 1884 an attempt was made to induce its present custodian to hand it over to the parish church at Lancaster. So great, however, is the pride taken by the Exeter people in the glorious traditions of the regiment first raised in and about their city, that the Mayor of Exeter declined to accede to the request. Not the least of the honours showered in the corps was the assumption of the Colonel-in-Chief by His Majesty the King, and in its Colonel, General Sir W. C. Cameron, the corps has another distinguished soldier.

The King's Own Regiment arrived in Calcutta from Malta in 1903, and has during its stay here won a deservedly high place in the popular esteem. In the piping days of peace, when no call is made on the devotion of our armed forces, demands of a more peaceful character are invariably imposed. With the King's Own these have been by way of sport and hospitality. Their achievements in the many sporting ventures of last two years are still fresh in the memory of all sportsmen. Their successes in Association Football include the winning of the Walter Locke, Sarma, Gladstone, Indian Park and a host of other Cups making a total of over a score. Their sensational capture of the Rugby Challenge Cup in 1904 is not likely to be forgotten. The general bearing and conduct of the men in Calcutta have been admirable, and the regiment has won an unusually large measure of respect from the citizens of this city. A few months hence will witness the departure of the corps to Burma, and the Northumberland Fusiliers, who succeed them, will have an arduous task to rival the great reputation won by the King's Own during their stay of two years in our midst.

Englishman.—Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, accompanied by Lady Minto, Colonel Crooke Lawless, Secretary of the Dufferin Fund, and Lord Francis Scott, A.D.C., paid a visit to the Victoria Dufferin Hospital on Saturday morning. Lady Fraser and a few ladies of the Bengal Committee received Her Royal Highness and the party were shown round the wards by Miss Meakin, the lady doctor in charge of the hospital. Though no announcement of the visit had appeared, the road was lined with Indian spectators, who clapped loudly as the carriage drove past.

Ground adjoining the hospital has been taken up to enable the premises to be extended but funds are still required for the buildings. The new ground is to enable the erection of bungalows with separate entrances to which Indian gentlemen of high caste can take members of their families for medical treatment in what will be, practically, private houses.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales attended Divine Service at St. Paul's Cathedral yesterday morning at 10-30. The church was filled to its utmost capacity, but owing to the excellent arrangement made by the Rev. Canon Luckman and the vestry, there was no overcrowding or confusion, and the immense congregation were all seated at 10-15, at which hour the gates of the Cathedral precinct were closed to the public. Their Royal Highnesses arrived a minute or two before 10-30, accompanied by Sir Walter Lawrence, and were received at the south-west door of the Cathedral by the Rev. Canon Luckman and the Rev. W. H. Drawbridge, and also by Mr. L. P. Pugh and Mr. W. Parsons, the senior members of the vestry, who conducted them to their seats in the Canon's stalls, near the Bishop's throne. His Excellency the Viceroy and Lady Minto, His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Fraser, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, the Hon'ble the Chief Justice of Bengal, His Excellency the Naval Commander-in-Chief of the East Indian Squadron, Admiral Poe, Lieutenant-General Sir Alfred Gaslee, commanding the Eastern Division, were also present with a large number of civil and military officers. The Service was intoned by the Rev. Canon Luckman, the lessons being read by the Rev. W. H. Drawbridge, and the Lord Bishop of the Diocese preached an impressive sermon from the text "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy", Revelation XIX, 10. The service was the ordinary Matins for the Sunday after Christmas Day, Hymn 62 A. and M., "While shepherds watch their flocks by night," being sung as a Processional. The Te Deum specially composed by Mr. E. Slater, F.R.C.O., the Cathedral organist, and sung for the first time on Christmas Day was magnificently rendered by the choir with band accompaniment (under the baton of Mr. Kelway Bamber, A.T.C.L.), as was also the Anthem from the Messiah, the solo "Comfort ye My People", being sung by Mr. Cyril Davies, and the chorus "Then unto us a Child is born," rendered by the choir with great power and expression. "O come all ye faithful," Hymn 59 A. and M., was sung before the sermon, and "Hark the herald angels sing" Hymn 60 A. and M. during the collection. Immediately after the benediction, which was pronounced by the Bishop, the first verse of the National Anthem was sung by the choir accompanied by the band. The collection was for the Calcutta Free School, and amounted to Rs. 789. The preparation for what was a truly splendid and devotional service involved an immense amount of work, which was however cheerfully and enthusiastically undertaken by all connected with the Cathedral, including clergy, organist, choir and organ, and Canon Luckman may be heartily congratulated on the success of his arrangement. The opening voluntary played by Mr. Slater was the March from Burnaby's Rebekah, played by organ and orchestra, and an original composition of Mr. Slater's. The concluding voluntaries were Fugue in G. Minor (Bach) and March (Lemmen).

The sermon was as follows:—

Taking his text from Rev. XIX, 10, "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy," His Lordship the Metropolitan, said:—

"Our Blessed Lord and Saviour, when he was eight days' old, not only accepted from earthly parents, as to-day's Gospel tells us, the human Name that we love, but also became, for our sakes, obedient to the law. In lowly submission, the Redeemer of mankind began His course. And for us while the ending of another year calls us to take account of our own lives; to look back and forward and to ask ourselves in what spirit we are living and what our life is worth, the festival of the Circumcision of Christ reminds us, how the Cross must be stamped on every human life, that is to be worthy of what Jesus has made of man. Guided thus by the Church I offer you, as a motto for the coming year, these words of an angel: The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. I understand the words, in their application to conduct, as meaning this: A life devoted to bearing witness for years. is a life inspired and lifted above the common levels of this world.

"Do you desire insight into the divine purposes which lie beneath the surface of human life, and an inspiration that shall carry you along in harmony with those divine purposes, and that shall make you master of your fate, as the world calls it,—master, that is, of the facilities and opportunities which God has put in your trust, and of their issues? Do you wish to see things as God sees them, and to move among them as one who treads the ways of God? Then seek your inspiration in the witness of Jesus. That is the only sound and enduring condition of such an exalted life. Let this be your one aim—to witness to; then you will walk on high, above the world's mist, breathing heavenly air, and filled through and through like a cloud with the light of truth.

"These words: The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" might fairly be called the keynote of the Book of the Revelation of St. John.

"The early Christians in the midst of persecutions, lived and died bearing witness to Jesus. The expression, 'The testimony of Jesus' sums up their life: They were shut out from most of the opportunities and the interests, which occupied other men: the unseen world was far more to them than the world they could see. They were looking for the coming of the Lord, and so there was given to them,—to the Church as a whole and to many individuals in it,—a spirit of insight into heavenly things. God spoke to them: His purposes were often disclosed to them: revelations were made to them, sometimes of what was to be in the future, sometimes of what underlay the present visions flashed on them, and music came to their ears, from the glory, in which their brethren who had already died for the testimony of Jesus, were dwelling with God. The spirit of prophecy inspired them. It is from those times, that the Book of the Revelation of St. John has been handed down to us, by the Providence of God the Holy Ghost, a record of the visions, by which the Great Apostle was guided to encourage and to warn the suffering churches; drawing aside the veil, here and there, and in part from the scenes of spiritual conflict, of Divine Love and Divine Wrath, of tribulation and of glory.

"We may be unable,—certainly without special study we must be unable—to read, by the light of those fiery flashes, a chapter of definite history or of definite prediction; we may be unable to interpret with any security that splendid symbolism, but thus much no student of the Apocalypse can fail to realize, impressed with power upon his heart, that outward circumstances and events are but the faint expression of eternal realities, that all life and history burns with vision and prophecy, for those who hold the testimony of Jesus. Behind all, and at the centre of all, He stands: the One Lord of the ages. Those who belong to Him, have in their hands the key of all. Jesus is the One Interpreter of the World's movement; and for those who suffer with him and for Him, the march of the World is the march of their battle; a march blood-stained and interrupted, yet glorious and sure, and ringing with anthems of eternal triumph.

"Those were days when the witness, which the martyrs bore to Jesus, was fiery and intense; and when the glow of prophetic inspiration was intense too. We live in safer times and duller. But it is still true that if there is to be in our lives any inspiration, the condition for it is, the testimony of Jesus.

"Just as in these safer days there is still, for all Christ's people, a witness to be borne to Him, so also in these duller days there is a spirit of prophecy. The word of Joel, applied in the day Pentecost by St. Peter, expressly promise to all believer a share of inspiration. It is of Christians in general that St. Paul says that God hath revealed to us through His Spirit the things which eye hath not seen. It is claimed by St. John, as the sure proof of a Christian's title, that God has given him of His Spirit.

"I am entitled therefore to apply not now to the exceptional but to the normal inspiration—the word which the angel of the Revelation spoke to St. John. There is still such a thing as witnessing for Jesus: there is still such a thing as an inspired life.

"What it means, for a man, in certain moments of enthusiasm or of crises, to be lifted up above all narrow and all selfish considerations, and to look straight at great principles, and see the plain, grand lines of simple duty, or the bold form of a great purpose, standing out clear against the sky,—what this means, we know well; and we rightly think of it as inspiration: God's Spirit is on the man, and for the time he is a prophet. Such is that Happy Warrior, whom Wordsworth described:

"Who, if he be called upon to face

Some awful moment, to which Heaven has joined

Great issues good or bad for human kind,

Is happy as a Lover: and attired

With sudden brightness, like a Man inspired.

"To many, perhaps, to every man at some time or other, God grants a revelation; God opens upon the man's mind a vision as it were, of His own purpose; His plans for the blessing of mankind, or, it may be, for the man's own career. Then, such a man sees, at least for a moment what he ought to be, what he may be, what God made him for: he sees something of what God has in mind for the work in which he himself has been called to take part; he sees the great possibilities that lie before his own faithful discharge of duty, the wide and solid good that he may do for his fellowmen,—then, his heart is stirred, and dwells within him, not with pride but with awe, and with a certain sublime delight he is a prophet; and God is calling him, and unrolling before his conscience the scroll of the Divine Will and of his own opportunity. There are the inspirations by means of which, if we are true to them, God sets us—as the Psalmist has it—on our high places: the high places for which he made us, and which are our own; but which we can so easily decline.

"Oh! let us strive and pray, dear brethren, to live up to the level of our moments of inspiration! This we cannot do by virtue of anything that comes of self or of pride; those forces are soon spent: they die when the glow fades and the nerves are tried. The higher levels cannot be long held, except by lowly keeping near the cross; by the mind that was in Christ Jesus; by a temper subdued and made conformable to His Death.

"Happy are those in whom the Blessed Spirit so abides that by His Holy inspiration they think these things that be good and by His merciful guiding perform the same, not on the splendid stage of some day of crisis, or in the efforts or a short lived enthusiasm, but through the long hours of daily monotonous work, and unnoticed services of love! When shall we look for an example of life maintained on these high places? We have seen it in a sister in our hospitals; patient, cheerful, full of hope: day after day, week after week, year after year, she toils on,—not mechanically, but with ardour ever fresh and buoyant. We have seen it in the soldier, as gentle as he is brave; as keen and indomitable in work among his poor London boys, are when he leads the charge against the enemies of civilization. We have seen it in the Statesman, carrying into every duty the fire of a prophet-soul, through a long life of chivalrous activity, for his country, for the oppressed, for the poor. I speak of types: thank God, the instances are not few.

"And if we asked any one of these, what have you been doing? is it not certain that he would reply: "I have been trying to witness for Jesus? They are witnesses to the Incarnation, inspired by the conviction, that Jesus Christ, in becoming Man, has brought to human life such a value and capacity that no effort spent upon it can be too great. That man can cherish aims and hopes above the ordinary, who believes that the Son of God has taken human nature and has raised it to the Right Hand of God. Such a believer has an insight into the value and capacity of his own powers and opportunities, and into the meaning of the events which occur to him or surround him,—an insight which is prophetic. He finds God in it: all God's way are plain to Him in it. He is admitted to God's counsels; and when he turns to commune with his brother men, he comes to them as a prophet from God. If his testimony is not merely of the lips but of the life; if he so behaves himself as to show that God is in him of a truth,—then he is indeed a prophet; he lays open the secrets of God to men, and speaks to men in the Name of the Lord.

What is there that can so inspire a man, as the assurance that God is with us? He believes with all his heart that he has for his Elder Brother the Son of God. He looks up to the unapproachable throne of the Creator, and there he sees, standing ready to succour those who call on Him, the Son of Man. Then it is no wonder, if those who look upon that man's face see it as the face of an angel. But our witness must be first hand.' The only true witness for Jesus is he who can say, 'Not only have I been taught that Jesus died for all men, but I know, by my own experience, that he died for me.'

"To such a man, to work for his fellowmen, is to go about with Jesus. He brings the forces of that Divine Humanity to bear upon the sick or the discouraged, or on the fallen;—even on the desperate. When you go to these, the sad or the despairing so strong is your witness for Jesus that it shines out from you, and sounds in every tone of your voice, and is proved by everything you do, that Jesus is no dead Teacher, but alive and at hand; quick with human sympathy and with life-giving power, when by your touch the living Jesus touches sick souls,—then you are indeed a prophet,—greater than the prophets: the least, who so wields the forces of the Kingdom of Heaven, is greater than them all.

"But those words, 'the testimony of Jesus' referred in St. John's lips chiefly to suffering: the Christian 'witness' is martyrdom, means, if not outward death, yet being crucified with Christ, and ever bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus.

"Now this is a great thing: and there is serious danger of our putting it from us, not as not being noble, but as being beyond our hope. We are tempted to say: 'We are not called to such great things, nor made for them;' and so to remain content without any inspiration at all to silence the prophetic voice, with which—if we will attend to it—our conscience does speak. But this would be to despair of ourselves and of our Saviour. Be sure that every life has in it, both the witness of Jesus and the spirit of prophecy. What is seen on a great scale, or in brilliant colours, in the heroes and the martyrs, has its place, the same principle holds good—in every heart that is at all touched by Christianity.

"If indeed there be a life quite uninfluenced by the Cross,—with nothing in it of self-denial or self-restraint, and no such sorrow for sin as breeds a true effort after amendment,—there, perhaps, it is possible there may be no inspiration. But in proportion, as the Cross is admitted, the Spirit that elevates and inspires is there. And there is no condition of life that can do without the Cross, or that can be without it except by refusing it.

"As the years of our life pass by,—whether they pass like morning hours opening in the brilliant midday of opportunity, or are drawing in towards evening and the night when no man can work,—let us see to it that our witness to Jesus is becoming year by year more clear and bold, and unmistakable, and more completely embodied in our conduct. Plan out your life as one who is not without law, but under law to Christ. Set His Cross before you, and each day take up your own,—the Cross which He assigns to you and which your conscience recognises as your own. Then, as surely as his mark is on you, so surely His Spirit will be in you. Your career of duty may be grand, or it may be insignificant; cast in influence, or shut into the narrowest existence of humble service; but, in either case, your path will be touched with an unearthly glory; it will open again and again on the eternal world; heavenly voices will come out to you from near the throne. And to your fellowmen you will be a prophet, helping to keep up the courage of God's people,—your brethren and companion in the tribulation and kingdom and patience which are in Jesus;—till the Lord comes."

Pioneer.—CALCUTTA, 30th December.—The Prince of Wales presented new colours to the King's Own Regiment at Fort William this morning.

The Battalion assembled on the Dalhousie Parade Ground, a large number of military and civilian spectators being present. His Royal Highness was met at Plassey Gate by the Commander-in-Chief and his staff, together with Brigadier-General Sir Ronald Macdonald, commanding the Presidency Brigade. General Sir Archibald Hunter was also on the ground, as the King's Own is his old regiment. The ceremony was the same as that at Indore when the Prince presented colours to the York and Lancaster Regiment last month. The Bishop of Calcutta blessed the colours.

Between ten and eleven o'clock the Prince arrived on the polo ground to witness a match between a Calcutta team and the Imperial Cadets. He enjoyed the game thoroughly, but was seriously concerned when an accident happened to the Maharaja of Cooch Behar, whose pony came down. The Maharaja was stunned, and had to be carried off the ground in a dhoolie. He has, however, sustained no grave injury, though he is suffering from concussion due to the fall. The polo match was a close one, the Cadets being just beaten.

The Princess of Wales visited the Victoria Dufferin Hospital this morning, accompanied by Lady Minto, Colonel Crooke-Lawless, Honorary Secretary, Dufferin Fund, and Lord Francis Scott, A.-D.-C. The party were met by Lady Fraser and a few ladies of the Bengal Provincial Committee, and Her Royal Highness was shown over the hospital by Miss Meakin, the lady doctor in charge.

This afternoon the Prince and Princess attended the races in order to see the race for the cup presented by His Royal Highness. There was a very large attendance in the enclosure, Calcutta society and visitors being in full force. The Viceroy and Lady Minto, with their two daughters and a party from Government House drove up in State under escort of a body-guard, at a quarter to three, while Lord Kitchener, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir Francis Maclean, Sir Alfred Gaselee, Sir E. Locke-Elliott and other persons of official distinction were present.

At three o'clock the Prince and Princess arrived, driving down the course from the well-known Big Tree. There was an enormous crowd of natives on the maidan, who flocked to the races to see the Royal carriages pass escorted by a detachment of the 15th Hussars. On arrival at the Grand Stand their Royal Highnesses were most heartily cheered. They were in time to see the Chowringhee Cup as well as the big race of the day. As regards the latter expert opinion was strangely divided, Great Scot's chances were held to be best, it was certain the race would be run at a greater pace than that for the Viceroy's Cup, and he was reported to be very fit. He was accordingly backed in the morning at four to one and even more for a place. At the betting list in the afternoon his price had shortened to threes, Long Tom and Munderah, their Royal Highnesses were most heartily cheered. They were in time to see the Chowringhee Cup as well as the big race of the day. As regards the latter expert opinion was strangely divided, Great Scot's chances were held to be best, it was certain the race would be run at a greater pace than that for the Viceroy's Cup, and he was reported to be very fit. He was accordingly backed in the morning at four to one and even more for a place. At the betting list in the afternoon his price had shortened to threes, Long Tom and Munderah, being at six to one. These were practically the starting prices. Long Tom did not command the public support that his performance in the Viceroy's Cup should have entitled him to, as he did not seem in quite such good form as on last Tuesday. The Maharaja of Mysore's Munderah was fairly well supported as it was believed he had improved considerably in the last four days. Among the light-weights Lieutenant Bill, and Rapid Pilgrim were most fancied.

In the parade before the Grand Stand Great Scot with Morrison up looked in splendid fettle, while Long Tom ridden by Robinson moved along quietly. In the preliminary canter Munderah, a very handsome brown, appeared in the pink of condition. The race was one round of the course, so the Royal party had an excellent view of the start. All got well away with the exception of Munderah, whose chances of winning were seriously impaired by the lengths which he then lost. The pace was made very fast at once by Lieutenant Bill, and the rest had to follow the lead thus given. Great Scot lay well up, but was never able to take the lead, and at the old stand Acetine began to close up with Long Tom, lying ready for his rush. As they worked round the bend into the straight, Long Tom came through. Prince Lyon and Great Scot stuck to him to the distance, but they could not hold their own, and he won in grand form just as in the race for the Viceroy's Cup. Acetine almost made a dead heat with Great Scot for third place. The time was 2 min. 52½ secs., and as Long Tom carried top weight, 9st 10lb, his performance was a very fine one and the win was most popular.

Dr. Spooner Hart, owner of the winner of the Prince of Wales Cup, was presented to the Prince who shook hands warmly with him and congratulated him on the success of his horse.

The Prince and Princess took their departure before the last race, and were again loudly cheered as they drove off the course. The Viceroy and Lady Minto stayed to the end, and were also cheered on their departure. The day's racing was good all through, and the quality of the horses and ponies was proved by the excellent times in several races. Thus the mile for the big ponies, 14-2 and under, was won by Blitz, carrying 10st. 4lb, in 1 min. 42½ secs. This was better than any time recorded for the Trial Stakes up to this year, though the Cup horses always run in the Trials. Dalkeith on 23rd December did the mile in 1 min. 41½ secs., but he was only carrying 9st. 3lb. This will be enough to show how good a pony Blitz is.

Rangoon Gazette.—Preparations which are being made at the Royal Lakes, and particularly on the lawn of the Boat Club, under the direction of Mr. Short, Secretary of the Municipality, for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, show that it is determined to make the occasion a thoroughly memorable one. Those who saw the illumination of the Lakes at the time of Lord Curzon's visit, both visitors and residents, were agreed that excellent use had been made of the natural advantages of the site for display. But the scheme for the Royal visit is on a much larger scale. The number of lights alone is fully three times as great, and use has been made of the experience gained on the previous occasion to improve the present display in many ways. For example it was found that many of the lights were blown out by the wind. The chance of that has been obviated by the adoption of a different-shaped lamp, larger in size, which has been made to the Municipal Secretary's special design. The old lamps called phoofs (blown), made in Calcutta, were fitted with wick and oil. The new ones, with a raised neck under which wire may be bound, will contain night lights. They are thrice as expensive as the old, but it has rightly been decided that lamps which may blow out are of little use. There are 200,000 of these small lamps. An equal number of night-lights to fit them, besides 25,000 carriage candles for Chinese lanterns, have been made and presented by the Burma Oil Company. Lamps will be hung all round the contour of the lake, some nine or ten miles. Besides this large number of small lamps there are some 50,000 of other sorts, to be placed in every advantageous position. Two beautiful makes have been obtained from Japan, one in the form of a lotus plant and flower, which will float on the water anchored to the bottom by means of a cord attached to a hook on the base; another in the shape of a chrysanthemum fitted on a spike to be stuck into the ground. There are also taller "comet" lamps in various colours. To hang the lamps round the lake and in other places there are twelve miles of telegraph wire and five miles of smaller wire; 50,000 nails of special design, with a hook at the end, to attach to trees and woodwork, 2,000 wire spikes for the ferneries, etc., and 2,000 yards of small chain for use in the "lantern shamiana." This last will be one of the most striking features in the illuminations. It is a shamiana the complete walls and roof of which will be composed of lanterns, erected on the tree-encircled plateau on the Boat Club lawn. Here the Royal visitors will be received by the Boat Club on their disembarking from the "Karaweik poung." The foundation and framework of the poung are completed, made by the Royal Engineers under the supervision of Captain Kelsall, R.E. It floats on 192 casks lent by the Burma Oil Company. The poung is to convey the Royal party, with the Lieutenant-Governor and Staff, Lady White and Miss White, Mr. and Mrs. Adamson, Mr. and Mrs. Hartnoll, Mr. J. Wilson, Mr. J. Short, Oo Po Tsee and Oo Paw Tun from the pavilion to the Boat Club lawn, after a little tour on the lake. On the pavilion side their Royal Highnesses will walk round the hill past the steps presented by Oo Ohn Ghine, C.I.E., to the pavilion where Mrs. Adamson, on behalf of the Reception Committee, will present the Princess with an album. The embarkation will be at the steps presented by Mr. Chin Tsong, and the disembarkation on the Boat Club side at the marble steps presented by Mr. Samuel Balthazar. The poung will be towed by seven racing canoes, each containing ten men, who will sing characteristic songs. These men are at present being trained in their duties.

It should be mentioned that the Pagoda is to come into the scheme of the illuminations: Bright light will be thrown from Barrack Hill, which lies between the Pagoda and the Lakes, on to the Pagoda itself. The installation of the light is the work of the Royal Engineers under Captain Kelsall.

We have already outlined the extensive scheme for illuminating the route from the Lakes to the Railway Station on the night of the Royal departure.

Finally all the many boats of the Boat Club have now been allotted by ballot to members who are busy planning schemes of illumination for their craft. Every boat must be illuminated but details have been left by the Committee to individual taste and fancy.

It is hazardous to prophesy before the event, but nothing that taste, forethought and hard work can suggest is being left undone to make the illuminations far and away the most complete and the most beautiful that Rangoon has ever seen.

The album which the Reception Committee is presenting is an exceptionally handsome one, and has been made and illuminated at home to the order and design of Messrs. Beato and Co., Ltd. It is about eighteen inches by twelve, bound in levant morocco, and mounted in gold, with the Prince of Wales' crest, also in gold. In the centre of the cover is a hand-painted enamel of a scene on the Lakes. The illuminated title page contains the inscription of presentation, and water-colour sketches. The album consists of 36 platino-types, most of them taken specially by the firm above-mentioned, the mountings pearl grey, illuminated in gold and red. It will be enclosed in a Burmese-carved teak casket.

2ND JANUARY 1906.

Indian Daily Telegraph.—The second game in first ties in the Bengal Polo Tournament was played off this day before a large gathering. His Royal Highness the Prince also being present. The teams engaged were the Imperial Cadet Corps, comprising Rao Rungonath Singh, Major Watson, the Nawab of Jaora and the Raja of Rutlam, back; and the Calcutta Polo Club "A" team comprising Captain Ashburner, Mr. C. Graham, the Rajkumar of Kuch Behar and the Maharaja of Kuch Behar, back. The play on both sides was of a very high class and elicited repeated applause. The issue was very open till almost at the end when the Polo Club got the goal which gave them the game. Up to three chakkars the score was one goal one subsidiary all, and the play was level in the fourth chakkar when an unfortunate accident occurred; the Maharaja of Kuch Behar's pony rolled over, giving his rider a heavy fall, and for a time, while the Maharaja lay helpless on the ground, it looked as if he was badly hurt. Later he came to, but was too much knocked out of time to get up and was taken home in an ambulance. Major Barnes took his place and the game was renewed with equal vigour, and at the conclusion of full time the Polo Club won by three goals one subsidiary to two goals two subsidiaries. When the accident occurred the Prince of Wales evinced great concern for the Maharaja and walked over to the spot where the Maharaja lay, surrounded by doctor and friends. Happily nothing serious has resulted, and later accounts are very satisfactory.

Morning Post.—We lunched at Landi Kotal; Afghanistan before us. Thence back through the stifling, dust-pestered pass, facing east once more, after our long westering, to dine at Peshawar and take up again our train journey. It was to carry us as far as Kala-ki-Serai, where, while the sky was still dark with stars, we were dragged from our slumbers, to be told of Armies bearing down upon us and about to meet at dawn; for it was to the country between Hasan Abdal and Rawal Pindi that the manoeuvres had been transferred, which, planned to take place at Delhi, had to be abandoned there for want of water. It had seemed inconceivable in the past four days during which we have been with the troops that any place could be drier than Kala-ki-Serai. It would be impossible to give an idea of the dust to those who can only think of it in terms of an island climate. It has been suffocating, abominable, pernicious, amazing, and exquisite. Every movement of troops has been betrayed by it, every movement shrouded. Cavalry became at once invisible when moving at the trot; at a walk often all that was left above the yellow clouds was the sparkle of their lances. Across the great flat plain, bounded by granite hills and snow-capped mountains, and scarred with dongas 40 feet deep and incredibly intricate, the dust, grey, mud-yellow, and black, fuming upwards from a hundred places, told, so far as a spectator could hope to see it, everything that was going on. To go nearer was to be involved in the fog yourself and to see nothing but the dim figures in front of you. It was dust so fine that it seemed to explode in smoke under the horses' feet, and so light that once lifted it floated in the air for hours. The men who marched through it were altered almost beyond recognition. Their eyebrows and lashes, hair, beards, and moustaches were clogged and grey; yellow drifts lay above their cheek-bones and changed the outline of their ears. The dust had caked on the hot dark faces till even the Moplahs and Multanis looked Eurasian.

Sikh, Gurkha, and Pathan were all of one colour, a smeared yellow-brown; even the crimson and scarlet, orange, green, and blue of lungis and cummerbands lost under a grey veil all sharpness of distinction. Looking at the queerly altered faces, altered so strikingly as to suggest a "make-up," one tried in vain to remember any picture of battle in these plains or other which had rendered the effect. Towards evening the dust raised by the various lines and columns covered the entire country in a pale mist 30 feet high. In that the thousands of transport camels, vaguely visible, line beyond line, with lifted noses, jolting slowly south, and the ghostly trail of their own dust about them looked like some lovely, wonderful frieze. Later the low sun turned the strange fog into a hot haze of orange, in which the dark shapes of men and beasts laboured and hastened as in some dreamy inferno; and later still the afterglow touched it with a delicate rose, and the young moon turned it to a gauze of silver, so that, exasperated almost past the sense of its defilement, one watched with a sort of resentful gratitude its hour of beauty.

Restricted to three days for the manœuvres Lord Kitchener decided in favour of attempting the solution of only tactical problems, so that with the strategical conditions fixed one's interest lay mainly in the work of the brigadiers. The first day opened with a shock of the opposing Cavalry, in which the Southern commander had the advantage, though as his objective was to delay the Northerners' advance, and as nothing but delay was considered possible, the means to that end seemed rather to be threat than action in which he risked his opportunity of further resistance. After that there was a slow forcing back of the Southern Infantry from the plain on which it had hurriedly entrenched itself to the shelter of the hills covering Rawal Pindi, where its final stand was to be made. The Northern leader, daring everything, threw his left and centre in a night attack against the unshaken front of this position while trying to turn it with his right. The night attack was as unsatisfactory as night attacks in practice usually are, but the Southern Army, being due at Pindi the following afternoon, cleared out at dawn from its trenches and fought a rearguard action for the better part of the day. The imperative artificiality of such exercise puts the greater part of them beyond criticism; the handling of the smaller units and the correlation of the greater being really all that one could profitably expect to study. The ground, where broken by dongas, was extremely difficult, but the men on the whole worked it intelligently, distances and direction were fairly well kept in the firing lines, but not so well by the supports. One noticed, too, that parade-ground tendency to execute movements irrespective of conditions, which one did not expect to find as prevalent here as at home. The men, for example, when checked by a donga, being kept exposed on their faces along the near side instead of being pushed in and across as rapidly as possible to the further bank, where perfect cover was to be obtained. Also, connection between the leading companies might have been more frequently re-established while the men were still sheltered by the donga, instead of when their advance across the open had been resumed.

But speaking generally the skirmishing work was well done; the best battalions being British; but the average in intelligence and execution was quite as high in the native regiments. More remained to be desired as one approached the higher commands. Within the brigades the battalions worked fairly well together, but the brigades gave no impression of combination to a common end. They seemed unaware of what support they were receiving from or were expected to extend to the rest of the division, and on the third day the two divisions of the Northern Army failed so plainly to consolidate their attacks that the Southern commander, had he been so minded—which probably his instructions did not permit—would have had ample time to deal with them in turn. But between the difficulty of the dust, one's ignorance of the ground, and our abrupt incursion into operations already begun and only extending over three days, one was not in a position seriously to criticise. One point, however, one could observe; the keenness, with very few exceptions, of all arms and the excellent condition of the men on their arrival in camp after much hard marching and fighting. A review of the fifty-five thousand troops engaged in the manœuvres occupied the fourth day. In review order the line, with the purple Marri Hills rising high behind it, was two and-a-half miles long, with both its flanks lost in the faint film of dust which drifted uncertainly about the plain, so that the line was at one moment a riband of colour and sparkling steel, and the next a fillet of gauzy grey along the foot of the hills.

The faintest breeze in any but the one direction would have spoilt the day with dust; even though acres of the plain along the saluting base had been sown, and was bright with green barley, and grass litter had been laid on acres more of it. But fortune was for once with those who deserved it. The air drifted the right way—happily for three days it had only drifted—the barley lasted through the first march past, and bhists, flung out like skirmishing fountains over it at every opportunity, kept the ground damp for the second; and so, though the men as they finally went by in mass of divisions came out of rolling clouds of dust, scarcely a taste of it came to the Royal party. It was a fine show: Sikh, Pathan, Dogra, Gurkha, Jat, Rajput, Moplah—no other nation could offer so varied a spectacle; no other, one fancies, could beat its Light Cavalry; no other certainly, could equal its galloping guns.

The marching was all it need be, and the men, British and Native alike, looked good enough for anything. Some of the Cavalry regiments could only manage a canter, and not a very creditable canter, after three days' manœuvring! Yet both men and horses looked fit enough. The divisions in mass were the most interesting part of it; the whole division—Infantry, Cavalry, and guns, pressed close together; nothing visible from above but caps, helmets, turbans, and twinkling bayonets. Such colour, such variety, and in the pale and swarthy faces such a range of character. Reviews are often boring and always too long; but this was neither. A long avenue of trees that would have seemed fine in any English park led up the centre of the Commander-in-Chief's camp near Pindi, close to which the review was held. A red road had been laid up the avenue, and another at right angles across the top of it, and about this were tiled beds, acres there must have been of them, green with mustard and cress—since there had been no time to grow grass or barley—and beyond the green gardens, each with a path that led to it, tents with four rooms and passages and mahogany furniture and a dozen doors. There was a round place laid out with palms and brass guns before the Royal shamiana, and another in the centre of the long avenue which was lit at night by violent arc lamps hung from the branches, an engine supplying electricity to the camp. For months the camp must have been preparing; for two days it was occupied; in a few more the tents had vanished; and the paths and palms and the green gardens; there was nothing left but the dusty waste out of which it had sprung.—(H. F. PROVOST BATTERSBY.)

Times of India.—Old residents of Calcutta have attempted to gauge the number of people who lined the route to welcome the Prince and Princess of Wales on Friday. Some put it at two lakhs, some at three. The task is well nigh impossible far, although the drive from Prinsep's Ghat to Government House is a short one, there were tens of thousands of patient spectators on the river banks. But there is a consensus of opinion that the crowds who thronged the Ellenborough Course, over the maidan, the Red Road, and the narrower thoroughfares near Government House, were denser than any previously known in the history of Calcutta, and that certainly not less than a quarter of a million people were in the streets. Also that, although, the Bengali is not given to vocal expression of his satisfaction there were on every hand indications of pleasure in the occasion and of a quietly respectful welcome of the Royal visitors.

Perhaps a better indication of the interest of Calcutta in the visit was afforded this morning by the Proclamation Parade. Their Royal Highnesses had three times passed in state through the principal streets, and the occasion had none of the charm of novelty. Yet from soon after daybreak all Calcutta seemed to be converging on the maidan, and long before the Prince and Princess were due, the road was only kept open by the incessant activity of the police. Near the Royal Standard the morning throng coalesced into a troubled sea of oiled, black heads, which rippled with movement like sands behind the receding wave. Mingling with the crush it was possible to meter more accurately than by any other means the attitude of the people toward the Royal visit. In this way one found in Calcutta precisely what was discerned in all other cities in British India, except that a cheerful placidity of the Northern Capitals was replaced by a certain nervous excitement. There were the same chattering wait, the same tense moments, as the cortège approached; the same concentration as Their Royal Highnesses passed, and irresistible surging into the road the moment the last file of the escort clattered by. And everywhere, curiously enough, one finds anxious puzzled inquiry as to who amongst the glittering cavalcade are the Prince and Princess whom all have come to see.

The opulent spaciousness of the Calcutta maidan adapts itself admirably to such ceremonies as were witnessed this morning. The great assemblage, so far from embarrassing the parade, only provided it with a more appropriate setting. The long line of troops was the diameter of a giant circle of boscage, of the proud buildings of Chowringhee, and of the vari-coloured spectators. The parade followed the time-honoured procedure. An inspection of the line by His Royal Highness, who was accompanied by the Viceroy and the Commander-in-Chief, a corrugating "feu-de-joie" in the intervals of the Royal salute, and a march past. Even at such purely military events, and in such a military country as India, the halt in the fibre of all Anglo-Saxons effloresces. In the gallant array which marched in review, Horse Artillery, well mounted, Volunteers and sturdy Infantry, none had so warm a reception, and none were so intently studied, as the Blue-jackets and Marines of the Hyacinth and Perseus as they saluted the Sailor Prince.

In the afternoon Her Royal Highness held a Purdah party at Belvedere, the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor. There were also the usual races at Tollygunge, at which it was hoped His Royal Highness might be present, but the Prince paid an informal visit to His Highness the Aga Khan, at his residence in Elysium Road. Tollygunge Club and Course are possessions which make dwellers in less favoured cities envious of Calcutta. Whilst within easy drive, and still more accessible by the electric tram, they have the verdant beauty and restfulness of the English country-side. At the steeplechases, except for a suggestion of the Howrah smoke-cloud, one might have been hundreds of miles from a great city. The eye rested upon nothing but a sweep of grateful turf, on palms, and trees, on smooth lawns, and cheerful people. Apart from the palms the only suggestion of the East came from the close-packed Bengalis in the centre of the course, whose bright shawls, flecking their white garments with colour, only added to the attractiveness of the landscape. The racing was good and free from any serious accident. The hospitality of the Turf Club was agreeably dispensed, and the meeting yielded a delightfully reposeful interlude after the bustle of the last few days. So evidently thought Lord Minto and his daughters, who were pleased spectators of the events. The evening closed with a State dinner at Government House.

As the Darjeeling trip has been abandoned, Their Royal Highnesses will spend the week end at Barrackpur, leaving for Burma on Tuesday according to the original programme.

A "Gazette of India" Extraordinary issued here to-night states that the Viceroy and Governor-General in Council has the highest gratification in announcing that in commemoration of the visit to India of General His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, His Majesty the King-Emperor has been graciously pleased to honour the following Regiments by conferring on them the title of King Edward's Own, with permission to wear on their colours and appointments His Majesty's Royal Cypher:—6th Prince of Wales' Cavalry, 11th Prince of Wales' Own Lancers (Probyn's Horse), 102nd Prince of Wales' Own Grenadiers, 2nd Prince of Wales' Own Gurkha Rifles (the Sirmoor Rifles). His Majesty the King-Emperor has also been graciously pleased to appoint General His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to be Colonel-in-Chief of the following Regiments, and has conferred on them the honour of being designated "Prince of Wales' Own," with permission to wear on their colours and appointments the Prince of Wales 25 Plumes:—18th Tiwana Lancers, 26th Light Cavalry, 38th and 39th Central India Horse, 1st Sappers and Miners, 14th Ferozepore Sikhs, 61st Pioneers, 130th Baluchis and the 1st Gurkha Rifles (the Malaun Regiment).

The military rehearsal of their duties as escorts, guards of honour, lining roads, etc., during the Royal visit takes place on Wednesday morning and on the morning following. The Carabiniers rehearse the ceremony for presentation of a new Standard to that regiment by the Prince of Wales on February 6th. The Bishop of Madras, assisted by local Anglican clergy and a choir, will consecrate the Standard and the ceremony takes place in a semi-private manner in the Barrack Square of the 6th Dragoon Guards.

Two herds of elephants have been encircled for a Khedda drive for the Prince in the Mysore forests, where a splendid camp has been pitched on a specially selected site.

There is a report, however, that His Royal Highness will just motor from Mysore City to the Khedda, a distance of 43 miles, and return in the evening after witnessing the drive, the object being not to spend a night in the malarial jungle. The marble statue of late Queen, which the Prince is to unveil on February 5 has been placed on a pedestal and is a unique piece of workmanship, a replica in fact of that erected at Winchester and by the same sculptor.

3RD JANUARY 1906.

Indian Daily News.—Calcutta distinguished itself in the extraordinary entertainment which was offered to Their Royal Highnesses yesterday afternoon. Whatever else may be said about it there is no doubt it was unique, at least in its composite character. The items which made up the programme were not novel and were of a kind in which interest soon fades, but if there was little allurements about them, there was compensation in the setting and in the vast gathering which greeted Their Royal Highnesses. The entertainment took place in a great amphitheatre constructed on the maidan. From the central pavilion the galleries extended in the shape of a horse shoe. Hindu temple domes covered with gold foil rose over the centre of the pavilion and the gleaming cream wings were ornamented with other domes. Pale blue, and cau-de-nil draperies set off the facade of each gallery space, all of which were early crowded with representatives of every community in the city. The scarlet dais under the central dome was covered with a canopy of scarlet and gold decorated with the Prince's plumes. The ground in front of the dais was occupied by a prepared arena and by a band stand where the bands of the 15th Hussars, the King's Own, and the 2nd Staffordshire Regiment were massed. Beyond the arena was a great choir of school children, and a vast throng occupied other parts of the maidan. There had been rain in the early morning and the afternoon was dull, but even so the colour revealed itself in the great assembly within the galleried spaces of the pavilion. About the dais there was a brave show of Star of India, blue, purple and rose pink in the costumes of leading members of the reception committee, and a band of native musicians with yellow puggrees lightened the foreground, while beyond them again was the bright red of the massed military bands. A little before Their Royal Highnesses were due to arrive, the sun pierced the clouds and the gold hued domes and the scarlet of the arena were lightened into splendour. Escorted by the Calcutta Light Horse and the Imperial Cadet Corps the Prince and Princess reached the entrance to the ground by half-past four. They had been waited upon at Government House by two members of the Reception Committee, the Hon'ble Asif Kadr Saiyad Wasif Ali Mirza of Murshidabad and the Maharaja Kumar Prodyot Kumar Tagore who conducted them to the place of entertainment. The school children sang "God Bless the Prince of Wales" as Their Royal Highnesses entered, and as they drove to the dais they were received with repeated enthusiastic cheering. The Lieutenant-Governor greeted them at the foot of the dais and presented the Maharaja of Dharbanga, the President of the Reception Committee, who, after conducting the Prince and Princess to the dais and after the massed bands had played "God Bless the Prince of Wales," presented the members of the Reception Committee. These were Maharaja-Dhiraj Bejoy Chand Methab Bahadur of Burdwan; Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohan Tagore Bahadur, K.C.S.I.; Maharaj Sir Raveneshwar Pershad Singh Bahadur, K.C.I.E., of Gidhour; Hon'ble Nawab Khwaja Salimulla Bahadur of Dacca; Maharaja Girija Nath Roy of Dinajpur; Raja Peary Mohun Mukerjee, C.S.I.; the Hon'ble Raja Ban Bihari Kapur, C.S.I.; Maharaja Sir Harbailab Narayan Singh, K.C.I.E., of Sonbursa; Colonel His Highness Maharaja Sir Nripendra Narain Bhup Bahadur, G.C.I.E., C.B., A.-D.-C. of Cooch Behar; His Highness Raja Radha Kishore Deb Barman Manikya of Hill Tippera; His Highness Maharaja Sri Ram Chandra Bhunji Deo of Mourbhunj; Maharaja Jagadindra Nath Roy of Natore; Maharaja Manindra Chandra Nandy of Cossimbazar; Maharaja Surya Kant Acharya of Mymensingh; Sir Gurudass Banerjee; Raja Ranjit Sinha Bahadur of Nashipur; Raja Baikuntha Nath Dey Bahadur of Balasoro; Raja Promada Nath Roy of Digapatin; Nawab Saiyid Amir Hossein Bahadur, C.I.E.; Maharaj Kumar Guru Mahadevasram Prasad Sahi of Hutwa; Raja Binaya Krishna Deb of Sobhabazar; Mr. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Khan Bahadur; Mr. R. D. Mehta, C.I.E.; Mr. R. H. M. Rustomjee; the Hon'ble Mr. A. A. Apear; Sir Patrick Playfair, C.I.E.; Mr. W. T. Grice; Mr. W. C. Madge; Mr. W. Banks-Gwyther; Rai Bahadur Hurry Ram Ganka; Babu Damodar Dass Burman; Babu Manmatha Nath Roy Chaudhari of Santosh; Mr. Norman McLeod, and Rai Sitanath Roy Bahadur, Honorary Treasurers; Maharaj Kumar Prodyot Coomar Tagore, and Mr. C. B. Bayley, Honorary Secretaries.

Kumar Birendra Chandra Singh and Kumar Shiva Kumar Tagore attended upon Their Royal Highnesses with gold chowries, and four Indian nobles, the Maharaja of Burdwan, Maharaja Tagore, the Maharaja of Gidhour, and the Nawab of Dacca acted as Raj Chatrdhurris or Royal canopy-holders. Maharaja Kumar Sashii Kanta Acharya, of Mymensingh, bore a jewelled basin of rose water, which was held before Their Royal Highnesses by the Maharaja Girija Nath Roy, of Dinajpur. Garlands of white flowers were next presented by Raja Peary Mohun Mukerji, and the Maharaja of Sonbursa presented white sandal scented with saffron and musk and a sacred fragrant wood obtained from the Garo Hills and known as agar. The Maharaj Kumari Sudhira of Cooch Behar next presented a large bouquet to the Princess, thereafter a cocoanut, paddy, blades of grass, coins and flowers, the emblems of fertility, were offered on gold plates by three Mahamahopadhyas. Three Shams-ul-umamas, Maulvi Ahmed and Maulvi Mirza of Bengal, and Maulvi Saddat Husain of Behar presented a Kandah specially composed, and two Buddhist priests from Chittagong offered an address of specially composed Pali slokas (verses) enclosed in a carpet. A Bengali song of welcome originally composed by Maharaja Sir Jotindra Mohan Tagore Bahadur, for the entertainment given in Calcutta to His Majesty the King thirty years ago was then sung as a slow chant. The following is a translation of the song:—

Hail ! Prince, Princess ! all hail to thee !

With joyous voice we welcome sing,
As bursting into festive glee

Bengala greets her future King.

Though humble our reception be,

And though our strains may halting run,

The loyal heart we bring to thee

Is warmer than our Eastern Sun.

The rest of the proceedings were of a character weird and wonderful if not grotesque. Heralded by strange noises, a number of men appeared in the arena in almost the typical costume of the traditional wizard or theatrical astrologer. They wore high conical hats swathed with rolled puggies, had false and bushy black beards, and were robed in long loose brightly coloured garments, which departed from the costume of wizardry only by the absence of hieroglyphics. They carried staves with coloured paper lanterns and chanted what was called a taal song, circling round and crowding together the while. To these succeeded the weird sound of horns, and in the arena appeared a band of men in saffron robes, some blowing serpentine-shaped horns, others beating conch shells, cymbals, and tom-toms, with the occasional clang of a temple bell. Two men carried ornamental umbrellas, and a semi-nude individual after a supplication and invocation, began a dance to the chant and instrumental noise raised by the rest. The whole company were soon gyrating in what is described as a Nagar Sankirtan. The Bharatt Musical Association made an agreeable contribution in a performance of Jhuyjiwiti on native musical instruments, which was greatly applauded, and then there was a succession of sensations in a Sikkim dance and a dance by Bhutanese. The Sikkimites had lofty headdresses, to which flag with patches of cotton wool were affixed. They wore coats and skirts of blue, yellow, maroon, brown, and bronze covering pantaloons, and the coats crossed by bright bands. They carried swords and small circular shields and waltzed and hopped about, brandishing their swords to the music of pipes and drums played by men wearing the quaintest of headgear. The dancers capered vigorously, swirling their skirts like ladies of the ballet, and the energy they put into the work was greatly applauded. The Bhutanese dance was somewhat similar except that the performers wore hideous masks. After the Bharatt Musical Association had played Iman Kallyen and the massed bands had enlivened the programme with the "March of the Gladiators," Their Royal Highnesses were entertained with a Tibetan Ghost dance. Two of the performers in this corybantic exercise wore white tights streaked with red and black to represent human skeletons. The others wore long loose robes and devil and animal marks and waved strips of cloth as they bounded about. It was a grotesquely weird performance designed to strike terror of evil things and deeds into the minds of the simple though whether it has now any moral effect upon the Tibetans may be doubted. While the dance might be symbolic of much the movements and the music were of the simplest and most primitive nature. There were other contributions by the Native and the British bands, and the entertainment closed with an exhibition of Indian quarter staff play and gymnastics. Thereafter altar and pan were offered to Their Royal Highnesses by the Maharaja of Durbanga and also to the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Fraser. The Mahomedan Imammazamin was next placed on the arm of the Prince by the Hon'ble Asif Kadr Saiyad Wasif Ali Mirza, and Their Royal Highnesses departed amid repeated cheers. Darkness had long fallen and the amphitheatre was aglow with electric lights, with the Royal arms prettily picked out in colours over the central pavilion. The trees around the maiden were hung with coloured lamps, and on the margin of a serpentine tank was a mass of illumination representing the Bera or Murshidabad form and manner of clustering lights. A boat high in the stem and stern and begemmed with light lay on the water, the vessel carrying a band of singers who chanted the sari song. Past the charming scene the Prince and Princess drove as they left the amphitheatre with cheers of the crowd still vibrating in the air. Later on there was a great and successful display of fireworks which were viewed by great masses of people.

Indian Daily News.—Although the morning opened rather dimly and threatened at one time to spoil the effect of the public reception which was accorded Their Royal Highnesses on the maidan yesterday afternoon, the evening turned out an ideal one, and every circumstance combined to make it an exceedingly brilliant function, not the least impressive and inspiring part of it being the great enthusiasm and genuine loyalty so demonstratively shown by the vast gathering of Europeans and Indians. The reception was held in the beautiful white pandal to the north of the Victoria Memorial, constructed partly like a musjid, or Mahomedan mosque, and partly like a mundir, or Hindu temple. Some 4,000 spectators were accommodated in the pavilion, which was run up in the form of a horse shoe, the central part of it being fashioned like a mosque with three beautiful gilded domes and a number of small minarets with gilded tops in perfect harmony. The two wings curved round and displayed Oriental architecture of the Hindu type. On each wing there were four mundir shaped domes relieved by minarets to match.

The architrave was from end to end supported by pillars with a succession of fantastic arches designed after those in the caves of Elephanta. The decorations were on an elaborate scale, but the scheme was truly artistic, one of its chief features being the pale blue draping which fell in graceful folds and filled up the open spaces between the architrave and arches, making a striking and effective contrast with the milk white structure against which the palms and ornamental plants arranged on all sides showed out with great effect.

In the central part, under the largest dome, was erected a handsome dais, the rich crimson and gold canopy over which was supported by four gold posts. Under this were arranged two magnificent durbur chairs of silver and gold most sumptuously upholstered and en suite with these were other silver chairs, somewhat smaller and of less elaborate workmanship. At the back and on both sides the seats were divided into blocks for the accommodation of the Reception Committee, the officials of both Governments, the Judges of the High Court, the members of Legislative Councils, and the leading members of the European and Indian communities. The Europeans invited to the function were seated in the west wing and the Indians in the east wing. Almost as many more seats were provided in the open in front of both wings, and on either side of the dais, some of those on the west of it being reserved for the Imperial Cadet Corps, who were entirely new to Calcutta, and whose soldierly bearing, splendid horsemanship, and magnificent white and gold uniforms and smart pale blue and gold puggrees, made a great impression on all. Two raised platforms appeared in the centre of the horse shoe, or rather one nearer the dais, where the performances in honour of the Royal guests took place, and the other closer to the southern entrance on which the massed bands of the Kings Own, the 15th Hussars and 2nd Staffordshire were drawn up under their respective Bandmasters; Messrs. H. W. Tyrrell, H. Broughton, and G. Ward. On the inner sides of the gravel walk were the lance-bearers of the Maharaja of Gidhour in brilliant rose pink and gold liveries, the outer side being lined by Rajput lance-bearers in equally gorgeous liveries, their turbans of twisted red and gold cloth hanging rakishly on one side of the head. Other chobdars in brilliant blue and gold liveries were in attendance on either side of the dais. Between the arena and the dais were grouped together the Bhairati Musical Association, dressed uniformly with old gold turbans, and some carried the most extraordinary instruments ever seen.

By 3-30 p.m. all the seats, except those allotted to the Cadet Corps and the Calcutta Light Horse who formed the Royal escort, were occupied, and a rather long wait ensued, but the performances of the massed bands and the moving kaleidoscope of colours kept one interested. Around the dais the gentlemen of the Reception Committee were to be seen resplendent in brocaded silks and satins and wearing costly gems on their persons, with glittering diamonds in their headdresses and carrying jewel-hilted swords. The central figure in this gathering was the Maharaja of Durbhanga, whose rich and picturesque costume of deep purple was much admired. The eye was attracted by the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca's dress of pink satin richly embroidered, with gold red fez with costly gems, jewel-hilted sword, and what appeared to be shoes of gold. Maharaja Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore was sumptuously attired in a pretty turquoise blue. The Maharaja of Gidhour had a brilliant purple velvet chupkan, heavily embroidered, and carried a jewel-hilted sword. The young Maharaja of Burdwan had on a neat dress with white facings. Most of the others were dressed in black and gold.

Shortly after 4 p.m. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, Lady Fraser and party from Belvedere drove in and were conducted to their seats.

Before many minutes elapsed a stir was noticeable in the crowd in front of the pavilion, and within a few minutes the band in the distance struck up "God Bless the Prince of Wales," the singing of the choir of 600 being distinctly heard all over the place. After the children, every one of whom was provided with a flag, had finished singing, His Royal Highness sent for Mr. Slater and asked him to thank the children and to tell them that they sung it beautifully. Mr. Slater then called for three cheers for the Prince and Princess, and so heartily did they respond that it might have been heard across in Chowringhee. Meanwhile His Excellency the Viceroy, Lady Minto, and the Misses Elliot had arrived and took their places on the dais. Almost immediately after the head of the Light Horse escort came in. The arrival of the Royal guests was heralded with a fanfare of trumpets. The last notes had barely ceased when the Royal carriage turned into the southern entrance, at sight of whom a tremendous cheering arose from inside as well as outside the pavilion. The Cadet Corps who brought up the rear also came in for some cheering.

Their Royal Highnesses were received by the Reception Committee, headed by the Maharaja of Durbhanga and conducted to the throne seats on the dais, the massed bands playing the National Anthem.

The ceremony as described above was then gone through. The Purdah party at Belvedere on Monday afternoon was a brilliant affair, the Indian Zenana being fairly represented. The arrangements made were excellent, suiting the convenience and taste of the most fastidious orthodox purdahnasin lady. From 1 o'clock in the afternoon carriages began to pour in, and Lady Fraser played the hostess, receiving the purdah ladies cordially and conducting them to the place where Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales was to take her seat. Late in the afternoon, Her Royal Highness arrived. Then the ceremony began, an elderly lady performing the benediction on the Princess with dhan and durva (paddy and green grass). Lady Fraser then introduced the purdah ladies one by one to Her Royal Highness, who received them graciously. As a souvenir of the visit of the Princess and Her Royal Consort to India, Her Royal Highness presented each of the ladies present with a silver medal.

The following is a list of the ladies' names who, according to the Basumati (a vernacular paper published in Calcutta) proposed to attend the party: The Maharani of Burdwan, the Maharani of Kooch Behar, the Maharani of Hutwa, Maharaj Kumar Tagore's lady, ladies of Justice Saroda Charan Mitter's house, ladies of Justice Chundra Mudhab Ghose's house, Raja Benoy Krishna Deb's lady, ladies of the Sova Bazar Raj, and other ladies of the Indian landed aristocracy.

The function lasted for nearly two hours, and thanks to the Princess and the tact of Lady Fraser it proved highly successful.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and the Princess of Wales lunched with the Maharaja of Cooch Behar yesterday afternoon at his residence, "The Woodlands." Besides the Royal guests, there were included in the party, Mr. R. W. Carlyle, Mr. and Mrs. G. Sutherland, Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Myers, Sir Patrick Playfair, Captain Holden, Mr. and Mrs. S. N. Sen, and Mr. and Mrs. Mahalanobis. The Royal party arrived at 1-30 p.m., and were received cordially by the Maharaja and the Maharani of Cooch Behar and entertained at lunch. The party left at about half past three. The Cooch Behar State band played a selection of music at intervals.

Indian Daily News.—The Prince of Wales had a new and remarkably interesting experience in the State visit which he received yesterday morning from the Tashi Lama of Tibet. In colouring and incident it was a distinct departure from the ceremonial visits which His Royal Highness has hitherto received throughout the tour, while its political interest was of the greatest significance. The call which the Tashi Lama made upon the Prince of Wales at Rawalpindi was of an informal nature, though its importance was clear, but yesterday morning this young man, who is venerated by Tibetans as an incarnation of Buddha, appeared before the heir-apparent to the Imperial Throne of Great Britain in all the dignities of his high office, and made offerings to His Royal Highness. State visits were also paid to the Prince by the Maharaj Kumar of Sikkim, and the Tongsa Penlop, and Government House early presented an unusual scene as groups of Tibetans, Sikkimese and Bhutanese arrived bearing bundles of gifts. From the yellow and brown garbed durbars to the humbler, roughly clad and barefooted attendants they were a strong-visaged, strong-limbed set of men, and many of them built on large lines. Their headgear was various, the most unexpected style of headdress among the earlier arrivals being a brown Alpine hat with a peacock's plume which distinguished a few of the motley throng. The attendants of the Tashi Lama were however distinctive beyond all others.

The Lama was the first to visit the Prince, and he arrived escorted by a cavalcade which brought a bit of Chinese State processional show into the grounds of Government House. The procession paraded the roads circling Government House, entering the grounds by the east gate, and an extraordinary sight it was. Preceded by an escort of Native Cavalry and moving to the slow music of fifes and drums, there came a body of men mounted on shaggy ponies and wearing thick brown robes and yellow circular disk shaped hats. Clothed as they were they looked like loose bundles finished with yellow hats, bright yellow silk umbrellas, yellow silk banners, and a yellow paliki carried in the procession gave a vivid gleam of colour to the cavalcade, though the morning was dull and overcast. As the procession came near it was seen to be weirdly composite. The yellow hats of the advanced retinue were rivalled by the flat heavily fringed scarlet hats of others. The Tashi Lama was driven in a Government House carriage, and attended by a couple of political officers. As he alighted and ascended Government House steps, accompanied by a crowd of followers, a couple of Tibetans wearing yellow coxcomb hats blew prolonged notes on the fifes.

The Tashi Lama, a young man, bareheaded, with closely cropped black hair, was received at the head of the steps by Sir Louis Dane, the Foreign Secretary to the Government of India and Captain Wagram and escorted to the Durbar-room where His Royal Highness was seated on one of two thrones. The Tashi Lama, after being presented, took the seat on the right hand of His Royal Highness with whom he conversed, the Resident in Sikkim acting as interpreter. Then the attendants of the Lama bore in trays of presents which were placed on the ground in front of His Royal Highness. The Tashi Lama personally presented to the Prince an ivory handled poniard encased in an ivory sheath which, after His Royal Highness had received and handed to Sir Louis Dane, was entrusted to Sir Walter Lawrence. Thereafter the dignitaries accompanying the Lama were presented to the Prince and made gifts of silk scarves. In place of attar and pan tea was then brought in and served to the Lama, the Prince and the Lama's distinguished attendants. The face of the Lama as he conversed with the Prince by the aid of the interpreter was not entirely impassive, but was frequently wreathed in smiles. The chobdars waved their yak tails and raised and lowered their maces behind the thrones, and the Tibetan dignitaries composedly sipped their tea, the scene being impressive in a fashion entirely its own.

When the Lama prepared to depart he assumed a yellow mitre, and as he moved to the entrance of the hall escorted by the Prince and the Royal suite and his own attendants, he appeared not greatly unlike a Roman prelate in full episcopal robes. His arrival and departure were viewed by the Princess of Wales and Lady Minto from the balcony of Government House. His attention was drawn to Her Royal Highness as he was about to descend the steps, and salutations were exchanged.

Having slowly descended the steps, the Lama removed his mitre, and entered his paliki, which was borne by fourteen men in yellow with a number of the red-hatted men holding the leading ropes in front. The rest of his attendants mounted their shaggy ponies, and the remarkable cavalcade moved off exciting great interest as it went. The visit to His Royal Highness of the Maharaj Kumar of Sikkim immediately followed that of the Tashi Lama, the Tongsa Penlop being subsequently received. The procedure in each case was similar to that observed in the case of the Tashi Lama, tea taking the place of attar and pan.

The presents which were offered to His Royal Highness were numerous and consisted of rich clothes, valuable vessels, shield, sword, and helmet and pipes and horns.

The presents of the Tashi Lama comprised images carried on two trays, copper tea pots with silver inlays, silver tea-pots also with inlays of silver, a silver incense pot, with silk fabrics, carpets and woollen cloth of Tibetan manufacture.

Pioneer.—Yesterday afternoon the Prince of Wales paid an informal visit to His Highness the Aga Khan, and the Princess visited the annual New Year's day fête at the Zoological Gardens, and attended a purdah party given by Lady Fraser at Belvedere.

In the evening the Viceroy gave the usual State dinner, the guests being invited to meet the Prince of Wales. There were 122 guests invited, in addition to the Royal and Viceregal Staffs. These included all the high officials, civil, naval and military, now in Calcutta, the Consuls-General, the European Additional Members of the Viceroy's and Bengal Legislative Councils, and also Nawab Fateh Ali Khan, Mr. Gokhale, Nawab Salimullah of Dacca, Nawabs Saiyid Mahomed, and the Aga Khan. The Maharaja of Durbhanga, the Bengali Judges of the High Court, and several Native Additional Members of Council were invited after dinner. Various gentlemen were presented to the Prince.

Pioneer.—Colonel Peile, Inspector-General of Police, will leave Mandalay for Rangoon on Tuesday to accompany Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales throughout their tour in Burma, and he will be in charge of the Royal camps at Rangoon and Mandalay.

The preparations which are being made at the Royal Lake, and particularly on the lawn of the Boat Club, under the direction of Mr. Short, Secretary of the Municipality, for the reception of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales on the night of the 15th January, show that it is determined to make the occasion a thoroughly memorable one. There are two hundred thousand lamps to be used, and an equal number of night lights to fit them. Besides, 25,000 carriage candles for Chinese lanterns have been made and presented by the Burma Oil Company. Lamps will be hung all round the contour of the lake, some nine or ten miles. Besides this large number of small lamps there are some 50,000 of other sorts to be placed in every advantageous position. To hang the lamps round the lake and in other places there are twelve miles of telegraph wire and five miles of smaller wire, 50,000 nails of special design with a hook at the end to attach to trees and wood work, etc. The lantern shamiana will be one of the most striking features of the illuminations. The walls and roof will be composed of lanterns erected on the trees encircling the plateau on the Boat Club lawn. The Royal visitors will be received by the Boat Club on their disembarking from the boat which is to convey the Royal party with the Lieutenant-Governor and Staff, Lady White, and Miss White, and a few others from the pavilion to the Boat Club lawn. After a little tour on the lake on the pavilion side Their Royal Highnesses will walk round the hill, past the steps presented by Do Ohn Ghine, C.I.E., where Mrs. Adamson on behalf of the Reception Committee will present the Princess with an album. The Shive Dagon pagoda is to come into the scheme of illuminations. A bright light will be thrown from Barrack Hill, which lies between the pagoda and the lakes, on to the pagoda itself. The album which the Reception Committee is presenting is an exceptionally handsome one, and has been made and illuminated at Home, to the order and design of Messrs. Beato & Co., Limited. It is about eighteen inches by twelve, bound in levant morocco and mounted in gold with the Prince of Wales' crest also in gold. In the centre of the cover is a hand-painted enamel of a scene on the lakes. The illuminated title page contains the inscription of the presentation and water colour sketches. The album consists of thirty-six platinotypes, the mounting pearl grey, illuminated in gold and red. It will be enclosed in a Burmese carved teak casket.

Rangoon Gazette.—A huge scheme of illumination in honor of the Royal visit has been successfully worked out by Mr. Tilly, Deputy Commissioner of Pegu. On the night of the 15th instant when the Royal train is on its way from Rangoon to Mandalay, the section of the line traversing the Pegu district will be illuminated. At every few paces lights will be placed on either side of the line from the border of the Hanthawaddy district to that of the Toungoo district. The other night the scheme was experimentally tested and a railway passenger says it was a ve striking sight.

Englishman.—The garden party at Government House yesterday afternoon was the largest and most brilliant function of a similar nature that has yet been held in the beautiful grounds of the Viceroy's residence, and spacious as the lawns are they were none too large for the many hundreds of guests, who received the honour of an invitation from Lord and Lady Minto to meet Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. From 4-30 p.m. onwards carriage after carriage arrived at Government House gates, and within half an hour practically the whole of Calcutta society had collected within the premises. The scene was certainly an animated and charming one, for the fair sex had evidently reserved many of their most delightful gowns for the occasion, and numerous dresses were extremely rich and tasteful. A large number of military and naval officers were present in uniform, and with a number of picturesquely dressed Indian noblemen and gentlemen they lent an additional colour to a festive scene. To the strains of the National Anthem and accompanied by Lord and Lady Minto and several members of their staff the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived in the gardens about a quarter to five. After a short stroll on the lawn Their Royal Highnesses partook of tea, and a few of the guests having been presented to them they returned to Government House little before 6 o'clock. Among those who were present in addition to the members of His Royal Highness's Staff were the Viceroy and Lady Minto and the Ladies Elliot, Lord Kitchener and Staff, the Lieutenant-Governor and Lady Fraser, Sir J. B. and Lady Fuller, the members of the Viceroy's Council and all the high civil and military officers of Government. Among others were the Maharajas of Darbhanga, Burdwan and Gidhour, and the members of the Imperial Cadet Corps, Sir Francis and Lady Maclean and the Judges of the High Court Admiral and Mrs. Poe and a number of naval officers, and the majority of the Consuls-General in Calcutta. Conspicuous in the crowd, too, were the Maharaja of Sikkim, the Tongsa Penlop of Bhutan, and the Tashi Lama of Shigatse each with his quaintly dressed followers and attended by British officers and body servants. Generals Sir Alfred Gaselee, Sir Archibald Hunter, Sir Locke Elliott, B. Duff and Sir Ronald Macdonald were among the military officers, who attended the party. The guests dispersed after the departure of the Royal party, but their departure was somewhat delayed owing to the huge crowd which had assembled in the vicinity of Government House in anticipation of the illuminations and which forced all the carriages to practically proceed at a walk.

While the other celebrations that have marked the Royal Visit to Calcutta were for the few with tickets the illuminated city was for every one. And every one seemed to have crowded into the brilliant streets last night when the city shone with thousands of lights and even the trees of our beautiful maidan glowed and blossomed like trees in Fairyland. The hard diamond brilliance of electric light, the warmer tones of gas, the soft glow of chirags, the insistent glare of acetylene, and the flower-like beauty of Chinese lanterns were blended in a brilliant confusion of light and colour. Detail was lost in the glamour of light, and the eye, bewildered by the dazzling streets, could hardly retain any clear cut impressions. But few who saw the Chowringhee buildings outlined with light, the strings of coloured lights on the Red Road and the festoons of light along the tram wires will forget the effect, softened as it was by a foreground of maidan and trees. On Tuesday night there was a foretaste of the illuminations and we saw the wonderful possibilities of our maidan for decoration in light. When buildings are illuminated, generally the idea is simply to pick out the lines of the buildings with lights. If the buildings are ugly the light but accentuates that fact. But with trees their shapes gather beauty from the light softened by foliage. The maidan has served many purposes, and rightly it is the pride of our city. But how gloriously it would serve for the setting of a Carnival of Light. With its roads and avenues picked out with light, its trees hung with lanterns and with floating illuminated flowers and boats on the tanks it would be an enchanted garden. For illuminations you need perspective and background and broad breathing spaces. In narrow streets you are overwhelmed at close quarters and the eye seeks for rest.

Before six o'clock the streets began to fill. Men climbed over the bamboo frameworks of buildings and one by one lighted the buttees and chirags. Before the light died out of the sky buildings were sketched mysteriously out in light. In a second an electric device would flash out, gas jets flickered round buildings and then darkness fell, as the streets became swollen with a murmuring crowd. Our prosaic city of bricks and mortar was transformed. The light drew thousands into the streets and the crowds that thronged each illuminated thoroughfare were not the least part of a memorable night. From every quarter people flocked into the city, the point of attraction being Dalhousie Square, whence the people flowed into Clive Street. Lall Bazar Road and down to the Strand and river where the Hyacinth was displaying fireworks. Chowringhee was beautifully lighted, and the view from the maidan was magnificent. The Red Road with its Chinese lanterns and strings of lights, the trees beautifully illuminated with glowing strings of lights made the maidan an ideal picture limned in light. The river, too, looked fine with its illuminated ships, the great Howrah bridge with its many lights reflected in the water; and the Hyacinth and the Perseus were robbed altogether of their sinister look of war.

The Red Road with its strings of coloured lights and its Chinese lanterns looked charming. There were crowds of people on the maidan waiting for the procession and for them the fireworks on the Hyacinth filled in a long wait. Behind the Fort which looked stately with its lighted designs of the Prince of Wales' feathers and the Union Jack, the rockets shot up into the sky and thousands of eyes followed them.

The spectacle from the Outram Road as the Royal Party started on their tour was magnificent. Through the trees and beyond the lines of light that encircled the maidan was the illuminated city in a golden haze. The Fort with its ramparts outlined commanded the maidan, the Ochterlony Monument encircled by flickering lights and royally crowned stood out boldly, and the trees along Outram Road were hung with Chinese lanterns that glowed softly around the foliage. A fanfare of trumpets, and then the Royal carriage, followed by the Hussars, rolled by. There was a cheer as the Prince and Princess past, and leaving the maidan they entered Chowringhee for their drive through the city.

First Messrs. Hall and Anderson, with a fine display and Messrs. Kelner's most brilliantly lighted, held the eye. The United Service Club outlined with electric light looked most effective and the Museum was dazzling in its artistic brilliancy. All the Chowringhee buildings were sumptuously lighted, and the impression gained of this fine thoroughfare was a most effective and striking one. The Grand Hotel, the Continental Hotel, Messrs. Whiteway Laidlaw's and the Bristol Hotel made fine displays. It was certainly enterprising of the Municipal Office, although not on the line of route, to make the brilliant display that it did, and the Secretary is to be complimented on the work. Messrs. Leslie & Co.'s and Messrs. Otto Levis' buildings were excellently done.

Turning into the Esplanade the New Military offices looked most effective. It had been finely decorated by Messrs. Osler & Co. with some 450 lamps that outlined the building. "G" and "M." the familiar Prince of Wales Feathers, and the Royal Coat of Arms made a brilliant show against the beautifully lighted building. Messrs. Walter, Locke & Co.'s buildings were very finely illuminated, and Messrs. Scott Thomson, as one turned the corner into Old Court House Street, showed up finely. At this point an excellent view was obtained of Government House which looked very beautiful covered with its hundreds of lights, shrouded as it was in its garden. Along the paths were strings of coloured lights.

There were many fine and brilliant buildings in this street. Messrs. Bathgate's had a most brilliant display. Messrs. Lawrence and Mayo made a most effective use of electrically lighted transparencies and was most beautifully lighted. Messrs. F. and C. Osler's premises were brilliantly illuminated by 6 arc lamps of very high power. The first cornice carried the Prince of Wales' Feathers with 70 lamps and beneath this device was the Star of India made up of 150 lights. Then there were the letters "G" and "M." surmounted by crowns and a very pretty effect was gained by a finely lighted and novel "Welcome." The whole building was charmingly decorated. Messrs. Hamilton & Co.'s lent itself delightfully to the admirable display of light and decoration. The white, pure building showed up most brilliantly. Messrs. Peliti and Co., Cuthbertson & Harper, White-way Laidlaw and Messrs. Ranken, particularly the last building looked well. Messrs. Ranken & Co. made a most brilliant display that set off the building to the best advantage. It is difficult to remember the details of the light decoration of this brilliant portion of the city. The business men who have devoted so much time and trouble to last night's illumination are to be sincerely complimented. It is at this point that the procession turned into the dazzling Dalhousie Square.

Dalhousie Square a blaze of brilliant light looked charming. The beautiful Post Office building, with its dome and noble pillars first challenged attention. The dome was surmounted by a brilliant crown lighted with more than a hundred lights. Star devices shone amid a glow of thousands of buttees that flickered around the great pillars. The illuminated building so characteristically oriental in design was brilliantly reflected in the waters of the tank making an altogether graceful and beautiful picture. The Telegraph Office was brilliantly and effectively lighted. The main tower was capped by a fine crown and the Prince of Wales' feathers and the letters "G" and "M." showed out brilliantly. The lavish display of light had a most dazzling effect. Writers Buildings, which flanked the Dalhousie Square with a most dazzling display made a most brilliant and arresting spectacle. The detail of the building with its splendid frontage was picked out with lights and devices that sparkled royally. The R.A.M.C. Stores, the National Bank, the Mercantile Bank, bore the Prince of Wales' feathers and were handsomely illuminated. The business premises on the east side of the Square were lavishly lighted. Messrs. Smith, Stanistreet, Messrs. J. B. Norton & Co., the West End Watch Company and Messrs. Newman & Co., all made fine displays and helped to make Dalhousie Square the most brilliant feature of the city's display. The Hong-Kong Bank, the Bengal Nagpur building and the Dalhousie Institute also caught the eye of the thousands who gravitated to the beautiful Square. The famous Dalhousie Tank edged with coloured lights that were reflected back charmingly from the water was most effective. The water caught up the light until it looked like a splendid jewel set in light. Until a very late hour the Square was densely packed by people who seemed never tired of gazing at the wonderful spectacle.

From Dalhousie Square there was Lall Bazar Road, where, leaving St. Andrew's Kirk—most artistically illuminated—behind us, we were in a quarter where the illuminations were of a different order. Bands played, and all manner of flags and lights made the street gay and brilliant, and a sharp change from the stately lines of Dalhousie Square to Oriental confusing effect. The Police Station and some of the larger buildings were, however, splendidly illuminated.

Now the procession was in Lower Chitpur Road where everything was crowded, noisy and exhilarating. Lights, lanterns, lamps flared everywhere, the people overflowed into the street. Small but loyal bands played with energy. It was impossible to gather a clear impression in this confusion of light and sound.

Although most of the houses on this road are occupied by shopkeepers, etc., there was one blaze of lights from the commencement of Lower Chitpur Road to the termination of the route taken by the Royal procession, even the humblest shopkeeper having some sort of light to illuminate his premises. The east side of the Police Courts building, which opens into Lower Chitpur Road, and the Bailey Guard adjoining it, were brilliantly illuminated with coloured tiny oil lamps making an effective display. Next came the shop of Messrs. Edwards & Co., which was well illuminated with electric light in various colours. Then the walls of the Tiretta Bazar, which stand out to the east of Lower Chitpur Road, had a very large number of coloured tiny oil lamps placed on them, lending a pleasing sight. The shop of Kabiraj Nogensdro Nath Sen had electric lights, Chinese lanterns, with the likeness of the Prince and Princess of Wales, evergreen leaves, making a grand display. House No. 147, Lower Chitpur Road, was also illuminated with acetylene gas, tiny oil lamps, chandeliers, and chirags. No. 148 was illuminated with electric lights, gas lights, and acetylene gas, and decorated with flags. No. 20, in the occupation of Aga Mahomed Baker Ispahani, had electric lights and flags. A number of coloured flags and streamers were also hung up across this road in certain parts. As the Royal procession passed this street, the crowd, which was dense cheered lustily.

The tall houses of the Marwaries were splendidly illuminated. The dazzling white light of acetylene arc lamps dazzled the eyes. Lamps in gorgeous coloured glasses were used with a fine disregard to uniformity. There were blank spaces it is true, but the crowd everywhere was dense. The thousands of lights in this broad street brought into relief the great balconied buildings that preserve all the domestic mystery to the East. There were arches and bands in Harrison Road and what it lacked in order this riot of light and motion gained in spontaneity.

One of the prettiest places in Harrison Road is the big house known as Parna Kotee, a property now belonging to His Highness the Nawab of Rampur. The place was very tastefully decorated and lighted and the letters and devices were very effective and brilliant. The arrangement regarding the decoration and lighting were entrusted to Messrs. Stirling & Co., who have done the same with great credit to themselves.

At the entrance to this road, a triumphal gate was erected by the Marwarie Association illuminated with Chinese lanterns and chandeliers, through which the Royal procession passed.

The residence of Rai Buddree Dass, Mokim and Sons, a four-storied building, was not only very brilliantly illuminated with electric lights, gas lights, acetylene gas, Chinese lanterns, and coloured chandeliers, but had seven jets, one of which bore the words "God bless our guests." The Marwarie Dhurumsala, which is opposite to No. 152, was illuminated with tiny oil lamps, while the building next to No. 152, known as the Burra Bazar Library, owned by Babu Lutcheenarain Shroff, was illuminated with electric lights, and acetylene gas, and decorated with flags and streamers. Most of the buildings were decorated with evergreen, leaves and coloured cloths. The Parak building was illuminated with electric lights, gas lights, candles and chirags, with a large Crown in the centre of the building and neatly decorated with evergreen leaves and coloured cloths. It is impossible to give in detail all the devices and designs used.

From Harrison Road a view was caught of the Hugly Bridge which made a great span of light across the river. Down Strand Road the buildings were well lighted. The "P. and O." offices had the letters "G" and "M" surmounted by crowns and the "P. and O." flag outlined with lights affixed to the top of the building. Messrs. Mackinnon, Mackenzie & Co.'s building was handsomely illuminated with devices and hundreds of lights. Messrs. Shaw Wallace's Office looked splendid in its array of lights which was most artistically carried out. The river during the drive along the Strand looked splendid. The Howrah side (in particular. Messrs. Burn & Co.'s) was intermittently lighted, and the shipping was decorated with strings of lights.

The Howrah Bridge had been illuminated with gas jets, with electric crowns and stars, which showed off clearly in the dark background. The Water Pumping Station was effectively picked out with chirags and small buttees. Messrs. Harton & Co., in addition to having their place illuminated with buttees, had a transparency of a steamer standing out prominently. Messrs. Jessop & Co.'s premises were covered with numerous glass buttees. Messrs. Elliot & Co. had their premises handsomely illuminated with buttees, while transparencies of the Royal Crown and the Prince of Wales' feathers were prominently displayed. Messrs. Marshall and Sons had their premises set off with electric lights and the Prince of Wales' feathers. The south side of Messrs. Mackinnon and Mackenzie was excellently illuminated. The India Rubber Gutta Percha Company had their premises illuminated in an effective design with electric and other coloured lights. Messrs. Kilburn & Co. had their premises attractively illuminated with lines of electric lights of various colours and were decorated with greenery and flags. On the top of the buildings were stars consisting of electric lights in greenery. The Bengal Coal Company was bright with glass buttees, and the Commercial Bank was effective. On the other side of the road were the stately premises of the East Indian Railway Offices which were magnificently illuminated. The building is such an immense one and consequently lends itself to a good display, as three of its sides face the street. Chirags were placed all along the cornices, while on the walls were suspended glass buttees of various colours.

From the Strand the procession turned into Fairlie Place when the first building that caught the eye was the brilliant East Indian Railway building. A brilliant effect was obtained by a big locomotive outlined in electric and gas lights.

The outlines of a locomotive engine and a locomotive engine with tender were formed by electric lights and set off by silver tinsel. The wheels of the locomotive were revolving throughout. Below the engines were the words "God bless the Prince and Princess," in large letters and extending over nearly the whole of the east end of the building. Over the main entrance to the office from Clive Street an arch of greenery and flowers had been erected. The entire arch had scores of electric lights embedded in the green leaves, and was surmounted by an electric crown and other designs.

There were the familiar devices, and the whole effect of the decoration of this fine building was splendid.

The vessels lying in the Hooghly were all illuminated, the Jelunga and Lunka being outlined with electric lights. Further down, the Hyacinth was also outlined with electric lights, the mastheads and poles being clearly shown.

The Volunteer Headquarters were handsomely illuminated with lanterns, etc., while the words "C.V.R." were prominently displayed. Colvin's Ghat was picked out in glass buttees. The trees along Northbrook Avenue and Auckland Road were hung with lantern and looked pretty.

Turning into Clive Street, the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Revenue office E with their finely designed devices and brilliant scheme of decoration arrested the attention. Messrs. Finlay, Muir & Co., Messrs Graham & Co., were other fine buildings that were superbly illuminated.

Again the procession was in Dalhousie Square, where sight-seer that had already rejoiced at the brilliant scene had time for another gaze at the beautiful tank and its dazzling surroundings. Past the Post Office, the steps of which were densely packed, through the crowded streets the procession turned into Hare Street. One carried away a last memory of Messrs. Martin & Co.'s premises and the Mercantile Bank.

After the brilliancy of Dalhousie Square, Hare Street paled somewhat. The buildings at the corner that have been taken over by the Government were well illuminated and the street made an excellent show.

From the Strand one sees the Law Courts, the magnificently lighted Town Hall and the Government building that flanked Government House. All three were a dazzle of light. Gas was mainly used in the illumination of the Town Hall and the effect was most artistic and complete. The Government buildings were mainly picked out with buttecs which glowed and flickered on the slightest breeze.

When one had reached the gates after the dazzling experiences of a drive through the city so brilliantly lighted it was almost with a sense of relief. Building had succeeded building competing in this carnival of light until the exhilaration of the spectacle gave way to weariness. Fairyland had proved itself almost too bright and one welcomed the sombre trees of the Eden Gardens and thought reposingly of a sombre, darkened city.

The crowd was an amazing one. But it was most in evidence at about seven o'clock; from that hour it had begun to distribute itself through the streets. The police had arduous work and they did it tactfully, but with sufficient firmness to obviate any disorder. After the Royal procession had passed gharries poured in from all quarters and the streets became a confusion of vehicles and pedestrians. The duty of the police to keep the roads clear had ceased and people were allowed to wander where they would. It was a patient person, however, who was content to crawl round the city in a gharry—the pedestrians had much the better of it. But for all—Europeans, Indians—it must have been a glorious night that will live in the memory for many years.

Kumar Manmatha Nath Ray Chowdhury's Calcutta residence was illuminated last night, and instructions have been issued to the Kumar's Dewan at Santosh to close the Kumar's Sudder and Moffussil Zemindari offices.

The Maharani of Hutwa, who is at present residing at No. 15, Theatre Road, which is not in the line of route taken by the Royal procession, had her premises artistically and elegantly illuminated and decorated.

The lighting in connection with the entertainment on the maiden which took place on the 2nd was rather extensive. We learn that 702 lamps were used for outlining the feature. of the cornices, minaretttes, domes, etc.; over the dais was fixed the Royal Coat-of-Arms outlined with coloured lamps, and above it the Prince of Wales' feathers; the two being fitted with upwards of 500 lamps, and on each side the letters "G" and "M" in coloured glass were illuminated. The interior of the Royal dais was lighted by means of a very handsome cut crystal glass ceiling electrolier, the bowl being 3' in diameter; it was fixed in the centre of a peacock-feather canopy, besides this a row of 20 reflected lamps were fitted behind the front cornice. For the stands and refreshment rooms 200 lamps were fitted all with ornamental shades. To light up the causeways leading to the pavilion 4 intense flame arc lamps were provided. All this work was carried out by Messrs. Osler & Co.

Englishman.—I think this morning I must go and have a look at the maiden again. I want to make certain that the scene of Tuesday night was all quite real and not just a scene in a fairy tale such as good little children are said to dream about. Everything on Tuesday about it was so wonderful from the moment we entered the fairy horseshoe till the whole maiden was transformed by myriads of little lights flickering in the dusky trees and the sky blazed with golden rain and floating constellations of every colour.

The design of the pandal, as I believe it should be called, was perfect, both for making it easy for us all to see and for helping the scenes that were to be enacted. The slender white cupolas and quaint arches with snake-like carvings; the pale blue draperies, and then the scarlet and gold steps leading to the dais, the ceiling of that dais all wrought of peacock feathers and the Royal canopy of crimson velvet embroidered in gold with its deep fringe of pearls and on the side facing the people, the Prince's feathers and two most quaint peacocks embroidered by skilful and careful hands.

One by one the nobles of Bengal gathered about the steps and a gorgeous company they were. There was the Nawab of Dacca resplendent in embroidered peach coloured satin with jewelled fez and sword hilt; there was the Maharaja of Gidhour in royal blue velvet embroidered with gold—and the little Maharaj Kumar of Hutwa in a small edition of the same. His chest invisible under ropes of pearls and diamonds and his head-dress nodding with splendid aigrettes of jewels. The Maharaja of Burdwan in a simple dress of fawn cloth and black braiding wore strings of splendid pearls and emeralds. Perhaps the most dignified figure present was that of the Maharaja Tagore in his stately robes of turquoise velvet and jewelled dagger, but he who eclipsed them all was the Maharaja Sir Rameshwar Singh Bahadur, K.C.I.E., of Durbhanga. The value by all accounts of whose jewels must have exceeded a quarter of a million sterling. The Maharaja wore purple velvet embroidered in silver and a turban of rose coloured satin on which was set the gorgeous tiara from the Dholpur jewels, beside this not only did he wear necklaces and ropes of pearls and diamonds but also strings of jewels slung over his shoulder and worn like a bandolier. Little wonder if the wealth of Bengal has through the centuries tempted the hungry nations from beyond its borders; surely some of the hill men present must, when they looked upon the wealth and splendour of Tuesday, have echoed Blucher's thought "Was für plunder!" and have sighed for the good old days when a good sword could cut a road to fortune.

At last from afar we heard the voices of the children singing their welcome to the Royal guests and then in swept the Imperial Cadets more splendid than ever, if that could be, in this Oriental setting. Then the Prince and Princess were seen and cheered as they alighted and mounted the dais steps. Her Royal Highness wearing a gown of white chiffon painted with wreaths of pink and golden flowers.

All the picturesque ceremonies which followed have been described: how the Prince was garlanded, and how all the offerings symbolic of prosperity and peace were made by the assembled nobles. This homage over, the entertainment itself began, and a most weird and extraordinary scene it proved to be. First the Indian choir sang a hymn of welcome and at intervals played Indian music on their sweet low-toned instruments—music to our ears formless and lacking rhythm, but purring on like the murmur of a brook suggesting in itself the infinite yet indefinite life of India that flows for ever yet can never be set to our time or measure.

Of the actual performances the first was the Baul Song in which a group of men in green and yellow robes and strange head-dress gyrated and turned into a mournful chanting. Next came the Nagar Sankirtan, the dancers clothed in loose terracotta robes and close turbans of a dull red colour. Some bore enormous S shaped trumpets; others, spears decked with white flowers and two enormous coloured umbrellas figure in the procession (one of them for all the world like a patch-work quilt). This company, however, only acted as chorus to a stalwart fellow nude to the waist and smeared with white paint who danced and pranced before the Royal dais and at intervals raised his hands as if in benediction.

Then followed the Sikkim Dance which was of all I think the most appreciated. The musicians were quite a company in themselves, and it took four men to carry a pair of enormous straight trumpets. All the players wore the quaint Lepcha dress of loose red coat and steeple hat with one long peacock feather nodding in front of it. But as for the dancers they were like Chinese mandarins with pagodas on their heads stuck with flags that dipped and waved as their wearers hopped and swooped hither and thither in an imaginary combat of Gods and Demons brandishing long swords and small round shields to the squeaks and squeals of true hill men's music, not so utterly unlike what we heard a few weeks ago on St. Andrew's night, only that this had the addition of the most unearthly grunts and howls from the long trumpets before mentioned.

The Thibetan Ghost Dance was of course the event to which we had all looked forward and a most wonderful ceremony it was. First came mitred Lamas giving the scene the sacerdotal character which makes this dance suggest the Mediaeval Mystery Plays. Next followed two performers dressed as miserable skeletons with big flapping ears and ribs and bones painted on their tight dresses. Following them came the great God of Death and the Beast Headed Gods who have power over the Dead. At first the skeletons danced alone being spirits finding their way in the land of shadows; then the Gods joined in, their gigantic masks making them seem curiously top heavy in their laboured manoeuvres. One was Yama Raja the Death God in a full scarlet mask and diadem of skulls, another the Stag God with a really splendid head and horns, and one the Crow with his beak wonderfully well devised—the others mostly wore steeple-crowned hats decked with every kind of cabalistic charm, and all were in heavy and gorgeous robes which must have made dancing very hard work.

To see this dance is said to be "a means of absolution, and is both instructive and beneficial." At first sight it seemed to us to be a mild and grotesque medley, but I am inclined to feel that it was something more, for nothing read or heard of could give one the same insight into the creed of another race besides reminding one that not so very long ago, as the age of a nation runs, our ancestors enjoyed very much the same kind of instruction.

After the Ghost Dance came more Bengali music, and then further ceremonies of offering altar and pán to the Prince and Princess, and the decking them with golden garlands. By this time the day was gone, and all the pandal shone with a thousand tiny lights that had sprung into being as the sun sank below the maiden.

As the sun went down behind the Royal dais its golden rays lit up a scene never to be forgotten. They fell upon the crimson and gold of the canopy, and upon the jewelled robes of the Rajchattradurís. They lit up as if in a picture the faces of the Chouri bearers in cream and rose colour, and the jewels of whose turbans threw back the light in a thousand colours. It was like nothing but an illumination in some old manuscript with its blaze of gold and brilliant colours in the mellow sunset.

Their Royal Highnesses drove off amidst ringing cheers, and soon after we all left the fairy Palace, and wandered out over the Maidan where soon balloons were floating upwards which gave off streams of light, and rockets were bursting into a thousand stars.

4TH JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—We understand that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has graciously accepted the dedication of the "Te Deum" recently composed by Mr. Ernest Slater for the State Service held at the Cathedral last Sunday.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales visited the Indian Museum yesterday afternoon, and inspected the exhibits that are to find a place in the Victoria Memorial. Dr. Dennison Ross conducted Their Royal Highnesses round the place.

The pavilion and its approaches, erected in connection with the Maidan entertainment to the Prince and Princess of Wales on Tuesday, have been widely and justly admired. They were designed by Mr. W. Banks Gwyther, and to a great extent supervised by him, ably assisted by Lieutenant G. Trusler, of the Public Works Department. Where all the arrangements were excellent it is right that special praise should be accorded to the able architect and those associated with him in the erection of what was after all the centre of interest throughout the afternoon.

Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were entertained at lunch yesterday afternoon by Sir Francis Maclean, the Chief Justice of Bengal, at his residence, No. 18, Loudon Street. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at half-past one o'clock under the usual escort, and were received by Sir Francis and Lady Maclean, and conducted to the dining hall upstairs, which was artistically decorated. Among those present were the Misses Maclean, Major Campbell, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Pratt, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Geidt, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Brett, Mr. and Mrs. Erle Richards, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Sale, Mr. and Lady Eva Dugdale, Mr. Justice and Mrs. Harrington, Mr. Justice Rampini, Lady Cantelupe, Captain Jeffreys, Commander Godfrey-Faussett, Mr. Garth, and the Officer Commanding the escort. The Viceroy's band was in attendance, and played some choice selections of music at intervals.

We understand that the Purdah party at Belvedere on the 1st instant was a complete success. There were 60 Indian ladies present, of whom over 50 were purdah ladies. Amongst them were the wives of the principal Mahomedan and Hindu Nobles of Bengal. A lady correspondent describes the scene in the large Darbar Hall of Belvedere as one of great beauty and interest. Everything passed off without a hitch, and it is believed that Her Royal Highness, whose gracious manner charmed all the ladies, was deeply interested in all that she saw and heard. The arrangements for preserving the purdah were most complete, and were most strictly enforced. Three European and three Indian ladies devoted themselves entirely to assisting Lady Fraser in receiving her guests and presenting them to Her Royal Highness and to Her Excellency Lady Minto; and the guests themselves seemed to spend a very happy hour. No doubt their interview with the Princess who had come so far to see them will be remembered for years to come. A very pretty commemoration medal with medallion portrait of the Prince and Princess was presented to each of the guests. This was struck by Messrs. Hamilton and Company of this city.

Indian Daily News.—The Amrita Bazar Patrika writes:—We must say, however, that the Indian authorities should have permitted Their Royal Highnesses to see something of real India at least, they should have done nothing to mislead them. What is the real situation? Addresses of welcome, in which India has been described as happy and prosperous, have been accepted; whereas those containing any references to the actual condition of the country—the appalling poverty and misgovernment which prevail more or less everywhere—have been rejected. Not only this: While the prosperous portion of the Indian people who dwell in a few cities and towns have been shown to the future Emperor, the poverty-stricken and police-ridden unfortunates who constitute the real population of India have been kept in the back ground. In the interests of suffering millions, the Prince of Wales, if not his consort, should have been taken to some famine tracts to see what a famine-stricken Indian is like. Such a sight, needless to say, would have simply sent a thrill of horror through his kind heart and enabled him to know in what way India is really governed by the English servants of the King-Emperor. But the rulers are not at all anxious that the dark side of their administration should see the light, and hence he has not been given any opportunity to meet with such spectacles.

Madras Mail.—It is like a suggestion of England to be constantly confronted in Calcutta with the question, "Is it going to rain?" The weather is dull and heavy. There are leaden clouds about and everything portends a downpour. So far, luckily, the rain has been confined to the night, but there were many anxious hearts at the Native entertainment yesterday afternoon, still more at to-day's Garden Party, whilst, at the moment of writing, the thought uppermost in every one's mind is, will rain spoil the illuminations upon which the citizens have lavished so much time and money. Their fate at the moment hangs in the balance.

Swarms of coolies are now climbing over all Calcutta's great buildings coaxing into flame myriads of butties laboriously hung during the last few days. The lanes and alleys and chawls are discharging into the main streets a flood of humanity, which already fills the air with a babel of sound, and the highway with a living mass which renders traffic well nigh impossible. Their Royal Highnesses, who lunched with the Chief Justice, dined with the Commander-in-Chief at Fort William and then drove along a comprehensive route to view the spectacle, but a description of the feast of light must await the morrow.

Sir,—I would respectfully suggest that the ladies of Madras give an evening entertainment to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales in the Wenlock Ladies Park, which I am glad to observe is already being improved in appearance under the able supervision of Sir V. Bhashyam as its Secretary. This will be a fitting acknowledgment of Her Royal Highness's condescension in receiving the Madras ladies in Government House and in honouring the Victoria Caste and Gosha Hospital with a visit.

A responsive entertainment of this kind, inaugurated on this conspicuous occasion, will no doubt be repeated in honour of Her Excellency Lady Amphilil and her successors in Government House.—(A. SANKARIAH.)

Vanity Fair.—The Prince certainly exists in the odour of sanctity in this land. When one native orderly saw him he gravely and quite reverently remarked, "It was like seeing God, since he will be my King." I hear that at the Review the Sowars and Sepoys were very disappointed that they could not make certain that they had distinguished the Prince from his Staff when the brilliant little band rode down the long, long line. Not familiar with His Highness's appearance from pictures—as we are—it is difficult for natives when the Prince rides, almost surrounded by officers, to know which is Prince and which is Sahib.

I think the Prince and Princess's visit to Pindi was a great success. The Prince watched every important event in the manoeuvres with the keenest interest. I hear that his chief disappointment is that he is not getting much shooting, and the Princess's grievance is that she may not poke about the bazars like any ordinary memsalib. I am told that she wandered to a native village, close to the camp at Khanna, only attended by an aide-de-camp, and went into several of the natives' little mud dwellings. Both Prince and Princess are very homesick for the English mail, and the Prince writes every week to each of his children who are old enough to read. The Princess witnessed some of the manoeuvres, and it was generally remarked by the officers what a keen interest she seemed to take in each regiment as she passed down the long line at the Review.

The Prince was attended by a most distinguished and brilliant Staff. What a good thing he himself has such a pretty seat on a horse, with all those expectant critical eyes fixed upon him! Kitchener made a splendid figure as Commander-in-Chief. Well, whatever K. of K. is, and the opinion out here is very divided, there is one thing, he is not—the Chief is no joke. The Army, irreverent in many things, never laughs at K. of K. Sir Archibald Hunter was there, very Scotch, very interesting in his personality and conversation. With scarcely a grey hair, he looks a young man for all his great responsibilities. Sir Bindon Blood's soldierly figure was easily recognised, and Sir A. Gaselee was another man eagerly noticed by the crowd. There were scores of distinguished officers, and hundreds who were well known to the huge gathering; indeed, in many respects, the Army was a family party that day, and enjoyed its own society enormously. For hour after hour we sat there and watched the great force pass, recognising with keen interest such famous regiments as the 9th Lancers, the Corps of Guides, Hodson's Horse, the Gordon Highlanders, Munster Fusiliers, 55th Coke's Rifles, 15th Sikhs, and hundreds more—Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Gurkhas, Sikhs, Pathans, Dogras, Rajpoots, Punjabi, Mahomedans, Baluchees—all first-class fighting men, and looking it. And, indeed, one could not help feeling as the great crowd swept past first in regiments, then in divisions, then with the thunder of hoofs as the Cavalry and Horse Artillery came by at the gallop, that these alien fighting men do a great deal in keeping our own fighting instincts alive and on the qui vive.

You should see Mr. Tommy Atkins out here—he whose presence in India means law and order, and the honourable use of the sword if need be. He is not the weedy youngster you see in England, but a man, full grown, with a good chest and an excellent swagger. After weeks of marching, and three days' manoeuvres, he was hard as iron and smart as paint on Friday. The general verdict when the Review was over and we assembled at the Club to discuss everybody and everything, was summed up by a cheerful subaltern: "Well, all I've got to say is that old K. of K. ought to feel jolly well pleased."

You know that the Prince and Princess drove through the native city in Peshawar? It was without doubt a great risk, and one that the ordinary Englishman does not take unless in the execution of his duty; but it would have been impossible for the "Shahzada" to have gone to Peshawar and not faced this, as the natives would have attributed the omission of that dangerous drive to fear.

The Prince and Princess attended a garden party at the Bloods, on Thursday. Lady Blood is a wonderfully clever hostess, and had a successful party. The Royalties and Lord Kitchener, and one or two others, had tea in the house with their hosts. The room was charming with beautifully arranged flowers. Sir Bindon is a great host, and his daughter shares his sporting tastes, and there are many trophies of their expeditions in the house. The Princess was very gracious to everybody, and wore a becoming cream dress and toque. Lady Blood wore a very smart white dress and a big black hat, Lady Shaftesbury and Lady Eva Dugdale were also in white, and Lady Violet Crawley in a lovely white velvet dress. Lady Anne Murray wore grey, and her daughter, Mrs. Willoughby, was in dark blue. Mrs. Haig was very much admired in brown. But though we were all in chiffon at the garden party, we put on great fur-lined coats and stowed our fingers into muffs when we drove away. That is all my news. I have seen the biggest Review ever held in India, and twelve races armed in defence of our Empire.—EVE.

5TH JANUARY 1906.

Englishman.—While several years must elapse are the Victoria Memorial Hall approaches completion it must always be regarded as an auspicious circumstances in the history of this great undertaking that it was possible for a grandson of the late Queen-Empress to lay the foundation stone of the building. Yesterday's function was one of stateliness, not to say solemnity. In the demeanour of the assembly and the general atmosphere of the gathering there was an impression created quite different from that felt at many of the events that have occurred during the visit of Their Royal Highnesses to Calcutta. Possibly environment had its effect: and it was a remarkable feature of the preparations at the site of the Memorial that all tawdry decorations were rigorously eschewed, the only extraneous materials introduced to catch the eye being banks of ornamental plants and the red carpeting. By filling in the foundation of the dome and surrounding brickwork a spacious solid platform had been formed above the terracing, and it was here that blocks of chairs had been arranged for the accommodation of the large and distinguished company that assembled to witness the ceremony. Access was obtained by means of broad flights of cement steps, and at the extreme end of the platform a white pillared dais had been constructed. The Royal party drove to the Memorial from Government House arriving by the broad avenue that connects the site of the Hall with the Cathedral. This was at 4 o'clock, by which time the invited spectators were already in their seats. At the foot of the central flight of broad red carpeted steps His Excellency the Viceroy and Staff, the Trustees of the Memorial and the Hon. S. Sevenoaks received Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales and His Excellency the Viceroy and the Countess of Minto. As the procession approached the trumpeters stationed at the dais sounded a flourish of trumpets, and all present rose to their feet as Their Royal Highnesses and those in the procession proceeded to take up their positions on the dais.

His Honour Sir Andrew Fraser then rose and said:—

I have been asked by His Excellency the Viceroy on behalf of the Trustees to request Your Royal Highness to lay the foundation stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall. The news of the death of Queen Victoria was received in India with a universal outburst of loyal and loving sorrow. We all knew how deep these sentiments of love and loyalty were in the hearts of the Indians, but even those of us who think we know the people best were astonished at their universality. Not only in the great cities where thousands met to give expression to their grief, but in the remote hamlets of the interior where simple folk still live the old Indian life, those of us who were then working among them found them moved by deep and genuine sorrow for the death of the Mother of her people.

Everywhere steps were taken at once to raise memorials of the long and beneficent reign which had been brought to a close. Many local memorials were inaugurated; and these are to be found throughout India to-day. To Lord Curzon, however, we owe the conception of a national memorial which might be in some degree worthy of the great and beloved Queen and of the Empire over which she reigned so long. One of the strongest sentiments in Lord Curzon's heart and mind was devoted loyalty to the Queen who had sent him to govern this portion of her Empire on her behalf; and, on the other hand, India, its history, its antiquities and its peoples, had for him a singular fascination. These are the feelings which inspired the scheme framed by His Lordship, when he undertook in February 1901 to advise the Indian people as to the best means of giving expression to the universal sentiment. He believed that the memorial should be a national one, and that its most fitting form would be a magnificent treasure-house, bearing the name of Queen Victoria, to which might be consigned a collection of pictures, statues, historical documents and other objects of interest, illustrative of Indian story and specially of the Victorian era.

This idea commended itself to the Princes and peoples of India. It was indeed entirely in accordance with Indian sentiment. An influential and enthusiastic Executive Committee was appointed to raise the necessary funds. Subscriptions poured in from every part of India. Even those who desired to have their own local memorials contributed also to this national scheme. Through Lord Curzon's personal influence with the leaders of the European community and with the Indian Chiefs and nobles, extraordinary progress was also made in the collection of articles of national and historic interest, which were promised or sent to find their home in the Memorial building. The initial difficulties to be expected in so great a scheme were overcome. After much discussion the spot on which we now stand was selected as the site of the memorial. Thanks to the liberality of the Railway Companies, it has become financially possible to decide to have the building constructed of Indian marble. The services of Sir William Emerson have been secured as architect: and he has submitted his drawings and plans. The Legislature has put the scheme on a legal footing and replaced the Executive Committee, which had done excellent service, by a body of Trustees with necessary powers. The success of the scheme is already assured; and we are now able confidently to ask Your Royal Highness to consent to lay the foundation stone.

The principal object of this scheme is to commemorate a great and beloved Queen, and to associate the feeling of loyalty which her memory inspires with sentiments of patriotism and self-respect on the part of the people of India by connecting this memorial with the worthiest memories of Indian History. Hitherto the scheme has been singularly successful. Already over fifty-six lakhs of rupee have been promised and nearly fifty lakhs collected; and a substantial nucleus has been already formed of the collection of historical objects ultimately to be placed in the Hall. To this His Majesty the King-Emperor has made contributions of the greatest interest, including the writing table and chair which Queen Victoria used for her daily correspondence at Windsor. Local Governments, Indian Chiefs, public bodies and private persons have been imbued with the same spirit; and many valuable contributions have been received, which have been meanwhile deposited in the Museum hard by. The Trustees earnestly hope that what more of funds may be required will be supplied as the need arises, and that the interest in the collection of historical objects will be maintained.

Your Royal Highness has graciously informed us that you have inherited the love of the Queen Victoria for the Indian people; and perhaps we may be permitted as the Trustees of this great national undertaking, loyally to assure you that you have also inherited the love and devotion of the Indian people for your Royal house. It is therefore a great delight to us that you and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales are with us to-day, and that we are permitted to lay before you our request that you will lay the foundation stone of this Memorial Hall.

His Royal Highness said:—

Sir Andrew Fraser and Gentlemen,—We are met to-day to commemorate a great sorrow and a great love. Everywhere the Princess of Wales and myself, in our journey through this vast and varied land, have had almost daily evidence of the ample manner in which India has returned the affection of her first Queen-Empress. This sentiment, so touching and so precious, finds its highest and most universal expression in the national monument with which the Princess and I are proud to be associated to-day.

We have heard from Sir Andrew Fraser of the difficulties which attended the initial stages of this great Memorial, and we must all of us recognise that it is to Lord Curzon's untiring energy and devotion that the tribute to the late Queen-Empress has taken this national and far-reaching aspect. I am glad to know that the interest which he took in the building of this Hall will not cease with his departure from India, and that he will continue to show his sympathy with the undertaking.

It is right and befitting that there should be memorials in all parts of India in honour of one who though never privileged to see her Indian subjects in their own countries, seemed to have the peculiar power of being in touch and in sympathy with all classes of this Continent. But it is still more befitting that there should be one memorial in India, a symbol of the unity and concord which came from her all-embracing love for her people, and an enduring token of the affection which all Europeans and Indians Princes and peasants felt for Queen Victoria. (Applause.)

To us this wonderful expression of gratitude brings natural pride and warm hopes. The Taj, which has delighted and fascinated us by its beauty and by its story, can never be rivalled in its grace. But in generations to come this Memorial to a great Queen, whose sympathy conquered distance and space, may present to the historian reflections as hallowed as those which are inspired by the Taj Mahal.

I congratulate the Executive Committee and the Trustees of this great all-Indian trust on the success which has attended their patient labour of love. It will gain in Lord Minto further strength and encouragement, and I feel sure that the same spirit of affection and veneration which has brought this splendid and most worthy Memorial into being will, under His Excellency's guiding influence, cherish and quicken its future progress.

I must thank you, Sir Andrew Fraser, for your concluding words, which will be as gratifying to my dear father as they are inspiring to the Princess and myself.

I will now, with much pleasure and with feelings of profound gratitude to all who have shared in this most noble endeavour, proceed to lay the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall. Among the many interesting ceremonies in which we have taken part during our stay in India, I can assure you that none could have appealed more to our hearts than the opening act of this great work. (Applause.)

His Royal Highness spoke in clear measured tones and every word must have been audible to all present. At the conclusion of his remarks Their Royal Highnesses left the dais and walked towards the front of the foundation-stone around which the Imperial Cadet Corps formed a guard of honour.

Here Mr. Sevenoaks and a couple of assistants were in waiting, and a flourish of trumpets having sounded His Royal Highness addressed himself in a workmanlike manner to the task of laying the stone. With the beautiful silver and enamelled trowel provided by Messrs. Martin & Co., from a design by Mr. E. Thornton. His Royal Highness smoothed down the cement meanwhile making a number of enquiries relevant to the operation he was engaged in. In a receptacle hollowed out of the lower stone a number of current coins and newspapers including a copy of yesterday's issue of the "Englishman" were placed and then the foundation-stone was lowered by means of a pulley block worked by a couple of Royal Engineers. His Royal Highness tapped the top of the stone with an ornamental mallet and having used a plumb line and square stood at the edge of the platform facing the assembly and with a ringing resonant voice declared the stone to be "well and truly laid." It bore the following inscription :—

This stone being the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall, erected in memory of Victoria, first Queen-Empress of India, was laid by her grandson His Royal Highness George Prince of Wales, K.G., on January 4th, 1906.

When the stone was laid the band played the National Anthem and Their Royal Highnesses returned to the dais. It may be mentioned the Princess and the Countess of Minto carried lovely bouquets which were presented to them at the commencement of the proceedings by the daughters of His Highness the Maharajah of Cooh Behar and of Sir Louis Dane respectively.

At the dais His Excellency the Viceroy briefly thanked His Royal Highness for having so graciously laid the foundation-stone of the Memorial and for the speech which he had delivered. The procession was again formed and Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the carriages in waiting and returned to Government House. Troops lined the route of the procession between Government House and the site of the Memorial Hall and a guard of honour of Volunteers and native troops were drawn up outside the enclosure. The proceedings were conducted throughout with dignity and smoothness and were of a most impressive character.

Englishman.—The festivities in connection with the Royal visit were fitly rounded off last night by the State Ball, which was a very crowded and brilliant function. The guests began to arrive shortly after nine o'clock, and about 1,500 people were present. Government House was seen at its best, all the drawing rooms and approaches being thrown open and tastefully decorated. A long covered way extended on both sides of the front steps almost to the gate which was a great convenience to those arriving in carriages, and the telephone arrangement inaugurated by Major Strachey worked admirably. The scene was especially animated, as in addition to the uniforms, which are always so much in evidence on these occasions, a number of interesting visitors from Tibet, Sikkim and other places were present.

The Royal party and the Viceroy and Lady Minto came into the ball-room shortly before ten o'clock and the State quadrilles were at once formed. Dancing went on gaily from this time until a little after eleven, when the Royal party retired. An adjournment for supper took place shortly before midnight, and dancing was continued until the early hours of this morning. A more successful ball has never been given in Government House.

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has received the following letter from Sir Walter Lawrence, Chief of the Staff to the Prince of Wales :—

"Prince of Wales' Camp, India, 4th January 1906.
"My dear Sir Andrew Fraser,

"Their Royal Highnesses were greatly impressed with the procession last night through the streets of Calcutta. It is difficult for them, and perhaps will be equally difficult for you, to decide to whom the praise belongs for the very beautiful illuminations and for the admirable order which prevailed in the streets. But you will perhaps be able to communicate to those who helped to make last night's drive so pleasing and so successful, the warm appreciation of the Prince and Princess of Wales. They will never forget the affectionate enthusiasm of the citizens of Calcutta, the beauty of the illuminations and the wonderful order in the streets.

Yours sincerely,
WALTER LAWRENCE."

The following correspondence has passed between Sir Walter Lawrence and the Maharajah of Darbhanga, President of the Calcutta Reception Committee, with reference to the entertainment offered to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales by the Public of Calcutta on Tuesday:—

Prince of Wales's Camp,
India, 2nd January 1906.

My dear Maharajah,—Their Royal Highnesses on their return from the entertainment on the Maidan direct me to convey to you and the members of the Reception Committee their warmest thanks for a most delightful and interesting afternoon. Everything was so perfectly organised and the decorations of the amphitheatre and the approaches in such exquisite taste that it was obvious to the Prince and Princess of Wales that endless trouble and thought had been spent on their reception. Will you tell the members how grateful Their Royal Highnesses are.

Yours sincerely,
WALTER LAWRENCE.

1, MIDDLETON STREET,
3rd January 1906.

My dear Sir Walter,—I thank you most sincerely for your very kind letter and I hope you will inform Their Royal Highnesses that I will lose no time in acquainting the members of the committee of the most gracious message I have been commanded to convey to them. I have no hesitation in replying on my own and their behalf that any slight trouble we have taken has been amply rewarded by the pleasure that we have been able to impart to the son and daughter of their King-Emperor.

Yours very sincerely,
RAMESWARA SINGH,
Maharajah of Darbhanga,
President of the Reception Committee.

The special choir of boys and girls which welcomed Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales at the reception on Tuesday last, on the maidan at the corner of the grass-ride leading to the great pavilion, where the Royal carriage halted for a few minutes while the children sang "God bless the Prince of Wales," consisted of contingents from the following schools, numbering in all nearly 600:—

La Martiniere College for Girls, Calcutta Girls' High School, Pratt Memorial High School, Calcutta Girls' Free School, St. Paul's Mission School, London Mission Day School, St. John's Parochial School, Miss O'Brien's School, Loreto House, Loreto Day School (Dhurrumtollah), Loreto Day School (Bow Bazar), Loreto Day School (Sealdah), Loreto Boarding School (Entally), St. Teresa's School, Jewish Girls' School.

La Martiniere College for Boys, Calcutta Boys' High School, Calcutta Boys' Free School, St. Paul's Mission School, London Mission Day School, St. Xavier's College, St. Joseph's High School, Catholic Male Orphanage, Armenian College, Jewish Boys' School.

By the kind permission of His Highness the Maharaja of Cooh Behar His Highness's Band accompanied the children under the direction of Mr. A. Marks, the Bandmaster, and the performance was conducted by Mr. F. Slater, F.R.C.O., Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, who had devoted much time previously to training the children at rehearsals. At the close of the singing Mr. Slater was summoned to the Royal carriage when His Royal Highness expressed the gratification which the singing had given to himself and the Princess and asked Mr. Slater to tell the children that they sang splendidly.

Englishman.—I think this has been the day when, more than any other of the Royal visit, we missed Lord Curzon. It did indeed seem a cruel irony of fate that he who was the moving and guiding spirit in the conception and growth of the great building should not be here on the day when, for the first time, the public are admitted to see something of the progress of the Hall, our knowledge of which has, hitherto, been confined to designs and pictures. I suppose there is some good reason for the method by which the memorial is being built while the old goal is left standing, but one would have thought it might have been possible to have removed the gloomy and old building and have made its site together with the unsightly cabbage garden that now fronts the General Hospital into a garden which would be growing to beauty and maturity whilst the Memorial itself was yet unfinished. However, as I said before, that is the concern of the Trustees, who no doubt know their own business very much better than a casual observer can do. For the past two years the site of the Memorial has been a terra incognita—now and then we have ventured to peep through an open door but for the most part our only reward has been a view of bricks, mortar and foundations in a state of apparent chaos and we have realized that the old saying about those who should not be allowed to see a thing half finished was applicable not only to fools and bairns, but also to the Calcutta public.

Well, on Thursday all prohibitions were removed and we were actually invited to enter the hidden precincts and see for ourselves the progress that had been made. We were all more than a little dubious when the announcement was made that it had been found impossible to stretch an awning over the seats for the ceremony and it did not need the official intimation to come well protected from the sun to make us choose our thickest and darkest parasols or the afternoon.

As usual we were warned to be early in our places and as usual we arrived in time for a long and sultry wait. An announcement had been made that every seat had been allotted, but certainly they were not all occupied. It seems a pity that those who find they cannot use their seats do not return them, for there are many visitors now in Calcutta who had no claim to have seats allotted in the first instance, but who would have been most appreciative spectators. Arrived at the Memorial we found ourselves on a large level platform where seats were arranged in rows and blocks, but without being at all raised—the actual ceremony of laying the foundation-stone was therefore hidden from most of us. The dais being itself raised was doubtless considered to give us a sufficiently clear view, but this arrangement had the drawback of limiting one's zone of observation to the hat two rows ahead and the parasols or topes to right and left. Just before 4 o'clock, however, and after we had heard the guns booming out from Government House our ennui was diverted by the appearance of six stalwart trumpeters in surcoats of velvet and gold who took up their stand on the steps leading from the west end of the platform to the white coloured pavilion, which has of late been so prominent from all parts of the Maidan. A few minutes later came two little Maidans one English and one Indian each bearing a splendid bouquet of orchids and various oriental flowers tied with sumptuous streamers and at last we heard a rattle and clatter of arms on the Maidan below and then that national Anthem, which one would think must haunt the very dreams of Royalty. The trumpets blew out a Royal welcome and as we all rose in a mass, the Prince and Princess came up the centre of the platform escorted by a brilliant company and followed by Lord and Lady Minto. Her Royal Highness wore a gown of white chiffon with china blue flowers in broad bands from waist to hem and a toque of white with a blue plume at one side. Lady Minto was in pale green and a rich green hat with plumes. No sooner was the Princess seated than the bouquets were presented one to Her Royal Highness and one to Lady Minto. Then Sir Andrew Fraser made a speech eloquently setting out the history and hopes of the Memorial—reminding us of the heated debate as to its site (although nowadays one cannot imagine it elsewhere), and of the various difficulties encountered and overcome by Lord Curzon's whole-hearted devotion to the project and of the Royal gifts both of individuals and of public bodies which even now are waiting to be enshrined in their marble resting-place. When the Prince rose to reply his voice seemed to carry over the whole concourse, clear and resonant without the least apparent effort. Immediately in front of him sat the Tashi Lama, the Tongsa Penlop and the Maharaj Kumar of Sikkim in their wonderful semi-Chinese robes; behind them were the Indian Princes and gentlemen and on every side a throng of English faces all turned to the Prince standing quietly at the head of the steps in his scarlet uniform and glittering orders speaking simply and fervently of the Great Queen, his grandmother, and of her power to win love of a people she had never seen—evidence of that power the Prince said he and the Princess had had almost daily testimony throughout their stay in India. It was not a long speech, but it went straight to the hearts of all those who heard it and once at least it was interrupted by irrepressible cheering. Next came the actual ceremony which I cannot describe, for I could see nothing and only heard the stone grate down into its place. The Royal party then returned to the dias and received Lord Minto's thanks on behalf of the Trustees. Thus the ceremony was at an end scarcely half an hour after the Prince's arrival. No sooner had the Prince and Princess left the platform than we all joined in a general carriage hunt and by five o'clock were safe at home enjoying a rest before the fatigues of the Ball at Government House this evening.

Englishman.—We understand that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has been pleased to accept a copy of Mr. E. B. Havell's book, just published by Blackie and Son "Benares, the Sacred City: Sketches of Hindu life and religion."

The following representative Indian gentlemen were presented to Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal and Assam during the course of the Garden Party at Government House on Wednesday, the 3rd instant:—His Highness the Raja of Hill Tippera, the Honourable Nawab Khwajeh Salimullah Bahadur of Dacca, the Maharaja of Dinajpur, Raja Srinath Roy of Bhagyalul, Khan Bahadur Mahomed Ali Nawab Chaudhuri, Maulvi Syed Nawab Ali Chaudhuri, and Babu Manmatha Nath Roy Chaudhuri of Santosh.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by Colonel Charles, paid a private visit to the Calcutta Medical College yesterday morning, and was received by Sir Andrew Fraser, Colonel Lukis, Principal, and the College Staff. Colonel Lukis then conducted His Royal Highness over the College buildings, about an hour and a half being spent in inspecting the hospital and its wards. Before leaving the Prince informed Colonel Lukis that he intended presenting the hospital with Rs. 90,000 out of the sum of one lakh which had been given him by the Maharaja of Durbhanga for charitable purposes, and he also presented the hospital with portraits of himself and the Princess. His Royal Highness was loudly cheered by the college students as he drove out of the hospital gates. We understand that His Royal Highness has given the remaining Rs. 10,000 of the Maharaja of Durbhanga's donation to the Lady Dufferin Hospital.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, in company with the Countess of Minto, yesterday morning paid a visit to St. John's Church, when they were shown round the building and the compound by the Reverend C. R. Thorold Winckley, Senior Chaplain. Their Royal Highnesses viewed Zoffany's picture of the "Last Supper," Colvin's celebrated monument, the very interesting registry books which go back over a hundred years, and contain entries of the marriage of Warren Hastings, and of the baptism of Thackeray; also the massive Communion plate, presented by the East India Company. The Royal Party also spent some time in the compound viewing such historic tombs as those of Surgeon Hamilton, Admiral Watson, Job Charnock, and other interesting memorials of the past.

Owing to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales laying the foundation-stone of the Victoria Memorial Hall, the High Court was closed at 2 p.m. yesterday.

Indian Daily News.—As a memento of the visit to Calcutta of Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Maharaja of Durbhanga has solicited permission to place the sum of one lakh of rupees at the disposal of Their Royal Highnesses for any public purpose they may be disposed to select. Their Royal Highnesses have been pleased to accept the offer of the Maharaja, who has received the following letter from Sir Walter Lawrence:—

"Their Royal Highnesses have carefully considered your most generous offer of yesterday to place at their disposal one lakh of rupees or £6,666 for charitable purpose. I am directed to say that it would give the Prince and Princess great pleasure and satisfaction if the gift could be apportioned as follows:—£6,000 to the Medical College Hospital and £666 to the Lady Dufferin Hospital at Calcutta."

The State Ball last night was, as was only to be expected, an extremely brilliant function. This annual ball is an event which is always looked forward to with much pleasurable anticipation by large numbers of people in Calcutta, and this year the pleasure was heightened by the fact that we were to have the honour of meeting our future King and Queen. It is, therefore, needless to say that the ball was very largely attended, and as to this ball every one on Government House list receives an invitation for himself, his wife, and his daughters, it was little wonder that the rooms, large and spacious as they are, were densely crowded throughout the evening. This year, in place of the usual lancers, the ball was opened with a set of State quadrills, the couples arranged as below:—

H. E. the Viceroy	H. R. H. the Princess of Wales.
H. R. H. The Prince of Wales	H. E. the Countess of Minto.
The Hon. Sir Andrew Fraser	Lady Fuller.
H. E. Lord Kitchener	Lady Fraser.
The Hon. Sir Joseph Fuller	Lady Maclean.
The Hon. Sir Francis Maclean	Mrs. Erle Richards.
The Hon. Sir A. T. Arundel	Mrs. Baker.
The Hon. Mr. Erle Richards	The Hon. Lady Mary Crichton.

The Princess was in a handsome lace dress over cream satin and wore a magnificent diamond coronet, diamond necklace, and diamond collar. Lady Minto was in white satin and wore a diamond tiara, and Lady Shaftesbury was also in white satin and wore a handsome diamond tiara. Lady Fraser wore a handsome lavender satin duchesse, trimmed with long sprays of dark purple pansies intervals round the skirt and bands of dark purple velvet, the bodice being trimmed with beautiful fine Brussels Point de Gaze lace and purple pansies. Lady Macdonald appeared in a dress of cream lace trimmed with tiny wreaths of pink chiffon roses, and wore an artistic necklace of diamonds and moonstones. Mrs. Harington was in pale lavender satin, the bodice trimmed with lace and sequins. Lady Macdonald had selected a dress of cream crepe de chine over pink glace silk with insertion of chiffons and lace. On the skirt was a handsome design of orchids in gold and green, skirt and bodice trimmed with chiffon frills, and the bodice having a high medici collar of lace Mrs. Carter was in blue velvet, embroidered in sequins of the same colour in a design of large irises. She wore a pearl and a diamond tiara. Lady Maclean's dress was of black velvet with beautiful old rose point lace. She wore a diamond tiara and ornaments of diamonds. Miss Maclean was in white satin with old lace and mauve wistaria while Miss Violet Maclean was in a dress of pink satin adorned with roses. Mrs. Manson was in deep cream satin, trimmed on bodice with Brussels lace outlined with crystal sequins. Mrs. Carlyle was in white satin veiled with nette embroidered in silver sequins and threaded with pale blue velvet ribbon, the bodice trimmed with Limerick lace. Indian Daily Telegraph.—The grounds of Government House held a large and brilliant gathering this afternoon, the garden party given by the Viceroy and Lady Minto in honour of the Prince and Princess of Wales being great success. There were threatening clouds when the sun declined, but no rain fell to spoil the brilliance of fine frocks and rich Indian dresses. The charming grounds needed no decoration, but the Japanese lanterns of jewel fairy lamps hung in ropes along the drives for the night illuminations had a very beautiful effect against the dark green of the trees. Under the shafts of sunlight the lamps glowed like rubies and emeralds and sapphires.

Their Royal Highnesses, having lunched with the Chief Justice, Sir Francis and Lady Maclean, returned to Government House about four o'clock. They appeared in the grounds before five, proceeding to a shamiana where a number of introductions took place. More people were presented as Their Royal Highnesses afterwards walked about the grounds. The Prince and Princess stayed nearly an hour, leaving a little before six o'clock. With so many people present, there was an unusual air of brightness about the gathering, and the music of the Viceregal Band and the band of the King's Own Royal Lancasters increased the agreeable nature of the function.

Among those present at the Garden Party were the Tashi Lama, the Maharaja of Bhutan, and the Tongsa Penlop, who occupied a tent.

To-night their Royal Highnesses dined with Lord Kitchener at Fort William, afterwards driving through the City to view the illuminations.

Calcutta's feast of lights last night was magnificent. The public buildings were splendidly illuminated by masses of white light, and the business premises were ablaze with white and coloured lamps in the loveliest designs. The "City of Palaces" had become a city of enchantment—the palaces compact of myriad gems of fairy splendour, and the trees and wide open spaces fringed with the warm glow of great numbers of Japanese lanterns, hung like a necklace around the city. The Prince and Princess of Wales drove through the illuminated city in State procession, attended by an escort of the 15th Hussars and the Calcutta Light Horse. They left Fort William, where they had been dining with the Commander-in-Chief, about quarter past ten, after a fine display of fireworks by the Hyacinth lying in the river. The escarpments of Fort William were outlined in soft light, the flag on the top being picked out in colours. The outline of the Hyacinth was revealed in white, and other points in the distance lay etched in jewels of light. Driving from the Commander-in-Chief's to the south end of the Red Road, their Royal Highnesses transferred to the Royal carriage. The Red Road was lined on either side with ropes of Japanese and small Indian lamps, the glowing lights along the road being very beautiful. Going straight towards Chowringhee, the Museum, the Bengal Club, and other buildings were seen to be masses of light, and turning into Chowringhee and thence along Esplanade East, Government Place East and Old Court House Street, it was a radiance-like daylight that flooded the scene. The Post Office buildings lent themselves admirably to illumination, and the group of Secretariat buildings in the same neighbourhood were effectively treated. Unlike Bombay, no attempt had been made to introduce colours into the lighting of the Government buildings, all of which were picked out in white.

Big crowds filled the streets and thronged the windows, balconies and verandahs, and cheered loudly as the Royal procession passed. A pleasing and novel effect was produced by stars and spheres in colours hung in the electric wires over the heads of the crowd.

Leaving the vicinity of noble buildings, the procession drove onward, passing through Bara Bazar with its chawls crammed with humanity and ablaze with light, and the sides of the road crammed with people. From Bara Bazar the procession returned by way of Strand Road, where the shipping on the river was seen outlined in colours, and the Shipping Office made an effective display. In Fairlie Place the offices of the East Indian Railway Company gave forth a flood of radiance, and thence past the Post Office and other public buildings, with the tank in front reflecting the light of ropes of Japanese lamps, the procession went by Hare Street, and so returned to Government House, which rivalled the splendours around it.

The illumination of the city was a splendid success, and the immense crowds who lined the streets and cheered as Their Royal Highnesses passed onward through the wondrous scenes of light gave a remarkable impressiveness to the splendid vision. Except for individual efforts, there was a noticeable absence of the elaborate scheme of lovely coloured fires which Bombay put forth. In the prevalence of white light, the illumination of Calcutta was more truly Indian.

Practical Teacher.—There was a long and rather monotonous journey of over twenty-four hours to bring the Royal party from Lucknow to Calcutta. The Lower Ganges basin is almost perfectly flat, dropping imperceptibly to the sea-level, that is, to the immense swampy delta of the Ganges—a vast mass of mud gradually deposited till it rises above the sea and steadily pushes the coast-line further south. With considerable heat even in the winter, and much rain in the very hot summer, this mud is the source of dense vegetation of many varieties. So dense is it that the traveller approaching Calcutta by train can see only a few yards on either side of him, and the ruined huts and houses dotted along the route seem to have had the life choked out of them by the rank growths, and are indeed half-buried. The railway runs on the western side of the Hugli and to the station at Howrah, the comparatively small suburb of Calcutta on the right bank of the river. From the railway jetty at the riverside, the Prince and Princess went by steam launch a little way down the river, along by the great Maidan, which is an open park-like space fronting the river for two miles on the city side, as far as Prinsep's Ghat, a huge yellow landing-place, now the scene of a great reception. This journey across and down the river had two advantages: it took the place of a drive through some rather narrow and squalid streets, for most of Calcutta is far from lovely; also it afforded a good opportunity for viewing the Hugli and its shipping, for an existence of this river and its traffic the growth of Calcutta has been based.

In replying to an address of welcome, the Prince said: "There is nothing, perhaps, in the whole of India more typical of the relations between the British and the nations of India than Calcutta, which has grown from a river swamp to be the second city of our Empire." Calcutta, which now has a population of nearly one million people, owes its existence to the trade which was started on a large scale by Europeans and is rendered possible by the security brought about by the British Government.

The city is some thirty miles up the Hugli, and is the natural port of the enormous and extremely productive regions of the Ganges and Brahmaputra valleys. These rivers form excellent means of transport, and they are supplemented by great railway systems. The river is crowded with all kinds of boats and ships, bearing timber, indigo, jute, tea, grain and other commodities of the export trade, and returning with the imports bought by these goods. The railways, too, carry many kinds of products, but specially the more costly articles, such as opium and silk, which alone can bear the heavier cost of transport.

Calcutta is now becoming a manufacturing centre; cotton, paper, and especially jute manufactures are carried on, and this development is aided by the fact that the most important coal mines of India are on the edge of the Ganges delta, and therefore not far to the west of Calcutta. Then the position of Calcutta as the seat of the Central Government has attracted to it a large population, but this factor is lessened by the unhealthiness of the city for Europeans. It is, indeed, only in the winter that the Viceroy transacts his business here, and the Europeans generally live in Calcutta as little as possible. They do not look upon the city as their home—they live as often as they can in healthier and cooler places, and return to England from what they regard as exile.

After the Prince had been received at the Ghat, he drove across the Maidan to Government House, the official residence of the Viceroy. This is a reproduction of an old English palace, and, like most of the other important buildings of Calcutta, does not suggest India, except perhaps in the surrounding trees and gardens. The very buildings of the city proclaim its European origin, and their appearance is in strong contrast with the Mohammedan architecture of the cities previously visited.

There are necessarily few old historical associations with Calcutta. The "Black Hole" of infamous memory has disappeared and there is some uncertainty even as to its site. Fort William seems out of date—a fort in this place appears superfluous, for the enervating climate has produced a weak race, and the native population, though teeming, seems servile and incapable of rebellion even if it wished.
